Today, I am introducing a bill to remedy the problem and require all airlines interested in using National to bid for the available takeoff and landing rights. The highest bidders would earn the right to use National. By returning the allocation process to the time-tested marketplace, we can ensure a fairer and more efficient use of the limited space at National.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.

A BILL TO COMBAT INTERNATIONAL AND DOMESTIC DRUG TRAFFICKING

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to combat international and domestic drug trafficking.

My bill would strengthen existing law in three major areas:

First, it will eliminate bond for those offenders who often flee our country before trial.

Second, a defendant, once convicted, shall not be eligible for parole until at least half of the sentence has been served.

Third, it will raise penalties for both first and second offenders. A second offender would be subject to either life imprisonment or the death penalty. The death penalty option shall apply where the defendant resists arrest or was armed with a dangerous weapon.

Passage of this legislation will send a strong message to the entire world that America has had enough. Passage will also increase the protection of our law enforcement officers in the field and would ensure that these drug smugglers, once arrested, do not jump bond, but stand trial for their crimes.

I urge the support of my colleagues.

THE UNITED STATES DEBT REDUCTION FUND

(Mrs. JOHNSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, much has been made of this country's renewed pride, patriotism, and confidence. Clearly, we are enjoying a vitality of spirit not felt in decades, and I believe that no finer example of this can be found than in my home State of Connecticut. There, a small company which specializes in jet engine parts has taken upon itself the noble and patriotic task of raising money to reduce the national debt.

In early January, the management of Aerospace Techniques proposed to its employees that a small portion of their paychecks be contributed to a fund to help eliminate the Nation's enormous debt. The company's president, Jack Lynn, stressed that the program was strictly voluntary and that Aerospace would return a worker's donations at any time. The company also vowed to match every donation made by its employees. To demonstrate his belief in the project. Mr. Lynn set aside $10,000 for the fund, an account appropriately titled "The United States Debt Reduction Fund."

The employees of Aerospace have greeted this project with great enthusiasm. The firm's foreman, Salvator Aresco, said:

I had my son give a dollar. I'd hate to think of him not having anything in the future.

Pat Klein, Aerospace Technique's purchasing agent, took a more general view:

The country has been pretty good to us. It's about time that maybe there was a little payback.

Mr. Speaker, in his inauguration address, President John F. Kennedy challenged every American:

Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country.

It gives me immense pride to see that spirit alive and well in Cromwell, CT.

In the old days, when a farmer needed a new barn, the whole community gathered for a barn raising. Faced now with a staggering deficit that threatens our future, perhaps Congress will be able to gather her will to retire that deficit. But, wouldn't it be spectacular if, needing to reduce our debt, people in companies like Aerospace Techniques all over America joined us with a voluntary deficit reduction action. The people at Aerospace Techniques have led the way. Let America follow.

FIREARMS OWNERS' PROTECTION ACT

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by 58 of my colleagues in introducing the Firearms Owners' Protection Act. This legislation truly protects the rights of law-abiding citizens, without diminishing the effectiveness of criminal law enforcement against the misuse of firearms.

It reaffirms the intent of the Congress that it is not the purpose of Federal firearms laws to place any unnecessary restrictions or burdens on law-abiding citizens who acquire, possess or use firearms in any lawful activity. Rather, it was the intent of Congress that such laws provide support to Federal, State, and local law enforcement officials in their fight against crime and violence.

This legislation simply reaffirms that intent by modifying a number of provisions of the Federal firearms laws which serve no legitimate purpose, have created mountains of bureaucratic redtape or which have been used by Federal officials to harass and infringe upon the rights of law-abiding firearms owners'.

This bill provides protection for the law-abiding citizen by first, defining in precise terms those individuals who must obtain a Federal license to manufacture, import or deal in firearms. Current law provides no such guidance to these citizens. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act clearly defines these instances.

Second, requiring that criminal intent be shown before a citizen is subject to the penalties of a Federal felony. Current law is unique in that it can subject a citizen to a potential felony record for a simple mistake or unintentional omission. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act requires that criminal intent be shown.

Third, guaranteeing basic constitutional rights of freedom from unreasonable search and seizure and due process of law by establishing procedures for search, for courtesy inspections and for the return of firearms after acquittal or dismissal of charges, as well as time limits which criminal and civil action must be taken by the Government. Current law provides no requirement that cause be shown before an inspection or search of a citizen's records or premises. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act guarantees these rights.

Fourth, allowing the transportation of a firearm through a State or local jurisdiction which restricts or limits firearms ownership and possession, if that firearm is unloaded and inaccessible. Today many honest citizens can violate the restrictions of a foreign state or municipality as they are passing through simply because they are unaware that such jurisdiction restrictions exist. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act will allow transportation of a firearm through such a jurisdiction if it is unloaded and inaccessible.

Fifth, allowing a citizen of another State to purchase a firearm so long as the seller is a licensed firearms dealer, the laws of both State of sale and the State of purchaser's residence are complied with and the buyer appears in person to negotiate or complete the transaction. Under current law such transactions can occur only in very limited situations. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act would allow such sales but in no way will allow the mail order sale of firearms.

The Firearms Owners' Protection Act has been attacked unjustly in the past. Critics have claimed this legislation would destroy the essential provisions of our current Federal firearms laws which deal with curtailing criminals. Contrary to these attacks, this legislation refocuses the firearms enforcement effort toward the criminal. This bill does this by first, prohibiting the sale of a firearm to a convicted felon by an individual. Current law makes it a crime for a licensed dealer to make such a sale but paradoxically does not prohibit any person from doing so. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act eliminates this paradox.

Second, combining and unifying provisions in existing law which define who is prohibited from possessing, shipping or receiving a firearm. Current law provides many inconsistent provisions in these regards. Under the Firearms Owners' Protection Act prohibited persons, including felons, will not be able to possess, ship or receive a firearm.

Third, creating specific legislative authority for the technique of tracing those firearms used in the commission of a crime. Current law does not specifically provide such authority. The Firearms Owners' Protection Act specifically states that a dealer's records can be inspected, for one or more identified firearms, during the course of a criminal investigation.

Fourth, eliminating useless record-keeping requirements dealing with sale of ammunition. Current law requires that records be kept on sales of ammunition except .22-caliber rimfire. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has stated that these records have no utility in criminal investigations. The Firearms Owner's Protection Act eliminates this useless requirement freeing agents to pursue law enforcement oriented activities.

In previous Congresses nearly 40 percent of the House has supported and sponsored this legislation. The Firearms Owner's Protection Act will shift the focus of the Federal law enforcement effort away from a regulatory mentality, toward an actual law enforcement strategy aimed at the criminal. Today, I invite you to join in our effort. Any Members who have questions or wish to cosponsor the Firearms Owner's Protection Act may contact me or my staff.

ADMINISTRATION'S BUDGET FOR CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. GONZALEZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of my colleagues to the administration's proposed military budget for Central America. The President is asking the American people to send $231 million to Honduras, $483.4 million to El Salvador, and $35.3 million to Guatemala—primarily in the form of military assistance. The administration persists in the belief that there is no need to address the crying need to alleviate human misery in these countries, to press the case for reform, nor to ease the burdens of injustice and repression. Where there is misery, the policy is merely to add weight to it, apparently in the belief that the miserable want repression, not progress nor decency nor justice.

The requests for Honduras and El Salvador are not remarkable in any way insofar as they simply reflect the continued commitment of this administration to an ever-growing military presence and involvement in Central America. The request for $35.3 million in military aid to Guatemala is significant, however, because that country has had such a poor human rights record that the United States has flatout refused to send them military aid since 1977. Last year, the United States sent Guatemala $300,000 for training but this year the President, in his apparently determined effort to escalate the wars in Central America, has asked for 100 times more—for military assistance, not just training—regardless of the Guatemalan Government's implacable and incalculable violations of human rights.

And this same President insists that we have no money to give shelter and housing to Americans in this country. Millions for dictators, but pennies or less for food or shelter here on our own steps.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask this President, why is there enough money to blow up factories and roads and take lives in Central America when there is no money to create jobs and build roads and provide housing and support for people in America—or for that matter, in Central America itself, where the principal enemy is, and always has been, human misery and hopelessness.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1, my bill providing much-needed housing assistance in this country; and I urge my colleagues to support House Joint Resolution 92, my resolution invoking the War Powers Act with regard to Central America. Let's stop fueling the war in Central America and start addressing the misery both in Central America and in our own country with humanitarian assistance, not weapons.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FARM BILL

(Mr. HUCKABY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, the administration is scheduled this week to send the House and the other body a new farm bill. Supposedly to take the Government out of farming; to remove price supports, a market-oriented approach.

This bill, however, lacks in the fact that it does nothing to create new markets. In the last 2 years our agricultural exports have actually decreased. Agriculture is the biggest industry in this country; we export more agricultural commodities than any other.

The problem is, we do not have fair free trade in this world. The French wheat farmer receives 50 percent more for his wheat than our farmers do; yet the French sell their wheat for less than we do. Japan supports their rice for five times what American rice sells for, yet we are prohibited from selling rice in Japan.

The Brazilian farmer receives actually negative interest when he borrows money.

Mr. Speaker, until we have fair free trade, I think it is absolutely necessary that our Government continue to have involvement in American agriculture.

THE PRESIDENT'S USE OF SCRIPTURE TO JUSTIFY ARMS BUILDUP

(Mr. BONKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, the President tells us that scripture backs his demand for an arms buildup.

He was stretching it a bit when he referred to Luke 14:31, in which Jesus talks about a king who might be contemplating going to war with inferior forces and then implies he may have to send a delegation to discuss peace terms.

If the President chooses to quote the New Testament to justify his budget, I am all for him; but let's not do it out of context.

The fact is that the most commonly mentioned theme in the Bible (next to idolatry) is God's concern for the poor and the oppressed.

One out of ten passages of the synoptic gospels deals with the issues of wealth and poverty and the call to help the needy.

While Isaiah 2:4 looks forward to the day when they shall "beat their swords into plowshares," given this President's budget priorities it may be said of his administration that they are intent on beating this country's plowshares into swords.

THE GOLDMARK CASE: AN AMERICAN LIBEL TRIAL

(Mr. LOWRY of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, over 20 years ago, the State of Washington was the site of an important and controversial libel trial. One of the attorneys who handled the case, William Dwyer, recently published his own account of the trial, "The Goldmark Case: An American Libel Trial." This fine book is not only very interesting in its own right, but it is a timely reminder of what can happen when our political life is poisoned by extremist attacks on the integrity of individuals.

John Goldmark was a prominent State legislator whose political career was destroyed by a smear campaign alleging that he and his wife Sally were agents of the Communist Party. He sued for libel and, in January 1964, won the case before a jury in rural Okanogan County. The Washington Post called it "a victory not for himself alone but for good sense, fairness and fundamental decency." I would urge my colleagues to read this important book.

The case has special meaning for those of us from Washington State. One witness on behalf of John Goldmark was Harry Cain, Henry M. Jackson's predecessor in the Senate. The dean of Washington's political reporters, Dick Larsen, got his start by covering the trial for the Wenatchee Daily World. He went on to work for Congressman Tom Foley and now writes for the State's largest newspaper, the Seattle Times.

But the Goldmark case was important for our entire country, not just the State of Washington. Twenty years ago, the radical right made free with allegations of Communist influence. Organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the Democratic Party were smeared. Witnesses in the Goldmark trial linked Social Security, the Supreme Court, and the Eisenhower administration to this conspiracy, and portrayed Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and John Kennedy as its dupes.

A widely shown film, "Communism on the Map," charged: "Venezuela is already a satellite of the Soviet Union * * * and with the other Communist strongholds spreading throughout Latin America this largely completed the southern leg of the encirclement of the United States * * * In the United States today we have an acknowledged fifth column operating for international communism. It is in a position through its power in labor unions to paralyze the Nation. It wields great power in the legislative halls of our Nation's capital, in the communications networks which influence the forming of opinion and attitudes, and in other vital areas of our national life."

We can now see that these extreme charges had no basis in fact. Indeed, they would be laughable if they had not ruined careers and lives. Unlike some victims of this extremism, the Goldmarks were able to go on with their lives. Over the years, they have inspired a great many people by their decency and integrity. I am just one of those who deeply admires the courage that led them to fight for justice against the great wrong that was done to them.

But we also see echoes of this extremism today as some question the patriotism of honest Americans who support a mutual nuclear weapons freeze or oppose U.S. involvement in Central America, when the President's choice for Attorney General is a man who called the ACLU a "criminals' lobby," and when a Secretary of Defense charges—in terms reminiscent of the McCarthy era—that anyone who opposes his budget request is seeking to weaken our Nation's security.

I am therefore pleased that this compelling account of the Goldmark trial is now available. I would like to share one passage from it which I think is deeply relevant today:

"For nearly 40 years we have let our national life be blighted by a morbid fear of communism. The doctrine finds almost no support in the United States, where civil liberties, private property, and the concept of limited government are cherished. It has prevailed elsewhere only amid desperate poverty and chaos, or where imposed by force along the borders of the Sovet Union. Even in those places its dogmas fail the test of endurance. Yet we have allowed one wave of anti-Communist hysteria after another to injure innocent Americans and to debase our political life. In foreign affairs we have drifted into the tragedy of Vietnam, foolishly assumed that radicals seeking power in Third World countries must be our enemies, and betrayed our own ideals by sponsoring tyrants who proclaim themselves anti-Communist while abusing their own people. The results are all too familiar.

"We have thrived for two centuries amid ideologies different from ours. We can continue to do so. It is time to get rid of unreasoning fear of communism and to remember that our democratic values can flourish in the world only if we ourselves act in keeping with them."

THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE DEFICIT

(Mr. KOLTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, the budget deficit has rightfully attracted considerable attention, but I would like to talk about our other deficit. The United States currently faces an enormous challenge in the area of international trade. This Nation's other deficit, the trade deficit, is mounting at an ever increasing rate and it is at the expense of American jobs.

The 1984 trade deficit was a record $123.3 billion. By far, the largest single national component of this incredible figure was the trade deficit with Japan. The U.S. trade deficit with Japan is larger than that of any other nation. Last year's deficit with Japan stood at $36.8 billion. Imports of Japanese steel alone were up 56.5 percent over last year.

The Department of Commerce estimates that up to $10 billion could be reduced from the United States-Japan trade deficit if American products did not face the barriers Tokyo has placed in front of our exporters. Year after year, regardless of the party in power, we have negotiated with Japan, yet we have not had sufficient results. It still remains virtually impossible for many of our exporters to enter the Japanese market.

In order to facilitate exports, reduce our massive trade deficit, and put more Americans to work, we must insist that Japan begin easing tariff and nontariff barriers that unfairly keep our products out of Japan. This should be an important plank of a more comprehensive trade strategy that this Nation desparately needs.

Mr. Speaker, if we do not act, and act soon, the trade deficit will begin challenging the budget deficit as one of this Nation's most compelling economic problems.

REMEMBERING LORRAINE COOPER

(Mr. ROGERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House of the death this weekend of one of the true "great ladies" of our time.

Mrs. Lorraine Cooper, the wife of former Kentucky Senator John Sherman Cooper, died Sunday following a long illness. She was 79. For the last 30 years, she had been the steadfast supporter of her husband as he represented both Kentucky and our Nation.

She accompanied Senator Cooper to India, where he served as U.S. Ambassador. Later, she worked side-by-side with the Senator during his service in the U.S. Senate, and as our first Ambassador to East Germany.

One of the foremost landmarks in my hometown of Somerset, KY, is Fountain Square Park. It was through the efforts of Lorraine Cooper that this park was reconstructed, and it serves today as a reminder of Mrs. Cooper's love of Kentucky and its people.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in offering our condolences to Senator Cooper and his family. Lorraine Cooper's presence in this city and in the hearts and minds of the people of Kentucky will be sorely missed.

THE DEFICIT

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has discovered what some of us have been telling him for 2 years to be true: Deficits this big will not go away. You cannot reduce the deficit by ignoring defense, Social Security, and taxes.

I am a country and western music fan. Merle Haggard had a song out not long ago, part of which went, "When a President goes through the White House gate and does what he said he'd do, then we'll all be drinking that great bubble up and eating rainbow stew."

Do not start eating yet.

During the campaign the President said his next budget would not cut the poor. The budget yesterday cut them 5 percent.

During the campaign the President said he supported housing for the elderly and the handicapped. His budget yesterday had no funding for the next 2 years.

During the campaign the President said he would not cut the veterans. His budget yesterday did.

The deficit will crush America. To solve the problem we need a bipartisan approach that touches Social Security, taxes, and defense. I hope the President is beginning to understand the problem and I hope it is not too late.

MR. STOCKMAN OWES AN APOLOGY

(Mr. BENNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the first thing I would like to say refers to the statement yesterday by Mr. Stockman in speaking about the retirees, military retirees, and the veterans of our country, indicating that he felt that these people, or at least some of them, were more interested in their own pensions than they were interested in the security of the United States. Those are approximately his words.

These are horrible words to use against people who have given their limbs, given their lives, and have been separated from their families; made great sacrifices over a long period of time. Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Stockman should make an abject apology for the things he said, and if does not make that apology, then the President of the United States should demand such an apology or make an apology on behalf of Mr. Stockman.

It is a cruel thing to say to these people who have sacrificed so much for our country, that they should be deprecated by being castigated with the idea of saying that they would do more for their pensions than they would for the security of the United States.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement.

After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and with their consent and approval, the Chair announces that tonight when the Houses meet in joint session to hear an address by the President of the United States, only the doors immediately opposite the Speaker and those on his left and right will be open.

No one will be allowed on the floor of the House who does not have the privilege of the floor of the House.

Due to the large attendance which is anticipated, the Chair feels that the rule regarding the privilege of the floor must be strictly adhered to.

Children of Members will not be permitted on the floor and the cooperation of all the Members is requested.

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-19)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Economic Committee and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Wednesday, February 6, 1985.)

INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO TAXATION OF FRINGE BENEFITS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOLTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, over the last several weeks, virtually every congressional office has been receiving phone calls, letters, and telegrams from constituents being subjected to the Internal Revenue Service regulations pertaining to the taxation of fringe benefits.

Few issues have mobilized such a diverse collection of individuals and organizations. In may offices alone, I have heard from small businesses, public utilities, airline employees, insurance companies, large corporations, and members of labor organizations. All are united in their concern over the taxation of fringe benefits.

A number of our colleagues have introduced legislation that deals with a part of the problem. They seek to abolish the burdensome, anticompetitive, automobile, recordkeeping regulations issued earlier this year by the IRS. I support these measures, but I firmly believe they do not go far enough.

Today, I will be introducing a measure that addresses the root cause of the problem. The bill uses a very simple and straightforward approach. It would terminate the authority of the Internal Revenue Service to issue regulations which require the inclusion in income of fringe benefits.

Mr. Speaker, this approach is quite necessary because I believe we are only just beginning to see the threat being posed to fringe benefits as they relate to an individual's total compensation package. How long will it be before the four remaining categories of tax-free fringe benefits will be included in an individual's total income?

The modified regulations proposed by the IRS, have only added additional confusion to this issue. Changing regulations only complicates matters further. The issue will simply not go away. When so many are being burdened by so few, the best course of action is to remove the necessary authority for issuing regulations and rules that relate to the taxation of fringe benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me if they genuinely seek to address this very serious problem.

THE DIRECTION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BURTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to my colleagues a speech by ALAN CRANSTON, a distinguished Member of the other body and a fellow Californian, before the California Democratic Party State Convention on January 26, 1985. ALAN, who will be elected to his fourth term in 1986, made an eloquent statement on the direction of our national party. I commend it to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

CRANSTON DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION SPEECH

Once again California is leading the nation. Democrats across the country, the press, even the Republicans, are keeping their eyes on us this weekend. They know that the revitalization of the Democratic Party may well come from California. It's no accident that one Californian may replace another as leader of our national party—California's Chuck Manatt succeeded by California's Nancy Pelosi.

We, the California Democratic Party, can be the authors of the new Democratic future. California Democrats have always demanded leaders who look to the future and who welcome change.

California has always been at least one step ahead of the rest of the country—in education, in housing, in health care, in trade, in the dynamism of our economy. We have the most beautiful environment in America and we've led the way in showing how to protect the environment.

The peace movement started in California—and it's still stronger here than anywhere else on the face of the earth. We leader the nation in practically every measure of human thought, human concern and human advancement.

When we talk of the future of the Democratic Party, people listen all across the country. They know that what we say can affect the future of our nation and our world.

We Democrats put the nuclear issue front and center in the 1984 Presidential campaign. There is no doubt that we are in good part responsible for the new approach President Reagan is taking toward arms control.

We Democrats know that to struggle to prevent a nuclear catastrophe is not automatically to overlook the necessity of containing aggression.

We Democrats are for a strong national defense—but we are also against massive military overspending—overspending that impoverishes every other program and leads to a national debt that could swallow up our hopes and the dreams of our children like a black hole in space. The fact is that we are the strongest nation the world has ever known—not just because of our fighting forces but because of our economy, our science and technology; our free political institutions; and the energy, the diversity, the spirit the idealism of our people. Those are the strengths we bring to the negotiating table in our search for peace. They are strengths the Soviet Union will never match.

I was first elected to the Senate in 1968 as a vigorous opponent of American military involvement in Vietnam. One of my proudest achievements is that I helped get us out of that tragic, sorry war. Since then, I've helped keep us out of war in Angola. And I've helped prevent a war in Panama. I'm working in the Senate now to keep us out of war in central America.

I oppose a foreign policy that leads to the invasion of American churches by undercover federal agents to arrest refugees who flee death squads in Guatemala and El Salvador.

What kind of country are we when our government electronically spies on our clergy, violates the sanctity of the church sanctuary, and prosecutes American citizens who follow the compassion of their conscience and the dictates of their religious beliefs? Unless those death squads are eliminated and the human rights violations are ended, I oppose pouring more military aid into El Salvador. I oppose backing the terrorists who are trying to overthrow the government of Nicaragua. I oppose embracing dictators anywhere.

We Democrats must chart a new direction for American policies abroad. Here at home we must chart a new direction for a healthier, more prosperous, more equitable economy.

We have reason to be proud of the entrepreneurial vigor of our state. Each year Californians create hundreds of thousands of new jobs in the private sector, mostly in small businesses.

Those who try to paint Democrats as antibusiness just don't know what they're talking about. Look at the economic vigor of Los Angeles under Tom Bradley and of San Francisco under Dianne Feinstein just to mention two of many California cities that are prospering under Democratic leadership.

New industries are springing up. Our service sector is expanding. Small businesses are flourishing. And Democrats are working for still more economic growth. We believe that the purpose of the economy is not simply profits—but also the creation of jobs.

But economic growth must not be at the expense of our environment. We must rid our state and our nation of every unsafe toxic waste site. And we must make sure no polluter is ever allowed to create another. And economic growth has got to be fair. Decent wages must be paid. Safe working conditions must be enforced. And the tax burden must be more equitable.

The nation needs a tax system that everybody can understand. Not just expensive tax consultants and tax attorneys. We need a fair tax system under which everyone will be playing and paying by the same rules.

And we need to get personal income tax rates down. The country will soon lose confidence in those who exult in a dog-eat-dog economy, those who preach private enterprise out of one side of their mouths but cry out for special interest protectionism on the other.

Let's get the deficit down. But let's get it down in a way that is fair.

Let's think creatively about a Democratic program of incentives that will use the energies and capacities of private enterprise.

And let us make sure we increase opportunities for those on the way up the economic ladder, and those still desperately trying to get their feet on the first rung.

Ours is a party of all conditions and all classes, of all ethnic backgrounds, of many orientations and a myriad of persuasions. We're not a party of special interests. We are a party in which all points of view have a chance to express themselves and to seek the approval of the wider American society.

Can we do all that needs doing, we Democrats? Can we work to build a society that respects both consensus and diversity, majority preferences and minority rights? Can we assist in the creation of an economy that generates both profits and decent jobs without violence to the environment? Can we forcefully and firmly with crime in our cities, and simultaneously address the social conditions that spawn lawlessness? Can we manage to be both fiscally prudent and humanly compassionate? Can we respect mainstream American culture—yet also understand those who march to a different drummer? Can we defend ourselves against aggression, while refusing to be aggressors ourselves? Can we lessen the fear of nuclear holocaust that tortures and paralyzes so many of our young?

I say we can. I know we must. Traditionally, ours has been the mainstream party of our state and our nation, a party that works for a better life for all Americans, not just for the privileged. We must hold true to that tradition.

Let us meet the needs and the aspirations of all Americans. Let us deserve their support. Ours is a great nation, with a great past, and an even greater future. Strong in the strength of the principles and purposes that bring us together, we Democrats should be as one in our mission: A better life and an unlimited future for every American in a world at peace.

If you read the papers this morning, you know that Ronald Reagan says he's been playing some great and beautiful music. But from here on, he says, it's shake, rattle, and roll. Well, whatever music Ronald Reagan plays, it hasn't got soul. And in 2 years, the Republicans will be rattled and shaking and the Democrats will roll.●

REPORT OF THE INAUGURAL MEETING OF THE PACIFIC CAUCUS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on January 4, 1985, I led a delegation of six Members of the House of Representatives to the State of Hawaii to participate in a meeting of the Pacific Caucus, composed of Members of the U.S. Congress, parliamentarians from Australia, Canada, Japan, and New Zealand, and European members of the North Atlantic Assembly. The conference was organized by the Pacific Forum, chaired by Hon. Philip C. Habib, in cooperation with the Atlantic Council of the United States. The purpose of the meeting was to provide a focal point for exploring the interrelationship of Atlantic and Pacific political, economic, and security issues and its implications for the Atlantic Alliance and cooperation, between the like-minded industrial democracies of East and West. Presentations were given by Adm. William Crowe, Commander-in-Chief of U.S. forces in the Pacific, and by prominent academics, members of the business community, and current and former Government officials. The discussions were excellent and of great benefit to all the participants, and I hope for the continued success of this informal organization. For the information of my colleagues, I submit a copy of the meeting report for the RECORD:

REPORT OF THE INAUGURAL MEETING OF THE PACIFIC CAUCUS

INTRODUCTION

The discussions at the Pacific Caucus underscored the importance of identifying issues of vital concern in the Atlantic and Pacific. It was clear from these discussions that the time has come for a more intensive dialogue on the regional as well as the global issues and problems in seeking a closer interrelationship. The Pacific Caucus discussions covered this interrelationship in terms of political and economic trends in the Pacific and in Europe and the security challenges facing us in both areas and their interrelationship.

The search for peace and how best to resolve tensions and contribute to greater economic and political progress was identified as the major U.S. concern. The management of relations with the U.S.S.R. is given high priority by the present Administration. A second major concern is the management of relations with our allies and how best to preserve peace with an effective deterrent. Our third major challenge is how to deal with regional disputes and the Soviet efforts to weaken alliances.

This report will attempt to distill the main points of the discussions, identify consensus and the areas of difference. In view of the closed nature of the discussions the report will not refer to specific names. Its main purpose is to provide the participants with a brief record of the proceedings.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC TRENDS IN THE PACIFIC

It was generally agreed that Asia, in comparison with the rest of the world, has now become an area of political stability coupled with economic dynamism. This dynamism offers real challenges with the trade imbalances which have created domestic problems both in the United States and Europe. If these imbalances and the increasing pressures for protectionism are not brought under control there will be increasing problems for all countries.

The Pacific now represents one fifth of the world economy and U.S. trade with Asia is now 25% greater than with Europe. Noncommunist East Asia has achieved 6% real GNP growth in 1984 and probably will achieve 5% in 1985 compared with 3-4% elsewhere in the world. Inflation was only 4-5% contrasted with 13% worldwide. Nevertheless, the Pacific will have to create one third of a billion new jobs required by the end of the century to maintain a satisfactory economy.

While there is a relatively strong democratic process in the region, many Pacific countries face major problems in the peaceful transfer of power and the Philippines stands out as a country with a serious succession problem compounded by economic difficulties. Indonesia with the growing needs of its 125 million people must also be watched carefully.

Indochina continues to be a source of great concern with the Soviet forward deployments in the area and their support of Vietnam's military efforts in Kampuchea. The Korean peninsula remains as a serious flashpoint of danger with North Korea continuing to give us mixed signals on its intentions. A conflict here would have serious global as well as regional implications.

The emerging Pacific Islands while generally pro-West in their political orientation are increasingly vulnerable economically and susceptible to the expected drying up of development funds over the next year and a half. New Caledonia could prove to be a destabilizing factor in the area with its insurgency.

In addressing China several important points emerged. China has obviously shifted from an adversarial role in its relations with the West but we cannot be assured of its permanency. Several Southeast Asian countries perceive China to be a greater long-range threat in Asia than the U.S.S.R. China is not yet a superpower but at the same time cannot be defeated by another power given its great size and strength. The direction of the Chinese transition remains uncertain and this will continue to be an unsettling factor.

The Hong Kong situation was discussed at some length and how it is handled will be indicative of China's ability to tolerate a "foreign body" with a non-communist tradition while ultimately resolving its relationship with Taiwan.

While Japan is viewed as a strong stabilizing influence in the region with its economy, there has been a hesitancy in the recent past to take new initiatives externally in the political area. There is now more active involvement in the international community and a growing recognition of the fact that policies must be developed compatible with Japan's international responsibilities.

The change in government in New Zealand with its anti-nuclear policy barring nuclear armed ships into its ports can be politically destabilizing and is a real threat to the Australia-New Zealand-U.S. Alliance (ANZUS) and ultimately to the security balance in the region since the New Zealand policy could easily be manipulated by the Soviets to their advantage. Reference was made in this connection to the increasing influence of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) in the region. Australia also has serious concerns about the potential destabilizing effects of recent New Zealand action on their own policies.

The recent election in Canada reflects major policy changes. There will be a more assertive trading policy in the Pacific region. The Government will also be more sympathetic to U.S. policy positions and the NATO commitment.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC TRENDS IN EUROPE

Considerable pessimism was expressed over the political and economic situation in Europe variously described as "stagnation" and "Euro-sclerosis" as contrasted to the more dynamic trends in Asia. A more optimistic view was presented by one parliamentarian who called attention to the swing to the right in most European countries along with a return to the free enterprise system. He also called attention to the Europeans' strong desire to continue talks with the Soviets, particularly on arms reduction. He expressed the view that rarely have the leaders of the free world been as united as they are today.

It was pointed out by an American economist that Europe has been able to create only one sixth of the new enterprises as compared to the U.S., although Europe has potentially larger internal markets. The job market in Europe is also down as compared to the U.S. and Japan, while non-tariff barriers are on the increase. On the more positive side, European economic infrastructures remain strong.

On the political side there is concern that the anti-nuclear movement will build up again. Much is going to depend on what happens in Geneva, and how the U.S.S.R. manipulates the talks for its own political and psychological objectives. This movement can also spill over in Japan when the public "nuclear allergy" is strong. Previously the nuclear opposition in Japan had a strong impact in Europe. The situation is now reversed. The interference of the U.S.S.R. in the anti-nuclear movement is a very sensitive matter in Japan.

There is also growing concern about the attitudes of the successor generation in respect to the widespread "nuclear allergy" in Europe. Sensitivity to their attitudes is important and more must be done to educate them on world realities.

The perceived shift by Europeans of U.S. interest from the Atlantic to the Pacific community has been of increasing concern to them. Will disillusionment with Europe contribute to this shift? Reference was made to the Eagleburger statement and other recent manifestations of this perceived shift.

There are pragmatic problems on burden sharing in the defense field with countries unable to achieve the 3% goal due to internal economic requirements. The U.S. should be more aware of these difficulties. The U.S. should also give more credit to European efforts to respond (i.e. the FRG has now agreed to extend the draft for a longer period). The Europeans are often doing more than they get credit for.

There is deep concern about the European economy in the American Congress as a result of slow growth and unemployment. Can Europe compete effectively with the U.S. and Japan? The current impression is that Europe is in real trouble with its Common Market, lack of mobility and innovation. There is also concern over the present condition of NATO and the lack of a viable common strategy to deal with the U.S.S.R. Most Europeans believe it is possible to work with the Soviets. Most Americans do not and this will create real problems. Americans also feel that NATO should go beyond the European region and become more global. Europeans do not.

Sixty percent of U.S. voters have little or no concern about what happens beyond their borders. Americans increasingly are looking inward because of the perception that no one cares what the U.S. does. Little money, therefore, is likely to flow from Congress for development assistance.

Great concern exists in Europe about the Nunn-Roth Amendment and its effect. An American legislator stated that while he is a strong supporter of NATO, many Congressmen feel that NATO must now evolve with the changing conditions. Europeans need to do more to fund their own defense with conventional weapons in the eighties and to encourage this he believes it was essential to cut U.S. support in the face of inadequate burden sharing. This is what the Nunn-Roth Amendment was all about even though it was defeated by only eight votes. Europeans must meet the 3% requirement for their own defense. There is a great need to look at the long-term implications of security both with NATO, Japan and other allies. The time has come to determine where alliances will take us.

It was pointed out in rebuttal that European countries often have their own constituency problems and undue pressure by the U.S. would not help. Political leaders have to listen to their peace movement leaders. It is also important to understand that Europeans pay a great deal for their own defense and much of this goes for U.S. weapons.

SECURITY CHALLENGES

There is greater unity in East Asia and the Pacific than with NATO. There is also now greater stability in Asia following a long period of strife. The major problem confronting the region is the Soviet military build-up and the implication of their forward deployments to future peace and stability. At the same time the Soviets have not been able to achieve very much politically in the region and the general stability and interdependence of the countries in the area have been positive factors. Cambodia has been a questionable venture for the Soviets. The Soviets have not been able to penetrate the Asian market because of the low quality of their products. Instead they have turned to military power and have increased their forward deployments in the area since 1969. There is now a permanent Soviet presence in Vietnam as well as in Yemen and Ethiopia.

It was generally agreed that the parliamentarians must face up to the security realities. The U.S. commitment was viewed as impressive and provides its allies in the Pacific with greater flexibility. At the same time there was a feeling that the U.S. had not been a "good salesman" on these realities. The view was expressed on the European side that they should get a better handle on the Pacific region and make a special effort themselves to reach their constituencies on the security problems and the importance of the region.

The following factors were cited in the ensuing dicussion as the most significant in respect to the security situation:

The Soviets have achieved nuclear parity with the United States, Britain and France.

The end of U.S.-China hostility has freed the United States from a two-front challenge, while the Soviets still face that problem.

The Soviet military and naval projection into the Pacific without having to draw down its forces in Europe, included: (1) a daily presence of 20 or more ships in Vietnamese waters including submarines, and up to 10 bombers operating out of CamRanh Bay; (2) 162 SS20's in the Far East out of a total of 387; (3) SSBN's operating throughout the Pacific; (4) the Soviet Far Eastern fleet which is now its largest representing one fourth of Soviet naval strength (88 surface combatants, and 126 submarines with one-half nuclear powered); (5) 80 Backfire bombers and more than 3,000 combat aircraft; (6) 52 divisions today on the PRC border compared to 20 in 1965.

The Soviets are not in a position to challenge the Japanese straits and other Pacific sea-lanes of commerce. If they were to achieve a base in the South Pacific the military balance in the region could be seriously destabilized.

Pacific security arrangements comparable to NATO are not forseeable or necessarily required. Expanded cooperation and coordination on defense requirements, however, is essential. There are a wide variety of security perceptions in the Pacific as compared with Europe, particularly as to whether China or the Soviet Union is the primary longer-term threat. It is increasingly clear that New Zealand's ship visit posture, if maintained, will have important political effects in Japan and elsewhere, and will seriously impair the U.S. capability to meet its security commitments throughout the Pacific.

To counter the "head-in-the-sand" and unrealistic attitudes regarding defense needs in the face of these new threats, it was urged that more be done to inform the successor generation and to reach "the hearts and minds" of larger, disinterested publics. It would be essential to face up to the realities.

There was a general feeling that electorates generally are not very knowledgeable on defense requirements and the need for a nuclear deterrent. Military strength is not enough without public support. Fears of conflict are being exploited by the U.S.S.R. and they are moving in by default. We must not overlook the psychological factor. One Congressman stated that he was frustrated about our inability to cope with the "hearts and minds" challenge. We need a special coordinated effort, perhaps beginning with leadership groups such as the parliamentarians. It would be necessary to publicize our positions more effectively in the future so that we do not continue to lose the successor generation.

ATLANTIC-PACIFIC INTERRELATIONSHIPS

The past decade has seen a major change in the relationships among the developed democracies of Western Europe, the United States, Canada, Japan, Australia and New Zealand. The global strategic picture now requires a serious review of the interrelationships between the Atlantic and Pacific and the impact of troubles in other parts of the world such as the Middle East and Central America. The preeminent bond between the advanced democracies is the preservation of world peace.

While NATO will remain the fundamental Western security alliance, it is now being supplemented by a 19-nation de facto combination—the 16 NATO countries plus Japan, Australia and New Zealand. How the relationship evolves will depend on how the parliaments see common problems and opportunities.

It was generally agreed that it would be useful and essential to examine Atlantic-Pacific interrelationships more closely for a number of reasons. The Soviet military buildup in both areas along with the global nuclear threat make such an examination imperative. The threat of escalations to the nuclear level makes security increasingly indivisible. There is also a common interest in maintaining access to the Persian Gulf given common oil requirements. There is also the burden-sharing problem of defense to be resolved in both areas. Failure to act in concert results in tensions and division. Close cooperation, such as the implementation of the missile deployments to Western Europe after the 1979 NATO division, add strength and solidarity.

Economically, the Atlantic faces the attraction of and competition with a dynamic Pacific. There is obviously a common interest in working out the recessive effects of high interest rates and budget deficits, and there is the crucial need to avoid a reversion to protectionism. There is also a crucial need for understanding and cooperation in technology transfer. It was generally agreed that the need for protection of military technology should not be used as a cloak for protectionism among allies. The great challenge for the U.S. will be to create a two-way street with our allies in terms of economic as well as security needs and interests.

While the majority of the conferees recognized the need to broaden the parliamentary consultation to cover Atlantic and Pacific problems and issues, there was some expression of concern on the North Atlantic Assembly side about going beyond the European area given the inter-regional complexities. Others present took the position that security as well as trade and economics are now a global affair. Also, the dynamism of the Pacific region requires attention in the Atlantic if the Atlantic community is to compete in the region. The economic takeoff in the Pacific involves all of us.

CONCLUSION

The final session of the conference was devoted to a summation of the conference proceedings. The conferees agreed that such exchanges on a continuing basis at the parliamentary level would be of great importance in arriving at a better understanding of each other's points of view. The Pacific Forum and the Atlantic Council of the United States were congratulated for their efforts to initiate the first Pacific Caucus. One European leader stated that the new challenges of the Pacific make it essential to learn more about the area, while another European parliamentarian commented that he now has a better understanding of the region. Another participant referred to an underlying theme of the conference—the need to start thinking in a more global sense, while a Japanese legislator called on his colleagues to accept global as well as regional responsibilities in the future. An American declared that the U.S. could not feel secure unless there was a clear understanding between the Atlantic and the Pacific. NATO is no longer just the Atlantic and it must go beyond to discuss other regions. An Australian delegate asserted that meetings such as the Pacific Caucus are necessary since we are individual democracies going our different ways. We also need such meetings to learn and to counter the lack of information, particularly with the successor generation. An American Congressman declared that the meeting had been very useful to his own thinking and should be continued. He stated that what has been accomplished by the Pacific Caucus is very important in stimulating a timely Atlantic-Pacific dialogue.

There was agreement that the next Caucus should take place in Hawaii in January 1986 with succeeding meetings at least on a biannual basis. It was further suggested that the meeting be kept small with basically the same parliamentary representation and format. One observer each may be invited, however, from the Republic of Korea, Taiwan, ASEAN, and the South Pacific Forum. The Pacific Forum, in cooperation with the Atlantic Council of the United States, would again be responsible for organizing the Caucus and would work with the parliamentarians in developing specific themes and the agenda for discussion. It was also agreed that a labor economist should be one of the speakers addressing the next Caucus.●

BUSINESS INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO CITY-WIDE COLLEGE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement in the U.S. Department of Education, Dr. Donald J. Senese, was in my city of Chicago recently to deliver an address at the opening of new facilities in downtown Chicago for the Business Institute of Chicago City-Wide College.

Dr. Senese's remarks, which focused on the importance of businesses and community colleges working together to bring about economic growth and development for urban areas like Chicago, are both timely and informative. His speech, entitled "Business and Community Colleges: A Healthy Partnership for Individual and Economic Development," which I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues, follows at this point in the RECORD:

BUSINESS AND COMMUNITY COLLEGES: A HEALTHY PARTNERSHIP FOR INDIVIDUAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Good afternoon. I am very pleased to have the opportunity to be here in my hometown of Chicago and to participate in this open house celebrating the second year and the opening of the new facilities for the Business Institute of City-Wide College.

The programs of City-Wide College are playing—and will continue to play—an imporant role in the economic development of Chicago.

I have been impressed with the current activities and the future plans of the Business Institute under the leadership of Chancellor Salvatore Rotella, President Mark Warden and Director Sandra Foster.

I am also aware of the fine work being accomplished on the southside of Chicago at Olive-Harvey College under the direction of the Dean of the Skills Center Jack Steward. As a native of the southside, I am aware of the economic problems of that area and have been impressed with the leadership shown to provide the short-term training necessary for entry level employment. Such activities develop one of our most important resources—the human resource. This type of program on the southside aids human and economic development. In providing tuition waivers, education and training, and placement assistance with businesses it demonstrates that progress can be made by providing facilities and resources. Hopefully, there will be a greater commitment by State and local government as well as businesses to advance these types of programs.

This Business Institute deserves our careful attention and support for it is doing an outstanding job in helping people and assisting the economic development of Chicago.

I would like to spend a few minutes talking about the importance of such efforts as the Business Institute.

There are many factors affecting workers today. As the impact of our entry into the what is being called the "Information Age" begins to be felt in the workplace, the role of post-high school educational institutions will become increasingly significant.

An "education" in the traditional sense is already becoming a thing of the past; education is rapidly becoming, if it is not already, a lifetime pursuit.

As the workplace shifts and adjusts to meet the demands of ever-changing requirements, it will be difficult to predict job needs of the future—some jobs which exist today will be eliminated, or at least dramatically revamped, while other jobs will be developed. It is likely that this shifting pattern of job and/or careers will continue to expand and become a way of life in the 21st century.

Up to the present decade the education and training which one took in preparation for a career would prepare that individual, with perhaps occasional updating, for a lifetime in that career. It was true with my father who spent over 40 years as a truck driver in Chicago. It is estimated that with our changing economy that training for many careers in the near future will last only 10 to 15 years.

Recognizing the need to learn more about the current nature and the extent of partnerships which already exist, while at the same time encouraging the building of such partnerships, the Office of Vocational and Adult Education of the U.S. Education Department funded a study which was conducted by the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges and the Association of Community College Trustees.

This study examined existing partnerships between community, technical, and junior colleges with business, industry, and high schools.

Many of you here today are probably already aware of the study since the City-Wide College was one of the respondents.

The final report has not yet been released; however, I have been able to review a draft. The title of the report, I think you will agree, is appropriate to the efforts being made in this area, "Keeping America Working."

Originally the title was going to be "Putting America Back to Work" but the real goal of the community junior college/business and industry partnerships which are being developed is to keep our workforce skilled, and on the job.

During a time of fluid job needs and requirements the idea is to have workers participating in ongoing education and training, building and adding to skills so that they are able to assume positions in new job areas without much, if any, loss of work time.

If as projected, a large segment of our population is going to need a career "retraining" every 10 to 15 years, we may need to prepare individuals for 3 or 4 career changes during their lifetime. This is a tremendous challenge but also an engaging opportunity for unique partnerships, new training programs, and innovative leadership at all levels.

The future role of community colleges such as Chicago City-Wide College in our society will be extremely significant.

Such colleges will not only serve as a source of training for those getting ready for the workplace or in preparation for more advanced education or training but as a place where "re-education" can take place. Community colleges can become vital centers providing the resources for a lifelong educative process. They will become the focal point of economic development for urban as well as suburban and rural areas.

Your college can serve as a catalyst between workers and business and industry and prevent disruptions in the workplace which would have serious, detrimental effects on our economy.

The community junior college is becoming a tremendously significant resource for business and industry, one which is important to their success.

New resources need to be sought to meet the demands. A two-way street between the community colleges and the business community and industries which they serve must be developed. Those in a position to create and implement programs need to cultivate this type of exchange. All of you here today can participate in this crucial task.

Upgrading skills, retraining before a person loses his or her job, is of extreme importance from the standpoint of the worker. An individual who thinks that what they are doing is becoming obsolete over and over again, and finds himself or herself with long stretches of unemployment, is bound to become demoralized not to mention the personal havoc such circumstances can bring to an individual's personal and family life. A steady job can aid in strengthening the family unit and will help prevent social unrest.

It is far more cost effective with the use of local community resources to take a preventive approach so that workers will be kept on the job.

This is not an easy assignment but I know that you are already committed to that goal. There is no doubt that those who have accepted this challenge do not face an easy task. I know that the Business Institute is dedicated to working in this area, and it already has a good track record. For example, your Small Business Development Center where you provide training and counseling to small businesses, and its Federal Contract Procurement Center which has already been effective in creating new jobs in the community is an important resource on the small business level. You are also involved in impressive vocational training programs.

Open communication between colleges and business/industry partners was stressed as a key factor in successful partnerships in the earlier report I mentioned. I see this as an important element of your Training Development Referral Center. While I know this program is still in the planning stages it will fill an important need in your community once it has become a reality, and I commend your foresight in embarking on such a venture. You will be combining business resources with your own to provide an important means of assistance for workers.

We had many reports on the condition of American education over the last two years. One such report, highly praised by President Ronald Reagan, focused on the issue we are discussing today. This report, entitled "America's Competitive Challenge" came from thoughtful consideration by the Business Higher Education Forum. "America's Competitive Challenge" urged that each segment of society—business, education, labor, and government—perform those parts of the overall effort for which it is best suited and to enter into new cooperative alliances when necessary.

This is exactly what you are doing here at the Business Institute of Chicago City-Wide College. I commend your efforts and wish all of you—Chancellor Rotella, President Warden and Director Foster and your fine staff—every success in your efforts. A lot of people—and the continued economic development of Chicago—are depending on you and your allies.●

MAJOR LEAGUE SPORTS COMMUNITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to modify and clarify the application of the antitrust laws to professional sports leagues. In recent years, following a successful antitrust suit by the Los Angeles Raiders football team against the National Football League allowing the team's move from Oakland, chaos has reigned over franchises in many sports leagues. Teams have felt free to pull up roots in one community, often after years of enjoying that cities' loyalty and support, and relocate in another site. In addition to the Raiders' move last year, the Baltimore Colts have headed for Indianapolis and serious consideration has been given by the Philadelphia Eagles, the St. Louis Cardinals, and the New Orleans Saints to relocating.

Moves in basketball include the Buffalo Braves to San Diego, the New Orleans Jazz to Salt Lake City, the San Diego Clippers to Los Angeles last year, and the Kansas City Kings now have their eye on Sacramento, CA. In hockey, the teams have also been playing musical chairs—the Atlanta Flames to Calgary, the Colorado Rockies from Kansas City to Denver and then to New Jersey, and now the league faces a $60 million antitrust suit for refusing to allow the St. Louis Blues to move. The stability of the leagues has been shattered and many communities and fans have suffered.

My legislation—the Major League Sports Community Protection Act of 1985—will allow the professional sports leagues to make and enforce internal rules in three areas without fear of antitrust suits by disgruntled league members or other parties.

Those three areas of permissible league control are: One, decisions that member clubs shall not relocate from their existing home territory; two, rules for the sharing of league revenues among the members in a manner that promotes comparable economic opportunities for each; and three, rules governing the selection or termination of the ownership of member clubs so long as these rules apply equally to all league members.

Freedom in these areas from antitrust suits by the teams and others, will allow the leagues to regain control over their members in location matters and restore stability without imposing Federal regulation over professional sports. This is in sharp contrast to many of the other pending bills on this matter. They would create Federal standards to govern professional sports team movement and in some even mandate expansion by the leagues to particular cities.

In keeping this legislation's scope narrow, the bill explicitly states that it does not apply to any labor-management or collective bargaining matter or to any broadcasting issue. The bill is carefully drafted not to immunize the leagues from any antitrust suits raised by competing sports leagues of the Federal Government. And the bill does not pertain to professional baseball. Baseball's current antitrust immunity is not affected.●

TRIBUTE TO HON. JAMES C. KIRKPATRICK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a few minutes today to pay special tribute to a great Missourian. Back in 1960 I had the opportunity to meet a friend of my father's. It was during a political campaign. That gentleman's name was James C. Kirkpatrick. James Kirkpatrick, or Jim, or "the Jolly Green Giant," because of his Irish heritage as he is so very warmly known, has just retired from 20 years of public service as my State's, the State of Missouri's, politician, with a record that has made people green with envy because of his popularity. He has retired after 20 years as our secretary of state.

Mr. Speaker, during his tenure in office, which was longer than any other secretary of state in Missouri's history, he made friends, he gained respect, and he had people of both political parties attesting to the fact that he was truly an outstanding public servant.

His popularity is attested by the fact that in his last reelection bid in 1980 he received over 1,300,000 votes, the most for any candidate or ballot issue in Missouri's history. As one of his friends—and also I might point out the fact that he is a constituent of mine now residing in Johnson County, MO—it gives me great pleasure to have asked for this special order for him, my friend, Jim Kirkpatrick.

One of Jim's major successes shows up in the number of registered voters in Missouri. Jim was responsible for an ongoing registration drive which in 1976 gave Missouri a 12-percent increase in the number of voters, the largest in the country.

Another one of Jim Kirkpatrick's successes was in saving money for the State of Missouri. Programs under his office were streamlined, such as records management and archive services and the computer output microfilm service which saved Missourians over $10 million.

Jim Kirkpatrick handled his terms of office with ease and with self-confidence. However, some of the changes he undertook, such as changing the color of the Missouri State Manual from the traditional color of blue to green because of his Irish heritage, undoubtedly got the "Irish up" of some people.

I would like to take this opportunity to publicly thank James C. Kirkpatrick, our friend, my constituent, a great Missourian, for his service through the years. I am also submitting some editorials that I wish to share with the Members of this body. I wish to insert an editorial written by Kim Sexton in the Blue Springs Examiner entitled "Farewell—and Heartfelt Thanks;" an editorial from the Independence Examiner, which is entitled "Missouri Will Miss Jim Kirkpatrick;" an editorial from the Jefferson City Tribune, entitled "Kirkpatrick Retires After Setting Records;" and an editorial entitled "Newspaperman Kirkpatrick Never Forgot From Whence He Came," from the Missouri Press Association News:

[From the Blue Springs Examiner]

FAREWELL—AND HEARTFELT THANKS

How many politicians are really loved by the electorate? I can think of one, and he's leaving office Monday.

There will never be another Jimmy Kirkpatrick, who is retiring as secretary of state. His five terms set a new record for longevity in office, and that fact alone is solid evidence of what Missourians thought of him.

We expect elected officials to operate cost-efficient offices, but Kirkpatrick has been one of the few to do it consistently.

The many steps he has taken to streamline the office and reform our election laws has saved Missourians far more than his office has cost us.

There surely never has been a friendlier public official than the Irishman by choice dressed in green. He has traveled through the Show-Me State far more than necessary to seek guidance from the voters.

The state's chief election official, who was so effective that legislators gave him additional management, archives and commercial code enforcement responsibilities, was successful in his many attempts to promote statewide voter registration. In 1976, Missouri led the nation with a 12 percent gain. The 1,366,466 votes cast for Kirkpatrick in 1980 were more than any for a candidate or issue in our history.

Outside of Harry Truman, I doubt there has been a Missourian more loyal to the Democratic party, but he was more than an outstanding human being who worked with Republican leaders who were dedicated to progress. There are a lot of Kirkpatrick fans among Republican officials. One is Roy Blunt, who will succeed Kirkpatrick.

As a third generation newspaperman, I was especially proud of the well-written documents and Official Manuals produced by the former 34-year veteran journalist and newspaper owner.

He loved the Missourians he served, too, and it is a wonderful thing that they will be able to visit him in a replica of the secretary of state's office that is being constructed in the library in the Ward Edwards Building on the campus of Central Missouri State University. That's in his new hometown of Warrensburg.

Thank you Honorable James C. Kirkpatrick for the unparalleled career that gave us a better Missouri and proved you were right when you said many times:

"Good business in government is also good politics."

[From the Independence Examiner]

MISSOURI WILL MISS JIM KIRKPATRICK

"Prompt, courteous, and accurate service." Could be the slogan of any business. In this case it's the secretary of state's office, and the slogan is no puffery.

Jim Kirkpatrick leaves that office after five terms Monday. He leaves it in superb shape.

A Scot who loves anything Irish or green, Kirkpatrick will be missed.

As the state's chief elections official since 1965, Kirkpatrick has led the way in boosting voter registration and simplifying and standardizing election laws.

At a time when government cries for more tax dollars, Kirkpatrick supervises 11 divisions of state government that together earned the state $2.52 for every $1 budgeted for those divisions in 1984.

He narrowly missed his goal of having 3 million people registered to vote in 1984; in 1976 Missouri led the nation with a 12 percent gain in registering voters.

A Democrat with a background in newspapers, Kirkpatrick purged the state manual and other documents of bureaucratic lingo.

It's likely that Kirkpatrick's successor will usher through a change Kirkpatrick has fought for: a campaign finance reporting law with the teeth to adequately punish violators.

KIRKPATRICK RETIRES AFTER SETTING RECORDS

(By Don Norfleet)

Although he's enjoyed his long service to Missouri, Secretary of State James C. Kirkpatrick looks forward to leaving public office.

"I can't wait until it's over. But I have always enjoyed serving the public," Kirkpatrick says.

During his 20 years in office, Kirkpatrick set a record for serving the longest consecutive terms of any statewide elected official in Missouri. Kirkpatrick took his first oath of office as Missouri secretary of state on January 11, 1965.

Kirkpatrick not only has served the longest, he also holds the record for the most career votes of any Missouri politician. Over the years, Kirkpatrick has received an amazing total of 8,462,469 votes in Missouri primary and general election campaigns, more than any other Missourian.

In his last election in 1980, Kirkpatrick set a record when 1,366,466 Missourians voted for him. At the time the vote total was the largest ever recorded in Missouri for any candidate or ballot issue.

Kirkpatrick plans to go home to Warrensburg when his term ends on January 14. But even in retirement, Kirkpatrick will have plenty of memories of his office he has occupied for 20 years on the second floor of the Capitol.

Central Missouri State University at Warrensburg has constructed a virtually exact duplicate of Kirkpatrick's Capitol office.

The hundreds of Irish mememtos that dominate Kirkpatrick's office also will be sent to the new Warrensburg office along with the furniture. The cost of duplicating the office, university officials say, will come from private donations.

A 1929 graduate of CMSU, Kirkpatrick is now a member of the university's foundation board of directors. He'll speak to political science classes at the university and help the university any way he can.

More than 20 years ago, Kirkpatrick picked green as his campaign color. Since then he became known as a professional Irishman. It has reached a point where he now must wear green each day of his life or people will ask: "Where's the green?"

Kirkpatrick says the most fun he had as secretary of state came every two years when he made some color changes on the state manual, mainly from blue to green. In doing so, Kirkpatrick upset a long tradition in state government. The state manual had become known as the "Blue Book."

His first manual in 1966 was traditional blue, the same as previous manuals but perhaps a slightly darker blue. But in 1968 Kirkpatrick changed the manual to light blue and placed a full color seal on the front, including a touch of green. With the next manual in 1970 Kirkpatrick grew bolder, switching the color of the book to dark green with a touch of black and gold. That caused a serious political furor, fanned by traditionalists who wanted their collection of "Blue Books" to remain blue.

The next manual in 1972 was black and gold in honor of the colors of the University of Missouri. That still didn't satisfy critics. In 1972 Kirkpatrick decided to return to a green cover, but with a touch of blue. Then in 1976, Kirkpatrick made the manual red, white and blue in honor of the nation's Bicentennial. Since 1978 the state manual has been various shades of green with a touch of black and gold.

Although he was the state's most popular vote getter, Kirkpatrick says he never wanted to be governor. A good governor, Kirkpatrick knows, must be able to say no to many demands.

But as secretary of state, Kirkpatrick usually could say yes. That difference in roles is what makes Jimmy smile.

A governor can serve only eight years, but a secretary of state can serve as long as he can get re-elected. No doubt the jovial Irishman could have stayed in office as long as he wished.

Kirkpatrick often said he has the best job in state government. But after 20 years, Kirkpatrick is more than ready to retire. On June 15, he will be 80 years old. "It's time," he says with a broad smile, "to have some fun."

NEWSPAPERMAN KIRKPATRICK "NEVER FORGOT FROM WHENCE HE CAME . . ."

(By Tom Warden)

From my earliest recollections of this business of newspapering—and that goes back 30 years or more—I have been suspicious of politicians.

The suspicion, in reality, is perhaps somewhat unfounded. I have known politicians and public officials who were scoundrels of the first order. And I have known others who were first-rate individuals.

It is their lot to receive at times excessive publicity for their deeds and misdeeds, and we all tend to be wary of any apples that come from a barrel in which a few bad ones reside. This kind of generalizing tends to paint all politicians and public servants in a less-than-favorable light. And that really isn't fair to those who are decent people trying to give their best to a thankless job.

Throughout most of my association with newspapermen and politicians—the two seem inseparable—my faith and belief in the political system has been buoyed by one man whose credentials as a public servant have been impeccable.

In my humble opinion, he could have been elected to any state office to which he aspired. But he shunned the lure of higher office, and derived immense satisfaction from the office to which he was elected in November 1964—Secretary of State. He took office the following Jan. 11, and has since been re-elected four times. His return to office in 1980 produced the largest single vote total that any candidate or ballot issue has ever received in Missouri's history.

And James C. Kirkpatrick deserved that show of appreciation from Show-Me State voters. For in his 20 years as a public servant, he "showed 'em" that politics could be honorable if honorable men were elected to office . . . that honesty and decency indeed did exist in the halls of government.

My first encounter with this great and humble man, if my memory serves me, was in 1954 when I was a student in the University of Missouri-Columbia School of Journalism. Another student and I were sent to participate in some "hands-on" newspapering at the Windsor Review, a fine publication edited by Mr. Kirkpatrick.

Although I had had "hands-on" everything in a newspaper shop from the broom to the Linotype in my earlier years of apprenticeship in the craft, my time at the Review was rewarding and memorable. Most of all, it started what was to become a lifelong friendship with a man who was and is to this day a newspaperman first, a public servant second.

I suspect that during his 20 years of service as Secretary of State—an uninterrupted interval unrivaled by any of his 30 predecessors in the office—Jim Kirkpatrick treated his political constitutents as he had treated his newspaper subscribers: with the respect anyone deserves who provides you with your daily bread.

His tenure in the vineyard of newspapering no doubt prepared him for those two decades as Secretary of State. He never forgot from whence he came, and his ties to the profession and to newspaper people were never strained because of his ascendency to high state office.

These thoughts were prompted by a note from Jim this week, reminding me that he is retiring at the end of this term and will soon be Citizen Kirkpatrick instead of Secretary of State Kirkpatrick.

He will be sorely missed in the academy of politics, because he gave to that calling those qualities of honesty and fairness and concern that are frequently absent in the human species and particularly in many who are in the public eye.

Jim is probably the best-known, most-respected man in Missouri. In his two decades of public service, he has traveled throughout the state to give speeches wherever he was invited. No town was too small to host his presence; no person was too common to receive his handshake.

Oh, I could write volumes about Jim Kirkpatrick, and I hope someday some wise man will do just that. For his tenure in office should be a college primer in political science, his record a model for anyone seeking public office.

My Irish friend made the color green synonymous with his office; Missouri's Official Manual, the "Blue Book," acquired the color green under his tutorage. And he is fond of Irish wit and wisdom.

In his farewell note, Jim ended with this thought: "As the Irish are wont to say, 'May the hinges of our friendship never grow rusty'." Those of us who love him will see to it that they remain well oiled as a small token of respect for someone who gave a large measure of respectability to the profession of politics.

Someone has likened a person's life to the splash a pebble makes when it is dropped into a pool of water . . . making a few waves and then disappearing forever. Maybe so. But Jim Kirkpatrick's waves washed upon many shores; and they will leave ripples of confidence in government for decades to come. Fare thee well, my friend.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, at this moment I yield to my good friend from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I thank him for taking this opportunity to render some well-deserved remarks in honor of our great secretary of state of Missouri, Jim Kirkpatrick.

As an avid student of our Nation's history and of the people who have, over the years, played noteworthy roles in its Government, I often long for those days when our Federal and State governments were filled with what I call true "characters." By true characters I mean those individuals who brought to public service not only competence and dedication, but also a sense of humor and a degree of personality.

We in the Congress have had our share of these individuals, including many Missourians such as the great Thomas Hart Benton, Carl Schurz, and Harry Truman. I am convinced that the Congress has been better off today as a result of the service of those individuals.

Likewise, in the great State of Missouri, we have a history filled with such individuals, and it, too, is a better place because of them. Today we are here to honor one of Missouri's most recent and best loved "characters."

For the past 20 years, Missourians have been served by a secretary of state whose name was indeed synonymous with the office itself. This man, Jim Kirkpatrick, is virtually unrivaled in the State of Missouri in his popularity, the personal regard in which he is held by political friends, and I would say he really has no foes, and in the respect that he has gained as an elected public official.

In the course of his political career, he has received more votes than any other Missourian in history. His most recent reelection in 1980 resulted in a new record for the number of votes cast for any individual candidate. I would venture to say that he has also given more speeches than any living Missourian.

In short, Jim Kirkpatrick's record speaks for itself. With that record, he has now retired from the secretary of state's office, leaving a legacy that not only he, but all Missourians can be proud of. Today, as Jim Kirkpatrick enjoys a well-deserved rest, I join my colleagues as well as millions of Missourians in wishing him the best and in thanking him for the untold contributions that he has made.

As he travels the roads of Missouri now, he can do so with a sense of pride and satisfaction that only a very few special individuals deserve and have earned as Jim Kirkpatrick has earned.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. SKELTON. I thank the gentleman so much for his very kind words about our friend, Jim Kirkpatrick.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I ask that the statements of our colleagues be included in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection.

Mr. SKELTON. Suffice it to say, Jim Kirkpatrick is a great Missourian and a great American. A number of years ago, a good friend of mine, the sheriff of Lafayette County in Lexington, once said that the best politics is doing a good job. Jim Kirkpatrick epitomizes the very essence of good politics because he has done an excellent job for the people of the State of Missouri for 20 years. We are proud of him; we are proud of the record he made. We are proud of the friends that he made.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that he is now a constituent within the Fourth Congressional District, and all of us join in wishing him and his charming wife many, many happy and wonderful years ahead.

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor James C. Kirkpatrick. Mr. Kirkpatrick ably served the State of Missouri as secretary of state for 20 years.

His achievements during his tenure as secretary of state are many: Statewide voter registration; overhauling the election code of the State; computerization of the Corporation and Uniform Commercial Code records and numerous other accomplishments that have assisted the State.

Jim's service to the State did not begin with his election to the post of secretary of state. Jim served as a newspaperman and editor with several Missouri papers. Later, he was appointed to the board of regents at Central Missouri State University and served as board president for 10 of the 12 years of his membership.

His sponsorship of the development of Missouri's highway system won him the honor of having his name inscribed on the scroll of honor by the Missouri Good Roads & Streets Association. He was subsequently cited as one of six outstanding Missourians by the State highway department because of his devotion to modern highways.

Jim's other accomplishments are many. His service to the State's Democratic Party have earned him several awards. Perhaps more important than the awards is the support that the people of Missouri have given him. Although he has never been a candidate for another office, his career total of 8,462,469 primary and general election votes is the largest ever accorded a Missourian. He twice set a Democratic record by carrying the city of St. Louis and 108 counties in the general elections of 1976 and 1980.

Jim's absence from the office he so ably held will be felt by all. I know I share the feelings of many Missourians in the thanking him for his service and wishing him well in his future endeavors.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Jim is not only a public official who has rendered superior service to the State of Missouri; he is an institution. His legacy as one of Missouri's finest secretaries will be remembered in history books as a man who was an exemplary public official, a statesman who devoted his life to public service for the betterment of the State.

As an individual, I have never met a finer man than Jim Kirkpatrick. Throughout all of my years as a State official, I always knew Jim had an open-door policy that would enable me to enter freely, knowing he would at least listen to my opinions and concerns.

The people of Missouri elected Jim to office time and time again. That act in itself is a tribute to the caliber of man that he is.●

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join with my distinguished colleagues in tribute to a great Missourian, the Honorable James C. Kirkpatrick, on the occassion of his retirement from public office.

James C. Kirpatrick has served the citizens of Missouri as the secretary of state for the past two decades and in so doing, Secretary Kirpatrick set many State records. He holds the record for continuous tenure in the office of secretary of state and in his last reelection, James Kirkpatrick set the record for total number of votes ever given to a candidate or ballot issue in Missouri, and achieved the highest number of total votes ever accorded any elected offical.

Today, we are grateful to James Kirkpatrick for his untiring efforts to improve services to the people of Missouri and his success in bringing technology into the functions of the office of secretary of state. Secretary Kirkpatrick established Missouri's first Records Management and Archives Service and the Computer Output Microfilm Service, both of which are credited with saving Missourians many millions of dollars. In addition, Secretary Kirkpatrick achieved statewide voter registration and implemented a complete overhaul of the election code.

As the 31st secretary of the State of Missouri, James Kirkpatrick established himself has a leader of wisdom and integrity and his productive contributions will continue to benefit Missourians for many years to come. James Kirkpatrick has given untiringly to the State of Missouri and he richly deserves our appreciation today. I am honored to have served in government during his tenure and I will certainly miss him many times in the years ahead. I wish Secretary Kirkpatrick a future blessed with health and happiness.●

● Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, last month marked an end to an era in Missouri politics. James C. Kirkpatrick—perhaps the most popular politician in the history of my State—resigned after 20 years as secretary of state of Missouri. The atmosphere in the halls of our State capitol is much different now without the presence of this friendly man with a gracious wit and an easy Irish charm. All Missourians will be saddened by his return to private life.

Mr. Kirkpatrick's tenure as secretary of state started on January 11, 1965. He won reelection 4 consecutive times and his 20 years of uninterrupted service is unrivaled by any of his 30 predecessors. In his last reelection in 1980, Mr. Kirkpatrick received 1,366,466 votes, the largest single vote total that any candidate or ballot issue has ever received in Missouri's history. And although Mr. Kirkpatrick was never a candidate for any other office, in his five elections he received 8,462,469 primary and general election votes, the largest ever received by a Missouri politician. A better testimony to a public servant's achievements in office has never been given.

Mr. Kirkpatrick brought to Missouri politics a wealth of honesty, fairness, and integrity. He demonstrated to Missourians time and again that honesty and integrity do exist in government. He shunned the limelight and the lure of higher office and concentrated on tasks that gave Missourians a better view of their government.

Fortunately, the most complete overhaul of the Missouri election code in this century occurred under his steady supervision. A better man could not have been chosen for the job. It was his efforts that brought about for the first time the publication of all administrative rules and regulations of State agencies. It was his initiative to institute a central office that would make campaign finance disclosure reports available to the public. It was his office that strengthened enforcement of the Uniform Securities Act to better protect Missouri investors.

Mr. Kirkpatrick is probably the best known and most respected man in Missouri. The list of laudatory citations, public service awards, and honorary appointments given to him is endless. Central Missouri State University awarded him the fourth honorary doctor of humane letters in the university's history in 1979. The Young Democratic Clubs of Missouri chose Mr. Kirkpatrick as the recipient of the first ever James A. Farley Award. While his star shined brightest in Missouri, he also achieved some national prominence. The National Association of Secretaries of State made him only the second Missourian to ever serve as president of the association. He was also a member of the first advisory panel to the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. Speaker, James C. Kirkpatrick won't easily be forgotten in Missouri politics. He literally left his personal imprint on the office of secretary of state. He made the color green synonymous with his office and it was during his tenure that Missouri's official manual turned from blue to green, and the manual is now fondly known as the Green Book.

But he leaves behind more than the color of this office. Etched in the memories of Missourians will be the memory of a man who seriously undertook the duties of his office and who never waived from his principles and his heritage.

In his two decades of public service, James Kirkpatrick exemplified the Irish love affair with words that dates back to the dawn of Ireland's history. During his tenure as secretary of state, he delivered 1,900 researched speeches throughout the State. No town was too small to host his presence; no person was too common to receive his handshake. Mr. Kirkpatrick always ended each of his speeches with an Irish blessing special to the occasion. In honor of Mr. Kirkpatrick,

I would like to offer a traditional Irish blessing to him:

May the road rise up to meet you,
May the wind be always at your back,
May the sun shine warm upon your face,
May the rain fall softly upon your fields,
And until we meet again,
May God hold you in the palm of his hands.●

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MARIE NEWTON SEPIA MEMORIAL SCHOLARSHIP FUND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BENNETT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, Marie Newton Sepia, who until her death in 1983 was a citizen of Jacksonville, FL, was a renowned leader in humanitarian movements, and among other important organizational offices, she was president of Pilot International, an outstanding international civic service organization. That organization has established the Marie Newton Sepia Memorial Scholarship Fund in her name as an honor to her for her activity in setting up scholarships for needy persons, both in the United States and abroad. The late Marie Newton Sepia's husband, M. Fred Sepia, is actively supporting the foundation in her memory. Innumerable organizations such as the Freedom Foundation at Valley Forge, the government of Guatemala, the Governors of several States, and President Ronald Reagan, have acclaimed Mrs. Sepia's work. The principal purpose of the Pilot International Foundation is in fact to ensure full citizenship for the handicapped in a scholarship program for teenage students preparing for careers and working with the handicapped. The guidelines and applications for such a study of assistance are handled by the Pilot International Foundation, Post Office Box 4844, Macon, GA 31213-0599.

The Foundation and its work are important, and I am honored that I have the privilege of representing the area where Mrs. Sepia became such an outstanding civic leader ultimately on an international level and where her husband carries on in this inspiring and very much needed work.

A BILL TO REPEAL THE RESIDENTIAL AND COMMERCIAL AND APARTMENT CONSERVATION SERVICES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RALPH M. HALL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD], in reintroducing legislation to repeal the residential and commercial and apartment conservation services. This bill is identical to legislation I introduced last Congress which served as the basis for a compromise that, while not perfect, would have been an important step toward recognizing that the best way to promote energy conservation is through the operation of the marketplace. Unfortunately, there was not sufficient time to resolve all of the outstanding issues with the Senate before Congress adjourned last fall, so we must now start afresh to repeal these two ineffective and burdensome programs.

I think we all can agree that the residential conservation service [RCS] and commercial and apartment conservation service [CACS] were created for laudatory purposes. These programs were enacted in reaction to unprecedented increases in energy prices. RCS and CACS were intended to help low- and moderate-income families to identify cost-effective conservation measures which would lower their energy bills.

But these well-intentioned programs have failed. The extensive hearings on RCS and CACS held last Congress by the Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power, of which I am a member, show that RCS and CACS are fundamentally unfair to the vast majority of America's utility ratepayers.

The audits that utilities are required to conduct are provided at a subsidized price. By law, utilities can only charge $15 for an RCS audit. The bulk of the costs, which may exceed $200 in certain regions of the country, are simply added to the utility bills of the 97 percent of utility ratepayers who do not participate in the RCS Program.

Who is in this exclusive group—3 percent—of ratepayers who benefit from the subsidized audits? Certainly it is not the low- or moderate-income groups. Studies have shown that the 3 percent of utility customers who request RCS audits are upper- and upper-middle income families. In this way, RCS transfers income from the poor, elderly and minorities to subsidize audits of the affluent.

What have we achieved with this extremely unfair program? Very little. The RCS Program has not successfully encouraged conservation.

Those who do participate in the program rarely install conservation devices. DOE's evaluation of RCS concluded that the differences between the rate of adopting conservation measures between RCS participants and nonparticipants are small.

This is not surprising. High energy prices have already spurred households to alter their behavior. Most cost-effective conservation measures are obvious and have been implemented by homeowners before they participate in the audits.

As a result, conservation measures encouraged by subsidized energy audits have not resulted in significant energy savings. RCS has only reduced national energy use by one-hundredth of 1 percent. The Department of Energy calculated that RCS participants saved only approximately 4 million British thermal units [MBtu] more than nonparticipants per year. Each of the 4 MBtu saved by RCS participants costs on average almost $84. This means that the RCS participants only saved 2.8 percent more than nonaudited utility customers for an annual savings of about $35. This is hardly cost-effective in light of the cost of the conservation measures and the cost of the RCS audit.

The notification requirement for the RCS program has expired, thus sunsetting this ineffective and unfair program. Nevertheless, this bill would make the technical change of removing the RCS language once and for all from the books.

The Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service Program suffers from the same flaws as the RCS Program and is likely to result in even greater inequities. Like RCS, CACS audits will subsidize the affluent at the expense of the poor and the elderly. The subsidy, however, will be even larger than that provided under RCS. Comprehensive energy audits of large or multitenant buildings are far more complicated and costly than audits provided for single family dwellings under RCS.

It is also likely that CACS will be even less effective than RCS. A landlord has little incentive to install conservation measures when the cost of utilities are passed on to renters. On the other hand, renters are unlikely to invest in modifications which will improve the value of their landlords' property and which will pay off over a period of time longer than the renters' tenancy is certain. Also, renters are unlikely to invest in measures whose effectiveness is contingent upon other renters adopting similar conservation measures. This is particularly true in light of the dismally low rates of participation likely to be encountered.

Further, as with RCS, the likelihood that those few who do participate will install conservation measures is quite small. The marketplace has already insured the implementation of cost-effective conservation measures. Businesses, owners, and entrepreneurs have a financial incentive to install cost-effective energy conservation measures. Lower utility bills enhance the value of commercial property.

Mr. Speaker, the best way to achieve energy conservation is not through the imposition of burdensome regulations and the Federal mandate of subsidized energy audits. An unfettered energy marketplace will achieve energy savings without the harm and exposure to ratepayers associated with RCS and CACS. We recognized this fact last Congress when the House voted for the compromise measure that would have repealed CACS.

For this reason, I urge my colleagues to support quick action on the legislation I am introducing today. CACS is only now getting off the ground. Timely consideration of this legislation will reduce utility charges currently scheduled to be billed consumers for the implementation and start-up of CACS. Under this bill, if enacted quickly, these charges will never be assessed. I cannot overemphasize the need to act quickly on this matter. We can still act to stop CACS before it too joins the ranks of those Federal programs acknowledged as unnecessary and burdensome, but almost impossible to stop.●

THE PEOPLE OF AMERICA HAVE SPOKEN AND THE SOUTH AFRICAN GOVERNMENT IS LISTENING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, the people of America have spoken out and the Government of South Africa is apparently listening. Just in the past few days, the Government of South Africa has offered Mandela his freedom in exchange for a pledge of nonviolent opposition to apartheid. A moratorium has been declared on the forcible relocation of certain black villagers to reserves. Although the moratorium is temporary, I cautiously view these signals to the American public as an acknowledgement of the sensitivity of the South African Government to world opinion, particularly U.S. opinion.

Much more needs to be done. The Government of South Africa has a treacherous road to travel. Today South Africa's 22 million blacks may exercise political rights only in 10 ethnically based homelands. This racial policy stems from the Native Lands Act of 1913 in which "homelands" or reserves for blacks were created out of land comprising about 13 percent of the Union of South Africa. Blacks were and still are forbidden to purchase land outside these reserves. In order to control the influx of blacks into the cities, many jobs such as mining, industry, and business were reserved for whites only. The system of racial segregation was institutionalized with the coming to power of the Nationalist Party in 1948. In addition to giving statutory blessing to racial discrimination, the Bantu Authorities Act of 1951 created "independent" states out of the tribal reserves to which the blacks of South Africa have been assigned according to tribal ethnicity. Upon being granted independence, the homeland becomes a state and all blacks who have tribal or ethnic associations with it are declared citizens. Millions have been forcibly removed from their homes to these reserves. The men who are fortunate enough to be allowed to travel from the homeland to the city for employment are in fact indentured servants. They work for low wages, are boarded in hostels and are prohibited from bringing their families with them. As my colleague, WALTER FAUNTROY observed, a most "antifamily policy."

One result is that the women, children, and elderly left behind in the homelands are often without means of supporting themselves in barren areas that yield little food or hope. In South Africa the infant mortality figures per 1,000 in 1982 were 12 for whites, 69 for urban blacks and 282 per thousand for rural blacks. The Government spends 10 times more on the education of white students than black students. In manufacturing, blacks' wages are less than 25 percent of the white average and in mining, whites earn almost 10 times more than blacks.

Through its policies of apartheid, the South African Government has institutionalized violence and bitterness. It is a political system in which a white minority of 4½ million governs a state that controls 87 percent of the land, receives 70 percent of the national income, and denies due process, freedom of speech and assembly, the right to a fair trial, the right to own land or travel to over 70 percent of its citizens.

South Africa stands within sight of a catyclysmic racial civil war. There is limited time for change. Black patience with achieving reform is understandable running out. We must not make the mistake of underestimating the depth of feeling and anger of blacks at continued humiliation, degradation, and denial. The African National Congress which was banned 23 years ago, has become more intense, more violent after almost 50 years of futile nonviolent protest. The ANC had responded to South Africa's segregationist policies by organizing public meetings and gathering petitions. Then in the early fifties with the entry of young leaders like Mandela and Tambo, new programs were adopted. We began to see boycotts, strikes, and civil disobedience. The killing of Steve Biko, who symbolized defiance, struck a blow to those who hoped that change would come soon and peacefully.

The recent constitutional amendment Mr. Speaker, adopted by referendum last November granted, as you know, limited representation to 2.5 million coloreds and 800,000 Asians, representing approximately 12 percent of the total population. This concession to a limited nonwhite segment of the population is the first time nonwhites, since the arrival of whites over 332 years ago, have served in the National Government.

Mr Speaker, we should look beyond the veneer of democracy. The new Constitution does not in any way dilute white control or change the institutionalized segregation and racism that exists in South Africa. If anything, it is an exacerbation of racial bitterness.

There is a festering anger. Currently, there exists an uneasy balance between those who seek political reform and those who maintain that liberation will occur only with Socialist revolution. In the distant future, we may witness a perceptible shift in that precarious balance. In the absence of reform, both the Government and those outside the system will believe that there are no meaningful choices available. The painfully slow process of peaceful change in the political, economic, and social system will give way to a process of violent change. There will be a descent into the smoldering fires of a racial civil war.

South Africa has traditionally been at the periphery of U.S. focus on world issues. American policymakers have been reluctant to get involved in South Africa's racially determined minority rule. We have acted upon the premise that constructive change will come about through a progressive role of historical and economic development; that is, through the white-controlled government. That premise needs to be reexamined. The United States must consider the long-term implications of its present relations with South Africa. Most agree that one way or another the walls of apartheid will soon be torn down. The longer those walls remain standing, the more violent will be the means to bring them down. And we should not be supplying the mortar which sustains those walls.

There exists a basic and fundamental disagreement with South Africa over apartheid. No longer should we merely regret South Africa's legal framework. We must step beyond rhetoric. We need to give substance to our disagreement for otherwise any expressions of concern are meaningless and empty. Ultimately, the United States can not eradicate apartheid. However, we should examine those policy options which acknowledge that internal actions by South Africa will provide the main impetus leading to change and which offer a means by which the United States can disassociate itself from apartheid and prod South Africa to move in a positive direction toward full political rights for all the citizens of South Africa.

The levers we have at our disposal are few. However, they do exist. Swiftly and with purpose we attempted to invoke the weight of economic sanctions against martial law in Poland; so should we in South Africa. The United States and South Africa have developed a mutually beneficial economic relationship. The economic involvement of the United States is significant. Direct investment is estimated to be nearly $3 billion. The full extent however, of U.S. financial investment reaches beyond direct investment to over $14 billion. Since 1974 Krugerrands have been purchased by Americans and have reportedly earned the South African Government over $360 million. On November 3, 1982, the International Monetary Fund granted a controversial $1.1 billion loan to South Africa. Mr Speaker, 7 executive directors representing 68 countries refused to support the loan, 9 called for postponement, and 8, including the U.S. director, backed the loan and prevailed with 52 percent of the vote.

It is difficult to separate and keep separate political and economic issues concerning South Africa as the economic matters encompass social, cultural, and political factors. Segregated education, mandated by law, keeps blacks from becoming skilled workers and out of many higher paying jobs. The shortage of skilled workers curtails output growth, increases costs, and aggravates inflation. These economic consequences flow from politically imposed conditions. U.S. economic involvement, whether it be direct or indirect, such as voting in favor of a $1.1 billion IMF loan, to which I previously referred, assists South Africa in maintaining its current political framework. This assistance is perceived as approval of the current regime. That may prove to have unintended implications in the future on United States-South African relations when the white minority government yields full political participation to all of its citizens.

This is not solely a black issue. It is a concern of America. If we are to maintain the legacies of Jefferson, Lincoln, and Dr. King, if we are to be the America of which they spoke, then we must be concerned with apartheid. We are and view ourselves the conscience of the world. The oppressed look to us for assistance in achieving social and political justice, for moral leadership, and for an understanding of their aspirations. It is time for us to step beyond rhetoric.

Through the tireless leadership efforts of a number of my colleagues we have stepped beyond simply talking. The legislative proposals of my colleagues JULIAN DIXON, STEVE SOLARZ, BILL GRAY, and HOWARD WOLPE have significantly contributed to calling into question the efficacy and long-term implications of this administration's present policy known as constructive engagement. The effects of Congressman WALTER FAUNTROY, with the assistance of Randall Robinson of Transafrica, set in motion a nationwide protest against the indignities and human tragedies associated with apartheid. My colleague from Maryland, PARREN MITCHELL, just last week introduced two bills to eliminate economic support of the South African Government.

Mr. Speaker, the consciousness of the American public has been raised and the South African Government has apparently taken notice. I am encouraged by the recent signals emanating from the South African Government. I am proud of the many Americans, the many Marylanders, the many Members of this House, who took part in the protests and continue to protest apartheid. For as we have been told, and as I believe, no individual is truly free until we all are.

CHILE IS IN A STATE OF SIEGE

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, events in 1984 have shown that democracy is on the rise in Latin America. The restoration of democratically elected governments after years of military rule in Uruguay and Brazil are examples of this positive trend. However, 1984 also saw the return to a state of siege in Chile, one of the most repressive regimes in Latin America.

Since his takeover in 1973, Gen. Augustus Pinochet has restored stability to his country but at the expense of political dissidents and of the civil rights of Chileans. After a year of national protests beginning in May 1983, Pinochet upgraded the perpetual state of emergency into a state of siege. The ensuing crackdown on guerrilla violence and political dissent has resulted in the suspension of habeas corpus for terrorists, indefinitely delayed trials, and censure of the press. The crackdown has also resulted in an increase in human rights violations, a problem which has plagued the Pinochet regime since its inception. The Chilean Government's recent actions have outraged its opponents all over the world and unnerved even its most ardent supporters.

On a recent trip to Latin America, the members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and I had the opportunity to meet with President Pinochet. We presented several suggestions that we felt would aid Chile in its struggle to restore democracy. One, we requested that elections be held before the 1989 deadline in the 1980 Constitution. Further, we requested an end to the state of siege, an end to human rights violations, and an end to press censure. These four suggestions were made in the hope that they would accelerate the return to democracy and end extremist factionalism. However, while the Chilean people are responsive to the idea of restoring democracy, the Chilean Government has shown no sign of either working toward or even desiring such a return.

This resolution expresses the sense of the caucus that the Government's position in Chile is no longer acceptable to the American people. It expresses our hope that the Chilean people will be able to overcome all obstacles to achieve a new democracy. Therefore, this resolution takes the following steps to reiterate American commitment to a restoration of democracy in Chile. First, it calls on Congress to suspend all military and economic assistance for the present Chilean Government. Second, since the $573 million received by Chile in international loans and aid have been of critical importance to survival of the present Chilean Government, the resolution stipulates that Congress should no longer support the granting of loans to the current regime. As chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, I urge all Members of Congress to support this critical resolution and I urge the Chilean Government to suspend the extension of the siege and commence conciliatory talks aimed at restoring democracy with leaders of all political parties, labor unions, and the general public.

THE STATE OF THE UNION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, the President will forward and present his State of the Union Address tonight, and my own impression and reactions have been for some time that the State of the Union Messages have become sort of a ritual that have long outworn the original intent and purposes of those ceremonies, very much like the rituals that emptily and almost mindlessly are followed in some outworn pagan creeds.

Nowhere will we hear a perception of the world that would give a realistic interpretation of any kind of a minimal State of the Union, at a time when the strongest forces ever in the history of our Nation, over which we have little or no control, impinge on every action that we might take domestically, whether it has to do with monetary or fiscal policy. It is not an accounting as a result of, say, some of the President's very actions during his first 4 years in which he traveled to China and entered into a yet-to-be-divulged secret agreement, followed recently by a trip to China by the Secretary of Defense, in which some yet-to-be-revealed deal was consummated, this one obviously of a military nature.

The State of the Union tonight will not reflect realistically some of the conditions that have arisen in the agriculturally productive areas of our country, the breadbasket of our country, so to speak, which led to an emergency conference by some of the members of his Cabinet and the White House just less than 72 hours ago.

Therefore, there will be no real accountability to the country, and since, as I said this past Monday, on February 4, there is no evidence of discussion or, much less, debate here in the Halls of the deliberative and legislative policymaking body of our country, I have determined to rise, as I have in the past, because of the seriousness and the ominous possibility and potential for fateful and almost—and I hope and pray to God not—catastrophic consequences.

We hear about the plight of the farmer. Yet the President received overwhelming support in those areas. Yet by the time the Presidential campaign was well under way last year, the germ seed for the present plight of these farmers had not only been planted but was beginning to grow and flourish. And that is as a result of the President's trip to China, and whatever it was, he agreed to discuss with those Chinese leaders our problems, mindful of the fact that China cannot be accused of having a democratic regime, because it is a Marxist, Leninist, Communist regime, which the President finds so abominable when it is reflected in the New World in the persons of two or three members of the ruling junta until recently in Nicaragua, revealing a sort of traditional American or North American outlook and double standard when it comes to the way we measure things on the part of our neighbors that share the world and this section of the world with us and with whom inexorably we must continue to share the world. And fateful destiny alone will dictate under which conditions we live if we persist in the course of action which seems to be now irreversible by this President.

When he travels to this kind of a regime and enters into secret arrangements, we learn that one of those had been based on the fact that the Chinese Government had promised and committed itself to purchasing wheat, in exchange for the astounding thing the Congress did of giving it favored-nation treatment, when we denied strenuously Russia or the COMECON or the Communist-economy countries, so that China could inundate our markets with textiles and textile products. In exchange, the Chinese committed themselves to purchasing annually about 6 million metric tons of wheat. The Chinese have reneged on that. They have not carried out their terms of the bargain.

This is one reason for the plight of our farmers today who were predicating their future on an illusory prosperity. It is like this illusory recovery; it is a delusion. The facts are that there is not an American I know of—certainly not in my district—whose basic cost of living has deflated.

So where is the control on inflation? Has the cost of light and gas which is necessary in today's urban living gone down? No, it continues to rise. Has the cost of groceries and bread gone down? No, they are not deflated. We are not paying less, we are paying more.

Has the cost of rents or shelter gone down? Of course not. We have a crisis in shelter and in housing for Americans, as some of us have been trying futilely and unsuccessfully to convince our colleagues here for the past 3 years.

So, of course, it pains one and grieves one who has been a sort of a privileged individual in the sense of being charged with knowledge and privileged to live now way above the allotted usual span of life and who can remember almost with total recall the Depression era, the World War I era and the Depression era, as well as the World War II era and, of course, the sequellas of Korea and Vietnam and the Bay of Pigs. And it pains me to see that we are like the ancient order of the old Bourbon Kings who learned nothing and forgot nothing.

Will the State of the Union or any discussion thereto refer to these developments that are here now present and clearly a danger?

His budget message has been sent and it does show that he is asking for the first time in several years a substantial increase in military direct aid to Guatemala. We like to look upon ourselves and we perceive ourselves as an open and informed society. We look down with disdain and somewhat condescension to what we mentally consider lesser countries, as being less democratic, less informed, if not outright authoritarian or totalitarian or closed societies, yet I have seen nothing in the American media, whether it is the printed word or electronic, of the horrors that have happened right a hop and skip south of us, where the bishop of Chiapas visiting with me over 2 years ago reported the horrors that we like to associate with these terrible pictures we see of the starving Ethiopian children and as some of us recall in the sixties in the Congo and thereabouts where you had similar experiences of millions of human beings dying from hunger and for lack of food in Chiapas, and our governmental policies supported the bayoneting, the ripping open of bellies of 6-month-old infants, Marxist-Leninists, of the worst situated human beings on the face of the globe. You do not have to go to India. You do not have to go to the teeming areas of Asia. Just go to the jungles and those dense forests where the poorest of the poor, of the Indians where the Guatemalan troops with a 100-percent American-made bayonets, weapons and armaments; there is not one rifle that we can say the Communists brought in, all American-made, because in one single day, 30,000 suddenly crossed the Mexican border where for decades, for more than a century there has been friction between Guatemala and Mexico.

Where do we hear any discussion having to do with that very significant history? Our policy has been, and I think it was very, very clearly illustrated by the first Secretary of State under this administration, President Reagan, Gen. Alexander Haig, who believed in dividing and conquering, the Old American principle of capitalizing on these frictions between these countries, historical frictions; Chile, Argentina, Honduras, Nicaragua; yet even President Eisenhower did not think it was condescending, did not think it was demeaning to the United States in an identical historical conflict between those two bordering countries of Honduras and Nicaragua to become part of what today we call the Contadora countries. Essentially it was the same membership in 1952, 1953, and 1957, and we went in as peacemakers and we brought about the understanding and the harmony that has existed until we have occupied Honduras. We are occupying Honduras.

Now, that is not our perception, but it is the world's perception.

I think it is important that we be mindful and respectful in the words of the Declaration of Independence of mankind's world opinion, and when the bishop of Chiapas and then later in my personal interview revealed these horrible atrocities and the Mexican Government, which did not know whether it should complain about the violation of its sovereignty and borderline or what to do about relieving the horrible plight, and the bishop of Chiapas which is the bordering State to the Guatemalan border, guided by his religious commitment, attempting to do something, witnessed these atrocities in the attempt of the Guatemalan soldiery even crossing into Mexican territory and trying to kill off or capture some of these peasants.

Now I can guarantee my colleagues that in that whole area if there is one of those peasants that the Guatemalan Government says may be harboring subversives, you can find one that can tell you the difference between a Marxist-Leninist and a typewriter, I will stand corrected on this House floor.

We are the ones that are insisting on making this something that it is not, just in Guatemala, except that in Guatemala the very thing that in the smallest country, El Salvador, the bankruptcy of our policies are revealed to the world and should be to us.

We can talk about the fact that we have supported a man that is in power right now, but it is the same man that has held power on two previous occasions, the same man that held power when we had atrocious and sustained violations of human rights, murders of archbishops, nuns, priests, missionaries, newspaper reporters, correspondents, and the moment the forces that were responsible for those atrocities decided that he was too soft, they kicked him out. He had to leave El Salvador. He may be back now, but we read just 2 weeks ago that because of the pressure of the extreme right-wingers, the leader of whom was received in Washington just about 3 months ago as if he were a hero, the papers described the groups receiving him as the host, as the conservative bodies of this country and Members of the Congress; yet he gloried all during the time of the activity of the death squads, he called them in Spanish escuadrón de gloria, glory squads, an extreme ideologue fanatic zealot who no question has been directly associated with such things as the assassination of Archbishop Romero, the four American nuns, the two or three priests, a number of Salvadoran priests.

America because of such mistaken perceptions as those clearly revealed by General Haig, who blithely drew the line the first week he was in office and said, "I and we in this regime draw the line. Communism, Marxist-Leninism, Castroism, stops here, We draw the line."

So he blithely went in and got some Argentine soldiers to come into Honduras and try to help destabilize, is the word that is used today, the Sandinistas.

Then, lo and behold, suddenly he finds himself in the crisis of the Falklands, or Malvinas, and the Argentinians, of course, thought that we would be sympathetic to them. They were lending us their soldiers to do our work, our dirty work; so they pulled the soldiers out. They rose in great anger toward the United States.

In the meanwhile, we had to face our English associates and allies and, of course, the rest is history.

The reason we have American soldiers now in Honduras is precisely because that outworn, that mistaken notion, that what might have been true in 1929, even as late as 1940, 1950, 1960, is still true today. And the CIA proceeded and I still think does on the assumption that what worked in 1954 in Guatemala is going to work again in Nicaragua.

This sounds strange, but let me say to my colleagues that I have seen stranger things. They are acts of folly. In fact, most of my colleagues here in this Congress will recall, because I think most of you were here in 1983, 14 months, and with the Commander in Chief in full awareness that his Chiefs of Staff were all against whatever it was he said was the mission of the marines in Beirut, though when we asked, Mr. President, repeatedly, I took this forum night after night, "Mr. President, what is the mission of the marines?" Of course, this President does not reply to Congressmen's letters. I have worked with six Presidents in the 23 years and 5 months that I have been here, and even Richard Nixon answered a Congressman's letter. This President does not.

But then I noticed that finally, after the substantial contingent of marines that he sent in the autumn of 1982, the press asked him, and he said they are peacekeepers, they will be there to uphold the Government of Lebanon, Gemayal.

I asked a question and wrote a letter to the President in which I asked the question, "Mr. President, a peacekeeper certainly is not one that goes in on the side of one faction. You have four factions. This particular faction cannot even control the city of Beirut, much less what we call Lebanon. But the marines are not diplomats, they are not politicians, they are soldiers. And if their mission there in battle gear is to be a peacekeeper, but you put them in a hole, and then around that rim of that hole you have the susceptibility of hostile fire, do you have to be a military to know that they are in an untenable situation?"

Now, how, my colleagues, could a President for 14 months persist in a calculated course against all reason and advice from the experts that led to folly and the needless deaths of 242 Americans, marines at that. Why?

Why do we persist in the obvious bankrupt course of action in Central America, not just in Nicaragua? We have lost completely any kind of moral power of leadership on a collective basis in the New World.

In the invasion of Grenada we violated the basic treaties with the Organization of American States. Who here in the Halls of this House or across the way, across the rotunda, has even asked for some kind of committee study of the implications?

World opinion solidly is still against us. We not only are still occupying Grenada but we have over 300 of our military there. We are building the airstrip that we said we were going to invade to prevent construction of by the Cubans, even though it was an English construction company that was constructing it.

Is the American public informed? Has the American public had a chance to weigh the arguments, the discussions, the debates?

What is the difference then between this and what we dispectively call a closed society?

Have we had a report on the situation which is agonizing on the Guatemalan-Mexican border? In fact, when the Mexican Government finally came in and welcomed a U.N. or human rights or relief commission, our Government listened to a protest on the part of the Guatemalan Government that Mexico was giving refuge to Marxist-Leninists, and we put pressure and have continued that pressure on the actual President of Mexico today.

As a matter of fact, the CIA is so stupid that it thinks it can destabilize this President and push him and coerce him into an agreement with our policies. But all we are doing is further exposing a real friend of the country. The President of Mexico was educated here. He is a real, sincere pro-American. But we will give him no escape hatch if we throw him to the left wingers in that country because of the rightwing pressure that we are exerting on him today.

Let there be no mistake. Just like the concerted efforts that the CIA tacitly and not so tacitly have been making to assassinate leaders of the Sandinista junta or whatever you want to call it, just as surely as they have been supplying the so-called Contras who really are about 80 percent ex-Samosistas, why do we persist in this obvious folly? Do we not know that the Latin America of 1960, of John Kennedy's era, is no longer the Latin America of the 1980's? Do we not know that even if we have to invade Nicaragua and impose ourselves we will not be able to put a government that will rule there without ceaseless guerrilla efforts against us and whoever we impose?

Do we not know that we can go as we did in 1929, after a 5-year occupation by the marines, and formed the National Guard, and impose on Anastasia Somoza and his kin? Surely, surely someone in those judgment making, decisionmaking areas, or planes, or level of the executive branch, certainly in this branch, ought to know that.

Do we persist in the misconception which has been so mischievous in the centuries?

Nowhere have we ever been taught. We are so selfcontained that even the most momentous issues, such as that refugee problem, continuing problem on the Guatemalan-Mexican border is completely ignored. I have yet to see a newspaper report. I have yet to see anybody truthfully report about our policy with respect to the Mexican Government's insistence on joining the other members of the Contra Gorda government and resisting our policies, if they are and if we continue to call them a policy. How much more hypocritical can we be?

We accuse the Communists of doing that, of having a recognized envoy, an Ambassador of the United States in Managua, received with full credentials, while we conduct war against them. What else is it? What is the difference between that and Russia and Afghanistan? In fact, it is worse.

If Mexico were Afghanistan and the United States were Russia and Russia sent half a billion dollars to a group in what would be Mexico, that would be anti-American, what would we say? What would we do?

Now, the world has shrunk. Even in Southeast Asia have we not learned? Have we not learned since we invaded Russia with England and France in 1918 to try to put down their revolution, have we not learned that you cannot, did we not learn from our own revolution that you cannot put down an indigenous native civil war, civil uprising, unless you have the means and the methods of coming in and imposing by might a rule and a government?

The very word "guerrilla" originated in Spain because of the attempt of Napoleon to do that in Spain. And the rest is history.

My grandfather was a leader of the forces that defeated the French imperialists, Napoleon III, in northern Mexico in the last century; a rabble, almost practically unarmed, with the elite of the French imperialist troops defeated ignominiously.

Why? Because when you have the situation such as you have in all Latin America where oppressed masses have finally had enough after 300 years, there is no way we are going to go in, much less with ideological purity, to impose our will in that entire extremity of the New World because anything we do by way of direct intervention militarily in Nicaragua will never be reduced to the country of Nicaragua. That whole area will go up in boiling, churning flames.

We do not have enough, even if we were to impress every able-bodied man from 21 years of age to 65 years of age, we would not have enough. And, besides that, is that what we want for our children? Must we confess our abject failure? You do not do these things until you have failed diplomatically.

The Russians did not put one Russian soldier in Korea; we did. We had American boys fighting Asians. I never thought I would be in the Congress, I never dreamed I would even be in politics. I did not intend to. But when that war broke out I noticed that and I remembered that famous dictum somebody said, "War is diplomacy by other means." But what it really reflects is a total breakdown of diplomatic ability. But in the New World where destiny says my children, my grandchildren, and my great-grandchildren are going to have to share this part of the world, where south of us, for the first time in the last 5 years the total number of people exceeds our population by 50 million, do we want to have a course of conduct that would inexorably lead my children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren to an eternal emnity and hostility with them? Do we think we can, by bombs, eradicate an ideology, whether it is communism or anything else? Do we really believe it? Have we not learned?

Would it not have been better in Vietnam and just as productive if, instead of 50,000 or our men and the horrible sacrifice in blood and treasury, we had just gotten about $50 billion in dollar bills, put them in a fleet of C5A's, and just bombed Southeast Asia with dollar bills? Would we not have been better off? I think so.

I do not see any argument that would lead me to conclude to the contrary. In fact, we talked about restoration of esteem for our country. Whoever says that is not reading the foreign presses.

Europe, Latin America, and in Honduras. I have heard my colleagues speak of Honduras as if "Why, my goodness, that is the best training ground for our Reserve Forces ever. So we will go in there, we will train and build camps and everything else" as if Honduras was not a sovereign, independent nation.

Is there any of my colleagues who think we have the consent of the Honduran people for that? Let me advise them to read the editorials of even a conservative paper in Tegucigalpa where the editors say, "Hemos perdido todo incluyendo el honor."

We have lost all, including honor.

The story yesterday was that our people, meaning the CIA, "are trying to see how they can get a united Contra." Shouldn't that be revelatory conclusively of the total bankruptcy of a policy? If the thing we cannot forgive is that the Sandinistas have two or three Marxist-Leninists in their government, overlook the fact that they also have about three or four priests. Now, we do not try to invade France. The French Government has two Communists in their Cabinet. I do not hear anybody advocating invading France. Can anybody show that Castro's soldiers are in possession of Nicaragua and dictate the policy? Can anybody show one Russian soldier in all of Central America? If so, even the CIA cannot prove it. Certainly no independent observer from all over the globe, from Japan to West Germany, has said that it is anything but an indigenous civil war; that it was not imposed by Castro/Marxist/Leninists forces. So why do we persist? Why?

A recent book by Barbara Tuchman, the famous historian, entitled "The March of Folly," I recommend to my colleagues. That is her thesis: Why, throughout history, have men of power persisted in a sustained course against all reason, logic, best advice, expert, whatnot, in a course of calculated folly and catastrophe, from the Trojan War to Vietnam?

She does not really have a dogmatic conclusion, but the inference is: Well, power, and men exercising power, and the arrogance or the hubris, as the Greeks used to call it. But that is why our democracy was founded. The greatest experiment, and it is still an experiment. We have not celebrated the bicentennial of our former Government yet. The Constitution will not have a 200th birthday until 1989. I say that the forces within and the forces without that are heavily impacting us today are not friends of the democratic process. And the test will be whether we in our time will live up to that which has been transmitted to us by our predecessors, faulty as it may be, injustice as it may endure, the inherent power to correct those injustices, the ultimate power in the people to change is still there but it is fast eroding for many reasons other than just a direct usurpation of power by a would be authoritarian dictator.

That is not the way a democracy in a country such as ours loses that democracy. The state of the Union will not discuss any such things, and that is understandable. What I find to be not so easy to understand is the lack of discussion, the lack of debate on these vital issues.

Recently, I had reason to reply to an editorial in my hometown paper, because I do not speak one way here and the other way in my district; in fact I speak in my district first and then I speak up here.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point the reply on my part to the editor in an editorial that appeared in the San Antonio newspaper, the San Antonio Express-News.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The letter follows:

DECEMBER 14, 1984.

Mr. STERLIN HOLMESLY,
Editorial Director,
San Antonio Express-News,
San Antonio, TX.

DEAR SIR: Your editorial, "Ortega doesn't fool Hispanics," praises a Congressional delegation for its sagacity in recognizing that the government of Nicaragua doesn't much like U.S. efforts to destroy it.

Certainly the Nicaraguan government mouths Marxism, but that doesn't mean that their revolution was "made in Moscow." Indeed, I don't know anybody who says that the revolution wasn't indigenous. Nor has anybody claimed that there are Russian soldiers in Nicaragua. As for that country being a base for exporting revolution, there's no convincing evidence of that, either. Indeed, after decades of trying to export its revolution, Cuba can't claim a single success. If anything, our policies have pushed the Nicaraguans into the laps of the Russians and Cubans.

We ought to remember that Nicaragua during most of this century has lived with United States intervention, and endured our sponsorship for 40 years of one of the most brutal, corrupt regimes in history. It was the Nicaraguan government which caused Franklin Roosevelt to say, "(Somoza) is an SOB, but he's our SOB." Such a cynical approach had been the trademark of U.S. policy in the region. With our track record in Nicaragua, it's no wonder that the local revolutionaries don't have much use for Americans. With our current war against Nicaragua, it's no wonder that they are turning to Moscow for help. They don't have much choice.

It's incredible that our government finds the Red Chinese congenial pals, and wants to vastly expand commercial dealings with Russia, and doesn't want to overthrow Marxist regimes in Africa, Europe or Asia, but finds highly objectionable the presence of a couple of Marxist Leninist dialecticians far from being the ones in control of the reigning government. Assuming that you are amenable to facts and not fears, the recent Nicaraguan election revealed that less than 6 percent voted for the communist candidates. And, by the way, in El Salvador where you have a total of five different rebel groups, the least numerous and less influential is the Marxist Leninist wing.

You don't have to be a sucker to suggest that the Reagan policy toward Nicaragua is wrong. We followed precisely such a policy toward Cuba with the notable result of making Castro stronger then ever. In Nicaragua, all we are doing is undermining any credibility that local opposition to the Sandinistas may have. We make it easier to repress opposition; and with each added American assault on the Sandinistas, they've clamped down harder on what was once formidable dissent. Our policy has undercut our own interests. If the Sandinistas feel free to tell off Congressional tourist, it's no wonder. They have nothing to lose by pulling at the tailfeather of the American eagle, a spectacle that local folks find amusing, the Russians find hilarious, and the Sandinistas find useful. Sure they don't like us. Why should they?

Sincerely yours,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I do so also because in it, reference was made in the editorial, and of course necessarily in my reply, to the comments regarding a tour on the part of some of my colleagues that were described as being members of the Hispanic Congressional Caucus and others that made a tour of Central America and other places in South America.

The fact is that if we are no farther advanced in the smallest country where we have drawn the line as of 4 years ago, what is going to happen as Guatemala really blows up? It is inevitable; there is not a person I know conversant with that situation—Guatemala is substantially larger and a lot closer to the United States, and it also has a direct impact on our next door neighbor, Mexico, which also is facing horrible dilemmas.

A 50-percent inflation rate; 50-percent unemployment. We cannot continue to hide ourselves behind ideological or historical blinders of ignorance or arrogance. The whole fate and the future involvement of our own country in the most intimate form is involved.

I think the task before us is one, as Lincoln said, to know first where we come from and then whether or whither we want to go.

I think that one, in this case, must depend irreparably on the very first, and that is, do we understand where we have come from? Do we understand the misperceptions that have continued to rule?

Now there are some who say, Well, the whole question is economic, or markets. If this is so, certainly the issue has not been clearly drawn. But it is so, because in Guatemala in 1954 when the CIA intervened against the regime of the then-President Colonel Arbenz, it was not until the CIA hired some mercenary American pilots, paid for by United Fruit, which today is called Standard Brands, that we toppled that regime.

Ironically, that is one reason why, when Fidel Castro and Che Guevara and others succeeded in overcoming the Batista forces and taking part in Cuba, Che Guevara himself not only spoke but wrote, saying: "We must learn from Arbenz' experience in Guatemala."

That is that if we attempt to do justice here in our country, we will not be able to do it as long as the American vested interest in sugar exists; all the other corporations that actually had control of the economy, persist in defending their interests so selfishly that they will recognize none but a despotic regime that will exact the profits they demand.

We do not read about those things here, but let me assure my colleagues they are there. We must no longer consider as inferiors these vast realms, these diverse entities that we lump as "Latin America."

Long before the Pilgrims landed on the harsh shores of Cape Cod, there was a printing press in a university in Mexico City and in Cuba. We are not speaking of a people that we filter through a prism that is preconceived and prefixed to filter only a certain light.

So the task is great; the responsibility, when we stop to ponder it, horrendous. I believe with the faith that I have in the net savings sap still residing in this great American tree of democracy that the right will prevail, and that it will inure to our benefit in every way.

Not only fraternally, not only in peaceful coexistence, but in commercial enhancement. If we have the wit and the will, what we consider a threat and a danger out of this danger we can pluck the flower of peace and profit.

SUNDRY NEW AND REVISED RESCISSION PROPOSALS AND DEFERRALS OF BUDGET AUTHORITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-23)

RESENTMENT GROWS TOWARD AMERICAN LEGAL SYSTEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I take this time out of personal concern, a concern that I think all of my colleagues would share if they had seen the story that I saw on TV this morning.

And put it in a perspective as to what is going to happen in this Chamber tonight and what Americans are thinking about and what maybe shaped some of the feelings of Americans when they go to the polls and vote when they choose their leaders.

The movie "Death Wish" will be shown on a number of TV stations tonight. The headlines discuss daily the situation in New York where Bernard Goetz shot some assailants in a subway. And this morning I saw on television a situation where a young lady was walking down the streets of Boston, I believe it was in the last few days, and a young assailant came up to her and tried to take her purse. She refused and got into a fight with this young man. He proceeded to say, "Give me the purse or else," and pulled out a pistol and shot her.

You may have seen the story on the news and it did not just end there. After he shot her he apparently was bragging on a subway or bus line as to what he had just done, sitting next to this young woman's mother.

Now, fortunately because of the weather and only because of the weather this young woman was not seriously injured and was released from the hospital. The mother did overhear in just a tremendous stroke of luck for authorities the bragging of the assailant and he was captured.

But what truly and sincerely bothers me and that is why I rarely have taken this podium to talk in these terms is the fact that that young man, who pulled a gun and shot this lady, who probably would have been dead today if she were not wearing several layers of clothing, this young man was taken before a Boston judge and released on $500 bail.

Every statistic we have indicates that crime after crime is committed when people are out on bail. Here is an instance where someone attacked, assaulted, shot at close range an individual and was turned loose on a $500 bail.

Now I do not come here with any conclusion as to how to handle this problem, but I think as we sit in the Chamber tonight with the President talking about world problems and the MX, and defense, and strategy, and deficits, that people all over this country are concerned about other items just as those, such as why is a young man turned loose on $500 bail after almost murdering someone except for a stroke of luck and bad weather.

We just saw statistics on a national survey that indicated that 45 to 50 percent of all of the people in the United States agree with what Bernard Goetz did. That is just the beginning unless we take heed, unless we follow this warning. I think the story of what happened in Boston will be told and retold and I can think of other stories that I have heard over the years that begin little by little to build a basis of resentment for our legal system, our judicial system, our legislative system in this Nation. While we are talking about so many items that have monumental and global importance, these little seeds continue to build and grow. I think it is probably appropriate to say that if we do not take heed with what has happened here today, that those will be the seeds of change and could be a radical change in this Nation.

I do not have, as I said, a solution. But I would say this: We in this body, in this House of Representatives, the people's House, had better take some warning of what has been going on in this Nation. Those out in the State legislatures who pass laws that allow individuals to be turned loose on a $500 bail after nearly murdering an individual ought to take heed. Our judicial system—local, municipal, State, and Federal—had better start reacting. I truly and sincerely believe that the more this happens, the more cynicism will grow in this Nation.

Right now again, as I said, opposite the President's State of the Union Message tonight will be shown on many local TV stations the movie "Death Wish." In the same papers today and tomorrow will carry the story of how this young man was turned loose, after nearly murdering someone, on $500 bail.

We should question where our priorities are and what we can do. I think it is going to have to start, as I say, right here in this body, in the House of Representatives, in Washington, in capitols throughout the Nation, in courts, judicial systems, legislatures. Because if we do not make the changes and we think in broader terms of history, we should realize that these are the seeds, these are the foundations of the kind of radical changes. A Hitler or a Mussolini or any dictator that we can think of in history did not take control just because of a quick change in society. It was a gradual lack of reaction to the elected leaders, the appropriate leaders, the public officials, that led to that type of change.

We think that it cannot happen here. I would tell you that a few years ago most people would have said that a poll would not be possible to show that 50 percent of the American people approve of an action of a Bernard Goetz, but that is true and it is fact and it happened here and it happened today.

So I would simply say that we must take heed. We must follow up. I am prepared to do whatever I can as a Member of Congress. I do not have the answers, but I know there is a problem there. I know it is a serious problem and I know that if we do not begin to address it, if our counterparts in the States and the municipalities do not address it, it will get worse and it will be the beginnings, I believe, of the kind of changes in our society that we do not want to see.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to and in accordance with rule XI, clause 2(a) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, I submit for publication in the RECORD a copy of the rules of the Committee on House Administration as approved by the committee on February 6, 1985:

RULES FOR THE COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION [99TH CONGRESS]

RULE NO. 1—GENERAL PROVISIONS

(a) The Rules of the House are the rules of the committee and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is a motion of high privilege in committees and subcommittees. Each subcommittee of the committee is a part of the committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of the committee and to its rules so far as applicable.

(b) The committee is authorized at any time to conduct such investigations and studies as it may consider necessary or appropriate in the exercise of its responsibilities under Rule X of House Rules and (subject to the adoption of expense resolutions as required by Rule XI, clause 5 of House Rules) to incur expenses (including travel expenses) in connection therewith.

(c) The committee is authorized to have printed and bound testimony and other data presented at hearings held by the committee. All costs of stenographic services and transcripts in connection with any meeting or hearing of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

(d) The committee shall submit to the House, not later than January 2 of each odd-numbered year, a report on the activities of the committee under Rule X and XI of House Rules during the Congress ending at noon on January 3 of such year.

(e) The committee's rules shall be published in the Congressional Record not later than 30 days after the Congress convenes in each odd-numbered year.

RULE NO. 2—REGULAR AND SPECIAL MEETINGS

(a) The regular meeting date of the Committee on House Administration shall be the first Wednesday of every month when the House is in session in accordance with Clause 2(b) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House. Additional meetings may be called by the chairman as he may deem necessary or at the request of a majority of the members of the committee in accordance with Clause 2(c) of Rule XI of the House of Representatives. The determination of the business to be considered at each meeting shall be made by the chairman subject to Clause 2(c) of Rule XI of the House of Representatives. A regularity scheduled meeting need not be held if there is no business to be considered.

(b) If the chairman of the committee or subcommittee is not present at any meeting of the committee or subcommittee the ranking member of the majority party on the committee or subcommittee who is present shall preside at the meeting.

(c) The committee may not sit, without special leave, while the House is reading a measure for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

RULE NO. 3—OPEN MEETINGS

As required by Clause 2(g), Rule XI, each meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, of the committee or its subcommittees, shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a quorum present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public. Provided, However, that no person other than members of the committee, and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize, shall be present in any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This provision does not apply to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

RULE NO. 4—RECORDS AND ROLLCALLS

(a) The result of each rollcall vote in any meeting of the committee shall be made available for inspection by the public at reasonable time at the committee offices, including a description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition; the name of each member voting for and against, and whether by proxy or in person, and the members present but not voting.

(b) All Committee hearings, records, data, charts, and files shall be kept separate and distinct from the congressional office records of the member serving as chairman of the committee; and such records shall be the property of the House and all members of the House shall have access thereto.

(c) In order to facilitate committee compliance with Paragraph (e)(1) of Clause 2, Rule XI, each subcommittee shall keep a complete record of all subcommittee actions which shall include a record of the votes on any question on which a rollcall vote is demanded. The result of each such rollcall vote shall be promptly made available to the full committee for inspection by the public at reasonable times in the offices of the committee. Information so available for public inspection shall include a description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition and the name of each member voting for and each member voting against such amendment, motion, order or proposition, and whether by proxy or in person, and the names of those members present but not voting.

(d) All subcommittee hearings, records, data, charts, and files, shall be kept distinct from the congressional office records of the member serving as chairman of the subcommittee. Such records shall be coordinated with the records of the full committee, shall be the property of the House, and all members of the House shall have access thereto.

RULE NO. 5—PROXIES

A vote by any member in the committee or in any subcommittee may be cast by proxy, but such proxy must be in writing and in the hands of the chief clerk of the committee or the clerk of the subcommittee, as the case may be, during each rollcall in which such member's proxy is to be voted. Each proxy shall designate the member who is to execute the proxy authorization and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto; except that a member may authorize a general proxy only for motions to recess, adjourn or other procedural matters. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the member assigning his vote and shall contain the date and time of day that the proxy is signed. Proxies may not be counted for a quorum. The member does not have to appear in person to present the proxy.

RULE NO. 6—POWER TO SIT AND ACT; SUBPOENA POWER

(a) For the purpose of carrying out any of its functions and duties under House Rules X and XI the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized (subject to subparagraph (b)(1) of this paragraph)—

(1) to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings, and

(2) to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. The chairman of the committee, or any member designated by the chairman, may administer oaths to any witness.

(b)(1) A subpoena may be authorized and issued by a committee or subcommittee under subparagraph (a)(2) in the conduct of any investigation or series of investigations or activities, only when authorized by a majority of the members voting, a majority being present. The power to authorize and issue subpoenas under subparagraph (a)(2) may be delegated to the chairman of the committee pursuant to such rules and under such limitations as the committee may prescribe. Authorized subpoenas shall be signed by the chairman of the committee or by any member designated by the committee.

(2) Compliance with any subpoena issued by the committee or subcommittee under subparagraph (a)(2) may be enforced only as authorized or directed by the House.

RULE NO. 7—QUORUMS

No measure or recommendation shall be reported to the House unless a majority of the committee is actually present. For the purposes of taking any action other than reporting any measure, issuance of a subpoena, closing meetings, promulgating Committee orders, or changing the Rules of the Committee, the quorum shall be one-third of the members of the Committee. For purposes of taking testimony and receiving evidence, two Members shall constitute a quorum.

RULE NO. 8—AMENDMENTS

Any amendment offered to any pending legislation before the committee must be made available in written form when requested by any member of the committee. If such amendment is not available in written form when requested, the chair will allow an appropriate period of time for the provision thereof.

RULE NO. 9—HEARING PROCEDURES

(a) The chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by the committee, and the appropriate subcommittee chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by a subcommittee, shall make public announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least 1 week before the commencement of that hearing unless the committee determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date. In the latter event the chairman or the subcommittee chairman whichever the case may be shall make such public announcement at the earliest possible date. The clerk of the committee shall promptly notify the Daily Digest Clerk of the Congressional Record as soon as possible after such public announcement is made.

(b) Unless excused by the chairman, each witness who is to appear before the committee or a subcommittee shall file with the clerk of the committee, at least 48 hours in advance of his appearance, a written statement of his proposed testimony and shall limit his oral presentation to a summary of his statement.

(c) When any hearing is conducted by the committee or any subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority party members on the committee shall be entitled, upon request to the chairman by a majority of those minority members before the completion of such hearing, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearings thereon.

(d) All other members of the committee may have the privilege of sitting with any subcommittee during its hearing or deliberations and may participate in such hearings or deliberations, but no such member who is not a member of the subcommittee shall vote on any matter before such subcommittee.

(e) Committee members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the chairman for that purpose, and only for a 5-minute period until all members present have had an opportunity to question a witness. The 5-minute period for questioning a witness by any one member can be extended only with the unanimous consent of all members present. The questioning of a witness in both full and subcommittee hearings shall be initiated by the chairman, followed by the ranking minority party member and all other members alternating between the majority and minority. In recognizing members to question witnesses in this fashion, the chairman shall take into consideration the ratio of the majority to minority members present and shall establish the order of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority. The chairman may accomplish this by recognizing two majority members for each minority member recognized.

(f) The following additional rules shall apply to hearings:

(1) The chairman at a hearing shall announce in an opening statement the subject of the investigation.

(2) A copy of the committee rules and this clause shall be made available to each witness.

(3) Witnesses at hearings may be accompanied by their own counsel for the purpose of advising them concerning their constitutional rights.

(4) The chairman may punish breaches of order and decorum, and of professional ethics on the part of counsel, by censure and exclusion from the hearings; and the committee may cite the offender to the House for contempt.

(5) If the committee determines that evidence or testimony at a hearing may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person, it shall—

(A) afford such person an opportunity voluntarily to appear as a witness;

(B) receive such evidence or testimony in executive session; and

(C) receive and dispose of requests from such person to subpoena additional witnesses.

(6) Except as provided in subparagraph (5), the chairman shall receive and the committee shall dispose of requests to subpoena additional witnesses.

(7) No evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the committee.

(8) In the discretion of the committee, witnesses may submit brief and pertinent sworn statements in writing for inclusion in the record. The committee is the sole judge of the pertinency of testimony and evidence adduced at its hearing.

(9) A witness may obtain a transcript copy of his testimony given at a public session or, if given at an executive session, when authorized by the committee.

RULE NO. 10—PROCEDURES FOR REPORTING BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

(a)(1) It shall be the duty of the chairman of the committee to report or cause to be reported promptly to the House any measure approved by the committee and to take or cause to be taken necessary steps to bring the matter to a vote.

(2) In any event, the report of the committee on a measure which has been approved by the committee shall be filed within 7 calendar days (exclusive of days on which the House is not in session) after the day on which there has been filed with the clerk of the committee a written request, signed by a majority of the members of the committee, for the reporting of that measure. Upon the filing of any such request, the clerk of the committee shall transmit immediately to the chairman of the committee notice of the filing of that request.

(b)(1) No measure or recommendation shall be reported from the committee unless a majority of the committee was actually present.

(2) With respect to each roll call vote on a motion to report any bill or resolution of a public character, the total number of votes cast for, and the total number of votes cast against, the reporting of such bill or resolution shall be included in the committee report.

(c) The report of the committee on a measure which has been approved by the committee shall include.

(1) the oversight findings and recommendations required pursuant to clause 2(b)(1) of Rule X of the House separately set out and clearly identified;

(2) the statement required by section 308(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, separately set out and clearly identified, if the measure provides new budget authority or new or increased tax expenditures;

(3) the estimate and comparison prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office under section 403 of such Act, separately set out and clearly identified, whenever the Director (if timely submitted prior to the filing of the report) has submitted such estimate and comparison to the committee; and

(4) a summary of the oversight findings and recommendations made by the Committee on Government Operations under clause 2(b)(2) or Rule X of the House separately set out and clearly identified whenever such findings and recommendations have been submitted to the legislative committee in a timely fashion to allow an opportunity to consider such findings and recommendations during the committee's deliberations on the measure.

(d) Each report of the committee on each bill or joint resolution of a public character reported by the committee shall contain a detailed analytical statement as to whether the enactment of such bill or joint resolution into law may have an inflationary impact on prices and costs in the operation of the national economy.

(e) If, at the time of approval of any measure or matter by the committee, any member of the committee gives notice of intention to file supplemental, minority, or additional views, that member shall be entitled to not less than 3 calendar days, commencing on the day on which the measure or matter(s) was approved, excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays, in which to file such views, in writing and signed by that member, with the clerk of the committee. All such views so filed by one or more members of the committee shall be included within, and shall be a part of, the report filed by the committee with respect to that measure or matter. The report of the committee upon that measure or matter shall be printed in a single volume which—

(1) shall include all supplemental, minority, or additional views which have been submitted by the time of the filing of the report, and

(2) shall bear upon its cover a recital that any such supplemental, minority, or additional views (and any material submitted under subdivisions (3) and (4) of subparagraph (c)) are included as part of the report. This subparagraph does not preclude—

(A) the immediate filing or printing of a committee report unless timely request for the opportunity to file supplemental, minority, or additional views has been made as provided by this subparagraph; or

(B) the filing by any such committee of any supplemental report upon any measure or matter which may be required for the correction of any technical error in a previous report made by that committee upon that measure or matter.

(f) If hearings have been held on any measure or matter so reported, the committee shall make every reasonable effort to have such hearings printed and available for distribution to the members of the House prior to the consideration of such measure or matter in the House.

RULE NO. 11—SUBCOMMITTEE OVERSIGHT

The standing subcommittees of the committee shall conduct oversight of matters within their jurisdiction in accordance with Rule X, clauses 2 and 3 of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

RULE NO. 12—REVIEW OF CONTINUING PROGRAMS; BUDGET ACT PROVISIONS

(a) The committee shall, in its consideration of all bills and joint resolutions of a public character within its jurisdiction, insure that appropriations for continuing programs and activities of the Federal Government and the District of Columbia government will be made annually to the maximum extent feasible and consistent with the nature, requirements, and objectives of the programs and activities involved. For the purposes of this paragraph a Government agency includes the organizational units of government listed in clause 7(c) of Rule XIII of House Rules.

(b) The committee shall review, from time to time, each continuing program within its jurisdictions for which appropriations are not made annually in order to ascertain whether such program could be modified so that appropriations therefor would be made annually.

(c) The committee shall, on or before March 15 of each year, submit to the Committee on the Budget (1) its views and estimates with respect to all matters to be set forth in the concurrent resolution on the budget for the ensuing fiscal year which are within its jurisdiction or functions, and (2) an estimate of the total amounts of new budget authority, and budget outlays resulting therefrom, to be provided or authorized in all bills and resolutions within its jurisdiction which it intends to be effective during that fiscal year.

(d) As soon as practicable after a concurrent resolution on the budget for any fiscal year is agreed to, the committee (after consulting with the appropriate committee or committees of the Senate) shall subdivide any allocations made to it in the joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on such resolution, and promptly report such subdivisions to the House, in the manner provided by section 302 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

(e) Whenever the committee is directed in a concurrent resolution on the budget to determine and recommend changes in laws, bills, or resolutions under the reconciliation process it shall promptly make such determination and recommendations, and report a reconciliation bill or resolution (or both) to the House or submit such recommendations to the Committee on the Budget, in accordance with the Congressional Budget Act of 1974

RULE NO. 13—BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE HEARINGS

The rule for the broadcasting of committee hearings shall be the same as Rule XI, clause 3 of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

RULE NO. 14—COMMITTEE AND SUBCOMMITTEE STAFF

Except as provided in Rule XI, clause 5(d) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the staff of the Committee on House Administration shall be appointed as follows:

A. The subcommittee staff shall be appointed, and may be removed, and their remuneration determined by the subcommittee chairman within the budget approved for the subcommittee by the full committee;

B. The staff assigned to the minority shall be appointed and their remuneration determined in such manner as the minority party members of the committee shall determine within the budget approved for such purposes by the committee;

C. The employees of the committee not assigned to a standing subcommittee or to the minority under the above provisions shall be appointed, and may be removed, and their remuneration determined by the chairman within the budget approved for such purposes by the committee.

RULE NO. 15—TRAVEL OF MEMBERS AND STAFF

(a) Consistent with the primary expense resolution and such additional expense resolutions as may have been approved, the provisions of this rule shall govern travel of committee members and staff. Travel for any member or any staff member shall be paid only upon the prior authorization of the chairman. Travel may by authorized by the chairman for any member and any staff member in connection with the attendance of hearings conducted by the committee or any subcommittee thereof and meetings, conferences, and investigations which involve activities or subject matter under the general jurisdiction of the committee. Before such authorization is given there shall be submitted to the chairman in writing the following:

(1) The purpose of the travel;

(2) The dates during which the travel will occur;

(3) The locations to be visited and the length of time to be spent in each;

(4) The names of members and staff seeking authorization.

(b)(1) In the case of travel outside the United States of members and staff of the committee or of a subcommittee for the purpose of conducting hearings, investigations, studies, or attending meetings and conferences involving activities or subject matter under the legislative assignment of the committee or pertinent subcommittee, prior authorization must be obtained from the chairman. Before such authorization is given, there shall be submitted to the chairman, in writing, a request for such authorization. Each request, which shall be filed in a manner that allows for a reasonable period of time for review before such travel is scheduled to begin, shall include the following:

(A) the purpose of the travel;

(B) the dates during which the travel will occur;

(C) the names of the countries to be visited and the length of time to be spent in each;

(D) an agenda of anticipated activities for each country for which travel is authorized together with a description of the purpose to be served and the areas of committee jurisdiction involved; and

(E) the names of members and staff for whom authorization is sought.

(2) Requests for travel outside the United States shall be initiated by the chairman and shall be limited to members and permanent employees of the committee.

(3) At the conclusion of any hearing, investigation, study, meeting or conference for which travel outside the United States has been authorized pursuant to this rule, each subcommittee (or members and staff attending meetings or conferences) shall submit a written report to the chairman covering the activities and other pertinent observations or information gained as a result of such travel.

(c) Members and staff of the committee performing authorized travel on official business shall be governed by applicable laws, resolutions, and regulations of the House and of the Committee on House Administration pertaining to such travel.

RULE NO. 16—NUMBER AND JURISDICTION OF SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) There shall be six Standing Subcommittees. The ratio (majority/minority) and jurisdiction of the subcommittees shall be:

Subcommittee on Accounts. (7/4)—Internal budget matters; expenditures from the contingent fund; changes in amounts of allowances; consultant contracts for committees; and monitoring financial activities of legislative service organizations.

Subcommittee on Procurement and Printing. (3/2)—Matters pertaining to procurement contracts for goods. Matters pertaining to printing, Government Printing Office, depository libraries, material printed in Congressional Record, and executive papers.

Subcommittee on Services. (3/2)—Matters pertaining to parking facilities, restaurant facilities, barber and beauty shop facilities, and other House services.

Subcommittee on Office Systems. (3/2)—Matters pertaining to furniture, electrical and mechanical office equipment and other accoutrements for use in the office of members, officers or committees and matters pertaining to the development of management systems for such officer.

Subcommittee on Personnel and Police. (3/2)—Matters pertaining to House employees and Police.

Subcommittee on Elections. (7/4)—Matters pertaining to the election of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress; corrupt practices; credentials and qualifications and Federal elections generally, including the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 and the Federal Election Commission.

(b) The chairman of the committee may appoint such ad hoc subcommittees as he deems appropriate.

(c) The chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member shall serve as ex officio members without vote of all subcommittees of the committee unless either member is appointed as a voting member of any subcommittee.

RULE NO. 17—POWERS AND DUTIES OF SUBCOMMITTEES

Each subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the full committee on all matters referred to it. Subcommittee chairmen shall set meeting dates after consultation with the chairman of the full committee and other subcommittee chairmen, with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of committee or subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible. It shall be the practice of the committee that meetings of subcommittees not be scheduled to occur simultaneously with meetings of the full committee. In order to ensure orderly and fair assignment of hearing and meeting rooms, hearings and meetings should be arranged in advance with the chairman through the staff director of the committee.

RULE NO. 18—REFERRAL OF LEGISLATION TO SUBCOMMITTEES

All legislation and other matters referred to the committee shall be referred by the chairman to the subcommittee of appropriate jurisdiction within 2 weeks, unless by majority vote of the members of the full committee, consideration is to be otherwise effected. The chairman may refer the matter simultaneously to two or more subcommittees, consistent with House Rule X, for concurrent consideration or for consideration in sequence (subject to appropriate time limitations), or divide the matter into two or more parts and refer each such part to a different subcommittee, or refer the matter pursuant to House Rule X to an ad hoc subcommittee appointed by the chairman for the specific purpose of considering that matter and reporting to the full committee thereon, or make such other provisions as may be considered appropriate. The chairman may designate a subcommittee chairman or other member to take responsibility as "floor manager" of a bill during its consideration in the House.

RULE NO. 19—OTHER PROCEDURES AND REGULATIONS

The chairman of the full committee may establish such other procedures and take such actions as may be necessary to carry out the foregoing rules or to facilitate the effective operation of the committee.

RULE NO 20—DESIGNATION OF CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE

For the purposes of these rules and the Rules of the House of Representatives, the staff director of the committee shall act as the clerk of the committee.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON). Pursuant to the order of the House of Thursday, January 3, 1985, the Chair declares the House in recess until approximately 8:40 p.m. this evening.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 7 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess until approximately 8:40 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 8 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m.

JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE HELD PURSUANT TO THE PROVISIONS OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1 TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The Speaker of the House presided.

The Doorkeeper, the Honorable James T. Malloy, announced the Vice President and Members of the U.S. Senate, who entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice President taking the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as members of the committee on the part of the House to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber:

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT]; the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY]; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT]; the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER]; the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS]; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL]; the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT]; the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP]; the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD]; and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Members will assemble in front of the rostrum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The President of the Senate, at the direction of that body, appoints the following Senators as members of the committee on the part of the Senate to escort the President of the United States:

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE]; the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON]; the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG]; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]; the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ]; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY]; the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]; the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS]; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]; the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON]; the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE]; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON]; the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD]; and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY].

The Doorkeeper announced the ambassadors, ministers, and chargés d'affaires of foreign governments.

The ambassadors, ministers, and chargés d'affaires for foreign governments entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

The Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

The Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 9 o'clock and 3 minutes p.m., the Doorkeeper announced the President of the United States.

The President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, and stood at the Clerk's desk.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, I have the high privilege and the distinct honor of presenting to you, and wishing to him a happy birthday, the President of the United States.

THE STATE OF THE UNION—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-25)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and fellow citizens. I come before you to report on the state of our Union. And I am pleased to report that, after 4 years of united effort, the American people have brought forth a Nation renewed—stronger, freer and more secure than before.

Four years ago, we began to change—forever, I hope—our assumptions about Government and its place in our lives. Out of that change has come great and robust growth—in our confidence, our economy, and our role in the world.

Tonight, America is stronger because of the values that we hold dear. We believe that faith and freedom must be our guiding stars, for they show us truth, they make us brave, give us hope, and leave us wiser than we were. Our progress began not in Washington, DC, but in the hearts of our families, communities, workplaces, and voluntary groups which, together, are unleashing the invincible spirit of one great Nation under God.

Four years ago, we said we would invigorate our economy by giving people greater freedom and incentives to take risks, and letting them keep more of what they earned.

We did what we promised, and a great industrial giant is reborn. Tonight we can take pride in 25 straight months of economic growth, the strongest in 34 years; a three-year inflation average of 3.9 percent, the lowest in 17 years; and 7.3 million new jobs in two years, with more of our citizens working than ever before.

New freedom in our lives has planted the rich seeds for future success:

For an America of wisdom that honors the family, knowing that as the family goes, so goes our civilization;

For an America of vision that sees tomorrow's dreams in the learning and hard work we do today;

For an America of courage whose servicemen and women, even as we meet, proudly stand watch on the frontiers of freedom;

For an America of compassion that opens its heart to those who cry out for help.

We have begun well. But it's only a beginning. We are not here to congratulate ourselves on what we have done, but to challenge ourselves to finish what has not yet been done.

We are here to speak for millions in our inner cities who long for real jobs, safe neighborhoods, and schools that truly teach. We are here to speak for the American farmer, the entrepreneur, and every worker in industries fighting to modernize and compete. And, yes, we are here to stand, and proudly so, for all who struggle to break free from totalitarianism; for all who know in their hearts that freedom is the one true path to peace and human happiness.

Proverbs tells us, without a vision the people perish. When asked what great principle holds our Union together, Abraham Lincoln said, "Something in (the) Declaration giving liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but hope to the world for all future time."

We honor the giants of our history, not by going back, but forward to the dreams their vision foresaw. My fellow citizens, this Nation is poised for greatness. The time has come to proceed toward a great new challenge—a Second American Revolution of hope and opportunity; a revolution carrying us to new heights of progress by pushing back frontiers of knowledge and space; a revolution of spirit that taps the soul of America, enabling us to summon greater strength than we have ever known; and, a revolution that carries beyond our shores the golden promise of human freedom in a world at peace.

Let us begin by challenging our conventional wisdom: There are no constraints on the human mind, no walls around the human spirit, no barriers to our progress except those we ourselves erect. Already, pushing down tax rates has freed our economy to vault forward to record growth.

In Europe, they are calling it "the American Miracle." Day by day, we are shattering accepted notions of what is possible. When I was growing up, we failed to see how a new thing called radio would transform our marketplace. Well, today many have not yet seen how advances in technology are transforming our lives.

In the late 1950's, workers at the AT&T semiconductor plant in Pennsylvania produced five transistors a day for $7.50 apiece. They now produce over a million for less than a penny apiece.

New laser techniques could revolutionize heart bypass surgery, cut diagnosis time for viruses linked to cancer from weeks to minutes, reduce hospital costs dramatically, and hold out new promise for saving human lives.

Our automobile industry has overhauled assembly lines, increased worker productivity, and is competitive once again.

We stand on the threshold of a great ability to produce more, do more, be more. Our economy is not getting older and weaker, it is getting younger and stronger. It doesn't need rest and supervision, it needs new challenge and greater freedom. And that word, freedom, is the key to the Second American Revolution that we mean to bring about.

Let us move together with a historic reform of tax simplification for fairness and growth. Last year I asked then Treasury Secretary Regan to develop a plan to simplify the tax code, so all taxpayers would be treated more fairly, and personal tax rates could come further down.

We have cut tax rates by almost 25 percent, yet the tax system remains unfair and limits our potential for growth. Exclusions and exemptions cause similar incomes to be taxed at different levels. Low-income families face steep tax barriers that make hard lives even harder. The Treasury Department has produced an excellent reform plan whose principles will guide the final proposal that we will ask you to enact.

One thing that tax reform will not be is a tax increase in disguise. We will not jeopardize the mortgage interest deduction that families need. We will reduce personal tax rates as low as possible by removing many tax preferences. We will propose a top rate of not more than 35 percent, and possibly lower. And we will propose reducing corporate rates while maintaining incentives for capital formation.

To encourage opportunity and jobs rather than dependency and welfare, we will propose that individuals living at or near the poverty line be totally exempt from Federal income tax. To restore fairness to families, we will propose increasing significantly the personal exemption.

And tonight, I am instructing Treasury Secretary James Baker—I have to get used to saying that—to begin working with congressional authors and committees for bipartisan legislation conforming to these principles. We will call upon the American people for support and upon every man and woman in this chamber. Together we can pass, this year, a tax bill for fairness, simplicity and growth, making this economy the engine of our dreams, and America the investment capital of the world. So let us begin.

Tax simplification will be a giant step toward unleashing the tremendous pent-up power of our economy. But a Second American Revolution must carry the promise of opportunity for all. It is time to liberate the spirit of enterprise in the most distressed areas of our country.

This Government will meet its responsibility to help those in need. But policies that increase dependency, break up families, and destroy self-respect are not progressive, they are reactionary. Despite our strides in civil rights, blacks, Hispanics, and all minorities will not have full and equal power until they have full economic power.

We have repeatedly sought passage of enterprise zones to help those in the abandoned corners of our land find jobs, learn skills, and build better lives. This legislation is supported by a majority of you. Mr. Speaker, I know we agree that there must be no forgotten Americans. Let us place new dreams in a million hearts and create a new generation of entrepreneurs by passing enterprise zones this year.

And "TIP," you could make that a birthday present.

Nor must we lose the chance to pass our Youth Employment Opportunity Wage proposal. We can help teenagers who have the highest unemployment rate find summer jobs, so they can know the pride of work, and have confidence in their futures.

We will continue to support the Job Training Partnership Act, which has a nearly two-thirds job placement rate. Credits and education and health care vouchers will help working families shop for services they need.

Our Administration is already encouraging certain low-income public housing residents to own and manage their own dwellings. It is time that all public housing residents have that opportunity of ownership.

The Federal Government can help create a new atmosphere of freedom. But States and localities, many of which enjoy surpluses from the recovery, must not permit their tax and regulatory policies to stand as barriers to growth.

Let us resolve that we will stop spreading dependency and start spreading opportunity; that we will stop spreading bondage and start spreading freedom.

There are some who say that growth initiatives must await final action on deficit reductions. Well, the best way to reduce deficits is through economic growth. More businesses will be started, more investments made, more jobs created, and more people will be on payrolls paying taxes. The best way to reduce Government spending is to reduce the need for spending by increasing prosperity. Each added percentage point per year of real G.N.P. growth will lead to a cumulative reduction in deficits of nearly $200 billion over five years.

To move steadily toward a balanced budget we must also lighten Government's claim on our total economy. We will not do this by raising taxes. We must make sure that our economy grows faster than the growth in spending by the Federal Government. In our Fiscal Year 1986 budget, overall Government program spending will be frozen at the current level; it must not be one dime higher than Fiscal Year 1985. And three points are key:

First, the social safety net for the elderly, the needy, the disabled, and unemployed will be left intact. Growth of our major health care programs, Medicare and Medicaid, will be slowed, but protections for the elderly and needy will be preserved.

Second, we must not relax our efforts to restore military strength just as we near our goal of a fully equipped, trained, and ready professional corps. National security is Government's first responsibility, so, in past years, defense spending took about half the Federal budget. Today it takes less than a third.

We have already reduced our planned defense expenditures by nearly $100 billion over the past 4 years, and reduced projected spending again this year. You know, we only have a military industrial complex until a time of danger. Then it becomes the arsenal of democracy. Spending for defense is investing in things that are priceless: peace and freedom.

Third, we must reduce or eliminate costly Government subsidies. For example, deregulation of the airline industry has led to cheaper airfares, but on Amtrak taxpayers pay about $35 per passenger every time an Amtrak train leaves the station. It's time we ended this huge Federal subsidy.

Our farm program costs have quadrupled in recent years. Yet I know from visiting farmers, many in great financial distress, that we need an orderly transition to a market-oriented farm economy. We can help farmers best, not by expanding Federal payments, but by making fundamental reforms, keeping interest rates heading down, and knocking down foreign trade barriers to American farm exports.

We are moving ahead with Grace Commission reforms to eliminate waste, and improve Government's management practices. In the long run, we must protect the taxpayers from Government. And I ask again that you pass, as 32 States have now called for, an amendment mandating the Federal Government spend no more than it takes in. And I ask for the authority used responsibly by 43 Governors to veto individual items in appropriations bills. Senator MATTINGLY has introduced a bill permitting a 2-year trial run of the line-item veto. I hope you will pass and send that legislation to my desk.

Nearly 50 years of Government living beyond its means has brought us to a time of reckoning. Ours is but a moment in history. But one moment of courage, idealism, and bipartisan unity can change American history forever.

Sound monetary policy is key to long-running economic strength and stability. We will continue to cooperate with the Federal Reserve Board, seeking a steady policy that ensures price stability, without keeping interest rates artificially high or needlessly holding down growth.

Reducing unneeded red tape and regulations, and deregulating the energy, transportation, and financial industries, have unleashed new competition, giving consumers more choices, better services, and lower prices. In just one set of grant programs we have reduced 905 pages of regulations to 31.

We seek to fully deregulate natural gas to bring on new supplies and bring us closer to energy independence. Consistent with safety standards, we will continue removing restraints on the bus and railroad industries; we will soon send up legislation to return Conrail to the private sector, where it belongs; and we will support further deregulation of the trucking industry.

Every dollar the Federal Government does not take from us, every decision it does not make for us, will make our economy stronger, or lives more abundant, our future more free.

Our Second American Revolution will push on to new possibilities not only on Earth, but in the next frontier of space. Despite budget restraints, we will seek record funding for research and development.

We have seen the success of the space shuttle. Now we are going to develop a permanently manned Space Station, and new opportunities for free enterprise because in the next decade Americans and our friends around the world will be living and working together in space.

In the zero gravity of space we could manufacture in 30 days lifesaving medicines it would take 30 years to make on Earth. We can make crystals of exceptional purity to produce super computers, creating jobs, technologies, and medical breakthroughs beyond anything we ever dreamed possible.

As we do all this, we will continue to protect our natural resources. We will seek reauthorization and expanded funding for the Superfund program, to continue cleaning up hazardous waste sites which threaten human health and the environment.

Now, there is another great heritage to speak of this evening. Of all the changes that have swept America the past four years, none brings greater promise than our rediscovery of the values of faith, freedom, family, work, and neighborhood.

We see signs of renewal in increased attendance in places of worship; renewed optimism and faith in our future; love of country rediscovered by our young who are leading the way. We have rediscovered that work is good in and of itself; that it ennobles us to create and contribute no matter how seemingly humble our jobs. We have seen a powerful new current from an old and honorable tradition—American generosity.

From thousands answering Peace Corps appeals to help boost food production in Africa, to millions volunteering time, corporations adopting schools, and communities pulling together to help the neediest among us at home, we have refound our values. Private sector initiatives are crucial to our future.

I thank the Congress for passing equal access legislation giving religious groups the same right to use classrooms after school that other groups enjoy. But no citizen should tremble, nor the world shudder, if a child stands in a classroom and breathes a prayer. We ask you again—give children back a right they had for a century and a half or more in this country.

The question of abortion grips our Nation. Abortion is either the taking of a human life or it isn't; and if it is—and medical technology is increasingly showing it is—it must be stopped.

It is a terrible irony that while some turn to abortion, so many others who cannot become parents cry out for children to adopt. We have room for these children; we can fill the cradles of those who want a child to love. Tonight I ask you in the Congress to move this year on legislation to protect the unborn.

In the area of education, we are returning to excellence and again the heroes are our people, not government. We are stressing basics of discipline, rigorous testing, and homework, while helping children become computer smart as well. For 20 years Scholastic Aptitude Test scores of our high school students went down. But now they have gone up two of the last three years.

We must go forward in our commitment to the new basics, giving parents greater authority and making sure good teachers are rewarded for hard work and achievement through merit pay.

Of all the changes in the past 20 years, none has more threatened our sense of national well-being than the explosion of violent crime. One does not have to be attacked to be a victim. The woman who must run to her car after shopping at night is a victim; the couple draping their door with locks and chains are victims; as is the tired, decent cleaning woman who can't ride a subway home without being afraid.

We do not seek to violate the rights of defendants. But shouldn't we feel more compassion for the victims of crime than for those who commit crime? For the first time in 20 years the crime index has fallen two years in a row; we have convicted over 7,400 drug offenders, and put them, as well as leaders of organized crime, behind bars in record numbers.

But we must do more. I urge the House to follow the Senate and enact proposals permitting use of all reliable evidence that police officers acquire in good faith. These proposals would also reform the habeus corpus laws and allow, in keeping with the will of the overwhelming majority of Americans, the use of the death penalty where necessary.

There can be no economic revival in ghettos when the most violent among us are allowed to roam free. It is time we restored domestic tranquility. And we mean to do just that.

Just as we are positioned as never before to secure justice in our economy, we are poised as never before to create a safer, freer, more peaceful world.

Our alliances are stronger than ever. Our economy is stronger than ever. We have resumed our historic role as a leader of the free world—and all of these together are a great force for peace.

Since 1981 we have been committed to seeking fair and verifiable arms agreements that would lower the risk of war and reduce the size of nuclear arsenals. Now our determination to maintain a strong defense has influenced the Soviet Union to return to the bargaining table. Our negotiators must be able to go to that table with the united support of the American people. All of us have no greater dream than to see the day when nuclear weapons are banned from this Earth forever.

Each Member of the Congress has a role to play in modernizing our defenses, thus supporting our chances for a meaningful arms agreement. Your vote this spring on the Peacekeeper missile will be a critical test of our resolve to maintain the strength we need and move toward mutual and verifiable arms reductions.

For the past 20 years we have believed that no war will be launched as long as each side knows it can retaliate with a deadly counterstrike. Well, I believe there is a better way of eliminating the threat of nuclear war.

It is a Strategic Defense Initiative aimed ultimately at finding a non-nuclear defense against ballistic missiles. It is the most hopeful possibility of the nuclear age. But it is not well understood.

Some say it will bring war to the heavens—but its purpose is to deter war, in the heavens and on Earth. Some say the research would be expensive. Perhaps, but it could save millions of lives, indeed humanity itself. Some say if we build such a system the Soviets will build a defense system of their own. Well, they already have strategic defenses that surpass ours; a civil defense system, where we have almost none; and a research program covering roughly the same areas of technology we are exploring. And finally, some say the research will take a long time. The answer to that is: "Let's get started."

Harry Truman once said that ultimately our security and the world's hopes for peace and human progress, "lie not in measures of defense or in the control of weapons, but in the growth and expansion of freedom and self-government."

Tonight we declare anew to our fellow citizens of the world: Freedom is not the sole prerogative of a chosen few; it is the universal right of all God's children. Look to where peace and prosperity flourish today. It is in homes that freedom built. Victories against poverty are greatest and peace most secure where people live by laws that ensure free press, free speech, and freedom to worship, vote, and create wealth.

Our mission is to nourish and defend freedom and democracy and to communicate these ideals everywhere we can.

America's economic success is freedom's success; it can be repeated a hundred times in a hundred different nations. Many countries in East Asia and the Pacific have few resources other than the enterprise of their own people. But through low tax rates and free markets they have soared ahead of centralized economies. And now China is opening up its economy to meet its needs.

We need a stronger and simpler approach to the process of making and implementing trade policy and will be studying potential changes in that process in the next few weeks.

We have seen the benefits of free trade and lived through the disasters of protectionism. Tonight I ask all our trading partners, developed and developing alike, to join us in a new round of trade negotiations to expand trade and competition, and strengthen the global economy—and to begin it in this next year.

There are more than 3 billion human beings living in Third World Countries with an average per capita income of $650 a year. Many are victims of dictatorships that impoverish them with taxation and corruption. Let us ask our allies to join us in a practical program of trade and assistance that fosters economic development through personal incentives to help these people climb from poverty on their own. We cannot play innocents abroad in a world that is not innocent. Nor can we be passive when freedom is under siege. Without resources, diplomacy cannot succeed. Our security assistance programs help friendly governments defend themselves, and give them confidence to work for peace. And I hope that you in the Congress will understand that dollar for dollar security assistance contributes as much to global security as our own defense budget.

We must stand by all our democratic allies. And we must not break faith with those who are risking their lives on every continent, from Afghanistan to Nicaragua, to defy Soviet-supported aggression and secure rights which have been ours from birth.

The Sandinista dictatorship of Nicaragua, with full Cuban Soviet-bloc support not only persecutes its people, the church, and denies a free press, but arms and provides bases for communist terrorists attacking neighboring states. Support for freedom fighters is self-defense, and totally consistent with the OAS and U.N. Charters. It is essential that the Congress continue all facets of our assistance to Central America. I want to work with you to support the democratic forces whose struggle is tied to our own security.

Tonight I have spoken of great plans and great dreams. They are dreams we can make come true. Two hundred years of American history should have taught us that nothing is impossible.

Ten years ago a young girl left Vietnam with her family, part of the exodus that followed the fall of Saigon. They came to the United States with no possessions and not knowing a word of English, 10 years ago. The young girl studied hard, learned English, and finished high school in the top of her class. And this May, May 22 to be exact, is a big date on her calendar. Just 10 years from the time she left Vietnam she will graduate from the United States Military Academy at West Point.

I thought you might like to meet an American hero named Jean Nguyen.

Now, there is someone else here tonight—born 79 years ago. She lives in the inner city where she cares for infants born of mothers who are heroin addicts. The children born in withdrawal are sometimes even dropped at her doorstep. She helps them with love.

Go to her house some night and maybe you will see her silhouette against the window as she walks the floor, talking softly, soothing a child in her arms. Mother Hale of Harlem, and she, too, is an American hero.

Jean, Mother Hale, your lives tell us that the oldest American saying is new again—anything is possible in America if we have the faith, the will, and the heart.

History is asking us once again to be a force for good in the world. Let us begin—in unity, with justice and love.

Thank you and God bless you.

JOINT SESSION DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The joint session will be dissolved.

Accordingly, at 9 o'clock and 43 minutes p.m., the joint session of the two Houses was dissolved.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares a brief recess.

SENATE—Wednesday, February 6, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; the world and they that dwell therein.—Psalm 24:1.

Lord of all the Earth, God of the nations, Sovereign of history, You know all the conflicting interests and forces that are building up as the Senate gets down to business. Help us all to be patient as the democratic process works its way through the myriad of ideas, concerns, problems, and needs of this diverse Republic. Save Senators from pride and selfishness and fear of political risk as they stand in the vortex of the collision of powerful special and public interests. Grant, God of love, Democrat and Republican, conservative, liberal, and moderate, House of Representatives, Senate, and White House, may find resolution to conflict which jeopardizes the common good. Help them through the maze of monumental issues to unity and peace. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, after the two leaders have been recognized under the standing order for 10 minutes each, there are special orders not to exceed 15 minutes each for Senators SPECTER, PROXMIRE, BOREN, HEFLIN, BYRD, CRANSTON, INOUYE, and COHEN.

Following the recognition of those Senators there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 2 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following the conclusion of morning business, it will be the intention of the leadership to go into executive session to consider the nominations of William Bennett and Donald Hodel.

Following debate on the two nominations, it will be the intention of the leadership to turn to the nomination of John Herrington. Therefore, rollcall votes can be expected during the session of the Senate today.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 8:30 P.M. TODAY

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business during the day, it stand in recess until 8:30 p.m. this evening. Senators are asked to assemble in the Senate Chamber no later than 8:45 p.m., to proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear the President's State of the Union Address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the special order in favor of the Senator from Maine [Mr. COHEN] for today be vitiated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that Senators who have special orders for today be recognized in the order in which they appear in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I yield back any remaining leader time that I may have.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting minority leader is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on behalf of the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that his time be reserved until a later time today if he so desires to use it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

WHAT HAS KEPT THE NUCLEAR PEACE FOR MORE THAN 30 YEARS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, for the answer, consider: Would a war between the United States and the Soviet Union in all likelihood destroy both countries? Yes, indeed. Here is why: Each country has 8,000 to 10,000 strategic nuclear warheads and thousands of additional thermonuclear warheads. Each country has the capacity to deliver most of those warheads directly onto targets in the other country. Each country has an invulnerable arsenal of thousands of nuclear weapons that would certainly survive a nuclear preemptive strike by the other side. That means that each superpower would keep the capacity to deliver total destruction even after the other country has initiated its strongest and most successful possible preemptive first strike. Within the foreseeable future neither country is likely to gain an advantage that would permit it to prevail in a nuclear war. That is, neither country could win in any sense. Both countries would suffer total destruction of their cities, and lose much, probably most, of their population. On top of all this in the view of our most competent scientific experts, there is a clear possibility—quoting the Academy of Science Report—that such a nuclear war would set off a nuclear winter that would constitute the most destructive environmental disaster in 65 million years. If it occurred, that nuclear winter could wipe out most of the world's food production for years and bring about the starvation of most of the world's survivors.

The question is, "Could a nuclear war, once started, be stopped short of the mutual suicide of the two superpowers and the nuclear winter that might ensue?" The answer is an emphatic "No." Of course a war between Russia and the United States might start with a conventional clash in Western Europe, or in Cuba and the Caribbean, or in the Middle East or even Asia, or out of clashes involving North and South Korea or Taiwan and China. The most likely way for either power to push the other into backing down would be by threatening nuclear response if the other did not back down or by actually using tactical nuclear weapons in a limited way as an earnest of its intention to risk nuclear war and the double suicide that would follow unless the other side complied. In those circumstances, the other side might avert a nuclear war by backing down as the Russians did in the Cuban missile crisis in 1962, or it might not. Why would it not back down? To back down means it would lose to live to fight another day. Not to back down means both sides would lose and neither would live to fight another day. So it seems logical that the side willing to risk nuclear war would always prevail. Why then has not one side or the other pushed its differences with the other superpower to the brink of nuclear war or even beyond, knowing that the other side will not choose mutual suicide?

In the more than 30 years that mutual deterrence has kept the nuclear peace—only once—the Cuban missile crisis—has either side threatened nuclear war unless the other side gave in, and that was more than 20 years ago. Is it because both sides have been building cooperation and understanding with the other? Obviously not. The hostility between Russia and the United States has never been more intense. There has been no significant progress in arms control for years. The Soviets have stepped up their rhetorical attacks on the United States. Our President has called the Soviet Union an evil empire. If cooperation and friendliness have not worked, something has. What is it? It is massive, naked, brutal nuclear power on both sides. What irony. In a world in which we Americans deeply believe that salvation comes from forgiveness, from helping others, loving our enemy, we have found peace—at least between Russia and the United States—has come from the most dangerous kind of nuclear muscle. Sadly we have not conquered war with love. We have conquered it with fear. But conquer it we have and for many years. More important, it now seems likely that as long as both sides maintain their fearsome deterrents, they will both continue to observe this uneasy, costly, dangerous peace. It is good to dream of peace based on love and mutual helpfulness.

Maybe in a different world, a world devoid of sovereign political entities, devoid of countries that reserve to themselves as part of their sovereignty the absolute right to go to war any time it serves their national interest to do so—maybe in that different world, love would triumph. That is not the real world. It is not this world. In this world, fear triumphs. You do not like it. I do not like it. No one likes it. But it works. We live. We live in the midst of immense potential destruction, conceivably destruction that could end the existence of mankind on Earth. So what keeps the peace? The fear of that immense destruction. That is what keeps the peace.

HOW BAD A YEAR WAS 1984 FOR AMERICA'S BANKS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the year 1984 was not nearly as bad a year for the Nation's banks as some surface statistics might suggest. But it was a worse year than it should have been. We can learn something from the pattern of success, and there was such a pattern in 1984, as well as the pattern of failure. In a sense the record of 1984 in banking should be reasonably reassuring. Superficially the bad news is impressive. Consider: the actual number of bank failures were the highest in 46 years. Those failures were about eight times higher than the number of annual bank failures on the average in the 1960's and 1970's. On the other hand, the total deposits of banks failing were less than a third of the deposits of the banks that failed in 1982.

It is, of course, true that if the regulators had not stepped in with a bailout the Continental Illinois Bank might have failed with a crash that would have shot the total deposits of failed banks to a level four times higher than the previous record set in 1982 for deposits held by failing banks. But it is also true that unlike 1932, when 4,000 banks failed—that's right 4,000, not 78, as failed last year—the depositors in the 1984 failing banks lost little or nothing. Depositors with less than $100,000 in their accounts were fully insured.

Furthermore, in 1984, other banks took over liability of the failing banks for deposits both large and small. Undoubtedly, bank borrowers suffered more than depositors because of interruptions in their line of credit, but borrowers, too, in most cases, were able to secure alternative credit. Were there any losers? Of course, many employees and management of failed banks lost their jobs. Bank stockholders suffered losses, in some cases heartbreaking losses. But risking losses is a critical function of a stockholder. In fact, back in the thirties when yields on both stocks and bonds were typically below 3 percent, a renowned banking expert at Harvard, Professor Ebersole, used to ask each of his classes if a bank that paid its stockholders dividends of 10 percent every year for 50 years and then failed, was really a failure. The professor considered such a bank a roaring success. Of course, an uninsured depositor—and, prior to 1932, depositors were not insured—would have a very different view.

If we recognize that risk taking and business cycles are both hallmarks of a free economic society, some failures of the Nation's 15,000 commercial banks must be expected an accepted as a necessary price of a competitive and productive economic system. Seventy-nine failures out of 15,000 banks works out to about a one-half of 1 percent failure rate in the worst year in 46 years.

Think of that, Mr. President. One-half of 1 percent failure rate in the worst year in almost 50 years. There is probably no industry in America that can approach that record and these failures have had very limited consequences. This is particularly true in American banking because, in the 1984 bank failures, the customers of each of the failed banks, especially its depositors, suffered few if any losses. A big part of a bank's responsibility is to take risks. The year 1984 was a bad year for farmers. Farm foreclosures were very large. A bank that pursed a wholly prudent, take-no-risk course could not have accommodated the needs of farmers in Kansas or Nebraska, perhaps in Texas. If no banks had failed in the farm States, there would have been a legitimate reason for suspecting that the banks may not have been doing their job. On the other hand, strong bank regulation could require bank diversification in their loans so that the overwhelming majority of banks operating even in troubled economic areas would survive.

More troubling than the rapidly escalating number of failures was the explosion in the FDIC's list of problem banks. Before 1983, the record number of banks listed as problems was 380. This year, that number swelled to 817. And that list includes some very big banks, indeed. The Nation's second largest bank—Bank of America—and its 10th largest bank—the First National Bank of Chicago—reported multimillion dollar loan losses. In both cases, the regulators required the bank's directors to sign legally binding agreements that the banks would be run more prudently.

Almost two thirds of the 1984 bank failures were confined to nine States. There were no bank failures in 1984 in any of the New England States, none in New York, none in Pennsylvania, or in Wisconsin, North or South Carolina, or Georgia. Ohio, with very high unemployment and a generally shaky economy, also had no bank failures. Tennessee, on the other hand, suffered 11 failures. Since banks are regulated by State as well as Federal regulators, it appears that the regulators in the nine States suffering 51 of the Nation's 79 bank failures can learn something from the 25 States which had no failures whatsoever.

THE MURDER OF A NATION

genocide has not received the historical attention warranted by the slaughter of approximately 1,000,000 people. The dearth of publicity subsequent to this barbarity has compounded the tragedy of one of the darkest episodes in recorded history.

Fortunately, however, more than a few people have been unwilling to allow a jaded world to completely forget or ignore the ghastly spectres of the past. Armenian and non-Armenian, men and women, living and dead, they have striven to preserve the genocidal evidence for the historical jury. They have done so not only because of their anguish over the horrors of genocide but also because of their determination to prevent similar occurrences in the future.

Henry Morgenthau was one such person. As the U.S. Ambassador to Turkey during the first half of World War I, Morgenthau worked assiduously—and in vain—in an effort to persuade the Turkish leaders to reconsider their intention to annihilate their Armenian subjects. He published his memoirs upon his return to the United States, including a section entitled, "The Murder of a Nation," from whence the following hideous story is drawn.

As Morgenthau informs the reader, the Turkish persecution of the Armenians was an ongoing affair. Under the Sultan Abdul Hamid, large-scale massacres occurred frequently during the last 25 years of the 19th century. At the height of heinousness, in 1895 and 1896, nearly 200,000 Armenians perished. Those deaths, however, proved to be merely a prelude to the truly colossal campaign of destruction which followed 20 years later.

In April of 1915, the young Turk leaders of the wartime government decided that they had arrived at the most propitious time for Armenian genocide on a scale without precedence. They had repulsed allied forces in the west, and the Russians had been compelled to retreat in the east. Only Germany could have stood in their way, but Germany was fighting alongside the Turks. As a result, the old hatred kindled by religious differences and economic resentment soon found expression in a policy described by Morgenthau as more horrible than anything "in the whole history of the human race."

The thousands of Armenians who were rounded up and shot immediately were comparatively lucky. The rest were forced to undergo an exodus march toward the Syrian desert. Some, including pregnant women and the elderly, were killed and tortured along the way by Turks and Kurdish villagers, while many others collapsed from dehydration. Very few survived the ordeal. As Morgenthau states, about 1,200,000 people started on the journey in which "all roads led to death."

There can be no justice for the slain Armenians, no redress of grievances, and no promised land after their one-way trip through Hell in the guise of the Turkish desert. But at least we can prevent the infliction of the final indignity by keeping alive the memory of their wretched fate.

We can also advance the cause of human rights protection by consenting to ratification of the Genocide Convention. More than 90 countries have become parties to this treaty, which is emblematic of the universal desire to avoid replays of 1915. This community of nations awaits the decision of the world's most powerful moral force to join them and thereby strengthen a vitally important human rights accord.

GOLDEN FLEECE FOR FEBRUARY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Sunday, I gave my Golden Fleece of the Month Award for February to the Defense Department for spending nearly $28,000 on a futile, possibly illegal, venture to fly nine Members of Congress to and from Washington in posh executive jets so they would not miss a close vote on the MX missile. The Department lost on a 199-197 vote, so the $28,000 was not only wasted but also proved to be all but illegal.

Picture the situation. The MX had survived an earlier, close vote in the House. Now, on May 31, 1984, it faces another test and the vote looks close. The Department counts noses and discovers that after the Memorial Day recess, some MX supporters are still away from Washington.

The Pentagon pulls out all the stops. It scrambles its fleet of posh executive jets. They wing their way around America to pick up the missile's stray supporters and rush them back to Washington. The taxpayers pay the tab of $11,744.

In every case, commercial flights were available. They would have made it to Washington within 30 minutes to 3 hours of the time the military's Washington express arrived. These flights would have cost $1,431. Opponents of the MX had to use commercial flights to come back to vote.

Now the irony. The Department lost the vote by 199-197. But to demonstrate its gratitude, the next day, it flew four Members back out into the country at a cost of $16,016. Commercial flights to the same destinations would have cost $1,367.

According to the General Accounting Office, the Department has no legal authority to provide such flights. The best justification the Pentagon could offer was to bleat that Congress had not prohibited such flights.

I thought this administration was committed to a strict constructionist approach to the law. But when it comes to the Defense Department, the only principle it follows is: Anything goes, unless Congress says No. Imagine the howls of outrage had the Carter administration followed this standard in deciding how to protect workers' safety or eliminate subsidies to water projects.

Finally, the Department's abuse of power raises an issue of simple fairness. Do not hold your breath until it cranks up those jets to find Members who want to vote to cut some fat from the defense budget. 'Billions for us but not one cent for the deficit' is now the motto at the Pentagon.

The Department's high-flown tactics are enough to make every taxpayer want to cause a flap. This Senator also thinks their wings should be clipped.

ORDER FOR AGGREGATION OF CERTAIN SPECIAL ORDERS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the special orders entered on behalf of Senators BYRD, CRANSTON, and INOUYE be aggregated and be under the control of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HEFLIN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for not to exceed 1 hour.

SENATOR LISTER HILL OF ALABAMA: A GREAT HUMANITARIAN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on December 20, 1984, just 9 days short of his 90th birthday, death came to one of this Nation's finest public servants. I am speaking of former U.S. Senator Lister Hill of Alabama, who served in Congress for more than 45 years, 32 of them in this august Chamber.

Although I would be remiss in my responsibility to the people of Alabama if I did not speak in high praise of Senator Hill here on the floor of the Senate, I should like to say that Lister Hill needs no eulogy from me or any other person. He has written his own history and written it indelibly with a brillant record of legislative accomplishments which have seldom been surpassed or equalled in the history of our Nation. Many of the great legislative landmarks of our time owe their enactment to the commitment and genius of Lister Hill.

Senator Hill was born in Montgomery, AL. His father and his family before him were pioneers in Alabama and his family is among Alabama's most distinguished families. Lister Hill's great grandfather, Rev. William W. Hill, and his grandfather, Rev. L.L. Hill, were methodist preachers. His father, Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, was one the South's foremost surgeons and the first American surgeon to accomplish a successful suture of the heart. Senator Hill's mother was Miss Lilly Lyons, daughter of Mr. Lyons of Mobile, a Confederate veteran who fought under Gen. Albert Sidney Johnson.

Mr. President, Senator Hill was indeed a southern gentleman in the truest sense of the term. He was proud of the South and its many fine traditions. Yet, Senator Hill was never a purely parochial Senator. He was a Senator of the United States as his brilliant record of Congress clearly reveals.

Motivated by an inherent sense of noblesse oblige, Senator Hill recognized and embraced the responsibilities of public service from the first day he went to Congress in 1923 at age 27 until his retirement in 1969. For more than 4½ decades, Lister Hill's single goal was a better life for all people and throughout his entire career he worked that the blessings of America might be shared by all the people.

Here in the Senate, Lister Hill stood tall—a giant among giants. His record of accomplishments is awesome. They are massive in number and impressive in scope and substance.

Time does not permit me to chronicle the many outstanding achievements of this gifted legislator. The record will show, however, that Senator Hill was the master architect and builder of numerous legislative landmarks. Senator Hill fought wholeheartedly to advance educational opportunities, to benefit the causes of our veterans, to promote more and better agriculture, and to ensure the working man and woman decent hours and fair wages under decent working conditions. Moreover, Lister Hill was always a defender of the ideals and principles upon which our country was founded. His long services on the military committees of both Houses of Congress made him a recognized expert on the military and the security of our Nation.

Mr. President, one of Senator Hill's outstanding accomplishments was his leadership in the vital breakthroughs for the economic and industrial development of the South and Alabama. It was his amendment to the Transportation Act of 1940 which led to the removal of discriminatory freight rates found to be unfair to the South. I think that historians and economists will all agree that the greatest single factor in the tremendous industrial growth which we have witnessed in the South and in Alabama since World War II is the equalization of freight rates.

High on my list of Senator Hill's accomplishments is his outstanding work in water resource development. He authored the legislation for the comprehensive development of the Coosa-Alabama Waterway and coauthored the legislation which led to the construction of the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway. Just a few days ago the first barge tow traversed the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway, and I sorely regret that Senator Hill did not live to see the results of his efforts to make this mighty water-highway a reality.

Most important, Senator Hill was coauthor with Senator George Norris of Nebraska of the bill which created the Tennessee Valley Authority. Additionally, it was his skill and perseverance that protected this mighty engine for democracy from ceaseless political and propaganda attacks by enemies of TVA. The record will show that it was Lister Hill of Alabama who searched out and, in a speech on this very floor, exposed the secret Dixon-Yates scheme, a plan concocted by anti-TVA groups to dismember the agency. Parenthetically, I might add, in the decision striking down the Dixon-Yates scheme, the U.S. Supreme Court acknowledged Senator Hill's Senate speech exposing the illegal conflict-of-interest features of the arrangement.

Prior to America's entry into World War II, Senator Hill, foreseeing the vital importance of aluminum in wartime, urged the Reynolds Metals Co. to produce this strategic metal which was produced at that time by only one other company in the United States. Through the steadfast efforts of Senator Hill, the Reynolds organization obtained a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and began to produce aluminum at Muscle Shoals, AL, and out of gratitude to Senator Hill for his vision and efforts, the Reynolds Co. named its plant and community site Listerhill. This particular industry has produced aluminum for our national defense and domestic use, and since its inception has brought thousands of jobs, millions upon millions of dollars in payrolls, and huge business investments into Alabama and throughout the Nation.

Yet, for all his outstanding contributions in so many vital areas, Senator Hill's particular charge was his work in the fields of health and medical research. He devoted his entire service in the Congress to helping fashion the tools and lay the foundations for the medical research, hospitals, and training and educational facilities which have led to the great strides that science, medicine, and public health have taken.

Of the many outstanding health programs which bear Lister Hill's name, perhaps the one with the most importance is the Hospital and Health Center Construction Act, popularly known as the Hill-Burton Act. More than 10,000 general hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoriums, crippled children's clinics, diagnostic and training centers, and other medical facilities have been built throughout our Nation under the program.

The Hill-Burton Act is, of course, only one of many, many programs that Senator Hill initiated or gave powerful impetus to in the fields of health and medicine. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to find anyone in our history who has done so much for the health of his fellowman as Lister Hill. Millions of Americans live better and longer because of Lister Hill, because of his total commitment to their well-being.

Alabama has given her share of great men and women to our Nation in the fields of education, public health, the arts and sciences, industry, agriculture, and our national defense. Their contributions are milestones in the march of progress. Upon Alabama's horizon of greatness, however, there is no brighter luminary than Lister Hill, the pure personification of a public servant. The betterment of his fellowman was his platform, his creed, and his record.

I am glad that Alabama can claim Lister Hill for her own. When I think of the exemplary and brilliant record of this extraordinary man, I am especially proud to be an Alabamian.

Mr. President, Senator Hill is survived by his widow, the former Henrietta Fontaine McCormick, and by a son and a daughter, all of Montgomery. On behalf of the people of Alabama, I extend my deepest sympathy to the family of Senator Hill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that several articles concerning Senator Hill's life and work be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LISTER HILL, "MR. HEALTH," DEAD AT 89

(By Peggy Sanford)

Lister Hill, who represented Alabama in the U.S. House and Senate for 46 years, championing the cause of health care nationwide, died Thursday at Jackson Hospital in Montgomery. He was 89.

He was admitted to the hospital Wednesday with pneumonia, said his daughter, Henrietta Hill Hubbard of Montgomery.

Hill would have celebrated his 90th birthday Dec. 29.

"Alabama has lost one of the greatest men who ever served in the U.S. Senate," Gov. George Wallace said Thursday night.

"He was a longtime personal and political friend," said Wallace, who supported Hill in his successful Senate re-election campaign in 1962.

Wallace praised Hill for the Hill-Burton Act, which he said "provided much needed hospitals throughout the country."

Hill, who became known as "the statesman of health" and was often called "Mr. Health" by his colleagues in Congress, retired to his Montgomery home in 1968 after 31 years in the U.S. Senate.

He began his congressional career in 1923 in the U.S. House of Representatives at the age of 28. He served for 15 years in the House, leaving in 1938 when he was appointed to fill the Senate seat vacated by the appointment of Hugo Black to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Hill-Burton Act that provided federal funds for construction and renovation of medical facilities, particularly in lower-income areas, is the senator's most well-known achievement, although he also sponsored legislation such as the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority.

With federal funds from the Hill-Burton Act, 9,200 medical facilities have been built in the United States since 1947, including all but two of Alabama's 67 county hospitals.

"Our strength as a country depends on the health of the people," Hill said in a 1978 interview. "I'll tell you, we ought to do all we can do to have a healthy people."

There's little question Hill did all he could do toward that end.

Along with the Hill-Burton Act that allowed for health facilities in many areas that could not have attained them without federal help, Hill also sponsored the original bill to establish the National Institutes of Health, which launched a massive federally sponsored health research program.

He supported training of health workers for the country through bills such as the omnibus Health Act of 1956, the Health Professions Education Assistance Act of 1963 and the Nurse Training Act of 1964.

Hill was the son of Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, reputedly the first surgeon to perform sutures on the human heart.

Mrs. Hubbard said the operation was performed on a kitchen table, by the light of a kerosene lamp, as Dr. Hill successfully treated a stab wound to a teenage boy.

Hill was named for Lord Joseph Lister, under whom his father had studied medicine in London, Mrs. Hubbard said.

Mrs. Hubbard said her father "knew particularly that the South didn't have the money that other parts of the country had, so it didn't have the doctors and the facilities.

"He was always interested in humanity and in trying to help people, and he was interested in medicine because of his father," she said. "That's why he did what he did with Hill-Burton."

Dr. Joseph Volker, former president of the University of Alabama at Birmingham, said Hill "had a great understanding for the practice of medicine," and, therefore, was able to address all aspects, from health care to research to education in his legislation. Lister Hill, probably as much or more than anyone else, was a great stimulus for (medical) research."

Medical fellowships and scholarships came into being because Hill knew eight to 10 years of graining would be needed to produce researchers who would be able to study, understand and find cures for disease, Volker said.

Aside from his influence on improving health and medicine in the United States, Hill's sponsorship of the TVA Act also helped improve living standards throughout much of the Tennessee Valley.

The TVA Act originally was known as the Norris-Hill Act, said U.S. Sen. Howell Heflin of Tuscumbia.

One of Hill's last public appearances was in Colbert County during TVA's 50th anniversary celebration in 1983, Heflin said. After receiving a standing ovation, Hill delighted the audience by saying he looked forward to attending TVA's 100th anniversary celebration.

"His accomplishments for America and Alabama are just numerous," Heflin said. "I consider him to be one of the great stalwarts of the U.S. Senate in the 20th Century."

Heflin said Hill was responsible both for Reynolds Aluminum establishing a plant near Sheffield, and for the company becoming involved in aluminum production in the first place. The plant is located in Lister Hill, Ala.

Hill talked Richard Reynolds Sr. into going into aluminum production just before the U.S. entered World War II because President Franklin D. Roosevelt said aluminum was needed for aircraft production, Heflin said.

Bob Jones, a retired congressman from Scottsboro, said of Hill, "No public figure has contributed to the state of Alabama and the republic as he did."

Jones, who was chairman of the Public Works Committee in the U.S. House, said he worked with Hill in getting many budgets passed in Congress. "TVA always had to be nursed and kept," Jones said.

"He was a political artist, an intellectual genius and a perfect gentleman," Jones said.

Aubrey J. Wagner, chairman of the TVA board from 1962-78, said he worked closely with Hill on getting funding for the agency. Wagner said he remembered that in 1954, Hill got $1 million put back in the Senate's TVA budget for resource development. "That saved TVA," Warner said.

A graveside service with military honor guard will be Saturday at Greenwood Cemetery in Montgomery, Leak Memory Chapel directing.

Hill also was an Army captain in World War I.

Survivors other than Mrs. Hubbard include his wife, Henrietta; a son L. Lister Hill, Montgomery; a brother, Luther Lyons Hill, Des Moines, Iowa; and two sisters, Amelie Hill Laslie, his twin, and Lillion Hill Rucker, both of Montgomery.

The family requests memorials be made to the UAB Medical Center.

SENATOR LISTER HILL

A giant has passed from among us. U.S. Sen. Lister Hill of Alabama, who represented this state almost half a century in Washington, died last week.

The bare outline of Sen. Hill's career suggests the dimensions of his life: First president of the student body at the University of Alabama; Army captain in World War I; elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1923 at age 28; elected senator in 1938 to assume the mantle of Hugo Black and a member of the Senate for 31 years before retiring to private life in 1968.

What he achieved along that way, especially in terms of improving health care available to all Americans, is even more significant, however. Although recognized as a vigorous New Deal legislator who worked tirelessly for projects of such significance to Alabama as the Tennessee Valley Authority, Sen. Hill made his most significant and lasting contributions in the field of health care.

Himself the son of a surgeon (and named for English physician Joseph Lister, the founder of antiseptic surgery, with whom his father studied), Sen. Hill brought a personal compassion and sensitivity to health matters that, combined with his skillful politics and intellectual power, resulted in some of the most significant legislation—not merely health legislation, but legislation of any sort—in the nation's history.

Through the Hill-Burton Act, some 9,200 medical facilities have been built in the U.S. since 1947 (including all but two of Alabama's 67 county hospitals). This landmark law has brought modern health care to literally millions of Americans, not only lengthening lives but making those lives more healthy, happy and productive. In any culture history of the nation, the achievement of this piece of legislation must rank as one of the most significant advances in the life of the average citizen.

Yet Sen. Hill recognized fully that medicine is more than brick and mortar. Through his sponsorship of research and training in legislation that established the National Institutes of Health and provided training for doctors and nurses, he sought to nurture the soul as well the body of health care.

Even beyond all this, however, there was an added facet to Sen. Hill and his career that merits admiration.

He was a gentleman. In the best and highest meaning of that often abused term, Sen. Hill brought to his life a personal modesty, high ethical standard and courtly manner that, sad to say, are difficult to find today in Washington or Alabama for that matter.

In that sense, as much as for his specific achievements, great as they were, Sen. Hill was truly a giant among us. His passing is to be mourned, but the example he set, happily, will always remain with us.

SENATOR LISTER HILL, ALABAMA ADVOCATE OF NIH, DIES

(By J. Y. Smith)

Former Senator Lister Hill, 89, a courtly and patrician Alabama Democrat who devoted himself to health and education for the common man during the 45 years he served on Capitol Hill, died of pneumonia Dec. 20 at Jackson Hospital in Montgomery, Ala.

Sen. Hill, a child of privilege, a lawyer by training, and a politician by profession, took his seat in the U.S. House of Representatives on Aug. 14, 1923, after a special election. He was appointed to the U.S. Senate on Jan. 19, 1938, to fill the unexpired term of Hugo Black, who had been appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court. When Sen. Hill retired on Jan. 3, 1969, having declined to seek reelection, he had served in Congress longer than any other Alabaman.

A supporter of the New Deal of president Franklin D. Roosevelt, Sen. Hill was a sponsor of some of the major programs of the 1930s and 1940s, including the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Housing Act, the Rural Telephone Act and the GI Bill of Rights for veterans of World War II and the Korean conflict.

But he was best known for his unflagging support for health and education. He was the "father" of the National Institutes of Health. He was a sponsor of the Hill-Burton Act of 1946, under which more than 9,200 medical facilties have been built with federal assistance, many of them in poor and rural areas. He supported the Medicare and Medicaid programs and Social Security.

In 1958, the first bill providing federal aid to education passed Congress. The chief credit was given to the Alabama senator, who had championed such legislation since his days in the House.

Such effectiveness was not a matter of accident. Principal sources of Sen. Hill's power were his committee assignments and the workings of the seniority system. In 1955, he became chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, with responsibility for health and education bills. He also chaired the subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee that handled the budget for the old Department of Health, Education and Welfare. He was thus in a position both to initiate and guide legislation and to see that it was funded.

Apart from the power that these positions gave him, Sen. Hill was a quintessential "man of the Senate." He was respected not only for his seriousness of purpose, but also for his warmth and charm. Like many of his contemporaries from the South, politics was the work of his life, not something to adorn the end of a career. He worked at his profession and garnered the power that came with his long service.

He was a progressive from a part of the country where politics were deeply divided between "the interests"—the banks and railroads and big business in general—and the populist movement that attracted many farmers and tradesmen who looked to government for assistance.

Progressive though he was, he was a man of his time and place on racial questions. He opposed the great civil rights acts of the 1950s and 1960s. "I had to do that to get elected," the senator said in an interview in 1977. "We all did."

In a tribute, Gov. C. Wallace, who managed Sen. Hill's election campaign in 1962, said, "Alabama has lost one of the greatest men who ever sat in the U.S. Senate."

Lister Hill was born into a numerous and prosperous family on Dec. 29, 1894, at Montgomery. His father was Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, a physician and surgeon who had studied in England with Joseph Lister who introduced antiseptic surgery.

The future senator was named after his father's teacher. Dr. Hill also wanted his son to follow his footsteps into medicine. He turned instead to law. He proved a brilliant student, graduating from the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa in 1914 with a Phi Beta Kappa key. He earned a law degree at Alabama in 1915 and also studied law at the University of Michigan and Columbia University.

In 1916, he opened a law practice in Montgomery. During World War I, he served in the Army. From 1917 to 1922, he was president of the Montgomery Board of Education. He always attributed his interest in education to this experience.

According to one story, Sen. Hill became interested in politics while at Alabama. A student government association was being formed and he decided to run for its presidency. Women's suffrage was being debated at the time. Young Hill assured his victory by taking advantage of this issue by appealing to the women students' vote.

But he credited his father with getting him to Washington. "I have always said my father elected me to Congress the first time," he said in an interview in 1958. "People voted for Dr. L.L. Hill's boy, not Lister Hill."

Sen. Hill's survivors include his wife, the former Henrietta Fontaine McCormick, and two children, Mrs. Charles Hubbard and Luther Lister Hill, all of Montgomery.

LISTER HILL, LONGTIME SENATOR FROM ALABAMA

(By Peter Kerr)

Lister Hill, a United States Senator from Alabama for three decades who sponsored some of most important health and education legislation in the years after World War II, died of pneumonia Thursday at the Jackson Hospital in Montgomery, Ala. He was 89 years old.

Among the bills he directed in his 45 years in Congress were the Tennessee Valley Authority Act and the Hill-Burton Hospital Act.

His slow, persistent efforts in behalf of social legislation made Mr. Hill, as much as any legislator of his generation, a key figure in bringing modern medical care and adequate educational facilities to every region of the United States.

Senator Hill was considered a father of the National Institutes of Health, and as a sponsor of the Hill-Burton Hospital Act he helped bring hospitals to poor and rural areas and contribute funds to build more than 9,000 medical facilities around the country.

"Alabama has lost one of the greatest men who ever sat in the U.S. Senate," said Gov. George C. Wallace, who managed Senator Hill's re-election campaign in 1962. "He was a longtime personal and political friend whom I remember from the first time I heard him speak in Elba, in 1934."

Like many of the "progressive" Southern Democrats who came to Washington in the New Deal era, Senator Hill became an opponent to change as the civil rights movement swept the South in the early 1960's, and he opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1965.

The son of Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, one of the South's foremost surgeons, Lister Hill was born in Montgomery on Dec. 29, 1894. He was named for Sir Joseph Lister, the British medical scientist who originated antiseptic surgery.

Mr. Hill graduated from the University of Alabama with both liberal arts and law degrees and earned a law degree from Columbia University before he began practicing law in Montgomery in 1916. In World War I he served as a lieutenant in the Army infantry.

At the age of 22 he was elected president of the Montgomery Board of Education and at 28 began his first term in the House of Representatives. In 1938 he was elected to the Senate to finish the unexpired term of Hugo L. Black, who had been appointed to the United States Supreme Court by President Roosevelt.

FORCE BEHIND LEGISLATION

Tall and blond, Senator Hill, who spoke in a slow, distinctive drawl, came to be regarded as an ever-present and effective force behind Democratic social legislation.

In addition to his authorship of the Tennessee Valley Authority legislation in 1933, which was aimed at controlling flooding, improving navigation and producing hydroelectric power, he helped sponsor the Rural Telephone Act, the Rural Housing Act and the G.I. Bill of Rights for veterans of World War II and the Korean War.

He was also a major supporter of Medicare and Social Security legislation.

In 1955, Senator Hill became chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee and chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee in charge of financing what was then the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

He retired from the Senate in 1968. "I was getting a little old," he later recalled. "After all, 50 years in politics is long enough, don't you think?"

In an interview in 1977, Mr. Hill said he considered himself a progressive and was apologetic about his segregationist role. "I had to do that to get elected," he said. "We all did."

Mr. Hill is survived by his wife, Henrietta, his son, Luther Lister Hill, and his daughter, Henrietta Hubbard, all of whom live in Montgomery.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that statements from Congressman TOM BEVILL and Congressman BILL NICHOLS, Members of the House of Representatives who served in the Congress with Senator Hill, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR LISTER HILL, BY HON. TOM BEVILL, OF ALABAMA, FEBRUARY 4, 1985

Mr. President, I am honored to join with the Members of both bodies of Congress as we remember, with love and respect, the life and accomplishments of one of the Nation's most able legislators, former Senator Lister Hill, of Alabama.

Senator Hill's remarkable 46-year career of public service has provided America with a legacy of health and education programs which have produced dramatic improvements for our citizens. The advances he made possible in health care and medical research have extended and improved the lives of millions of Americans. Through his many significant legislative achievements, Lister Hill proved he was a leader of unlimited foresight. While some legislators are satisfied with looking for immediate, and often temporary, solutions to the problems facing our country, Lister Hill was always looking to the future. He was a master of authoring legislation to solve the long-term problems of the United States.

If Lister Hill had lived during the initial days of our Republic, he surely would have become one of the founding fathers of the United States of America. Had he been alive during the early 1800's, he would have been pioneering to expand the young Nation, bringing new territories into the Union and using the resources of this land to make the country strong. If he were in the House or Senate today, he surely would be working busily and quietly on programs to insure that 21st Century Americans would have the finest quality of life imaginable.

Lister Hill's father, a pioneering surgeon, had a dream for his son. He hoped that Lister would become a physician who could bring healing to thousands. Instead, Lister became the author of legislation which has created medical research and treatment facilities across the Nation which, everyday, are bringing healing to millions. The Alabama Senator's work extended into education, as well, through his authoring of the Public Library Services Act.

One of the outgrowths of his legislative energies stands today in Alabama on the campus of the University of Alabama in Birmingham. One of his proudest achievements, the Lister Hill Library of Health Services, is providing students and physicians at this modern medical center with a storehouse of knowledge, challenges and limitless possibilities. The medical advances to which this facility makes a significant contribution, are a direct result of the work of one of Alabama's legislative giants, Joseph Lister Hill.

Lister Hill's accomplishments did not die with their founder. Instead, the rich legacy he left for us continues to grow and to provide progress for America. We remember Lister Hill no only for what he did, but also for what his work continues to provide us.

HONORABLE BILL NICHOLS OF ALABAMA

Mr. Speaker, it was indeed a sad day for the State of Alabama and the United States of America, when one of its finest servants, Lister Hill, passed away. Few men have attained the greatness that was achieved in the United States Congress as Lister Hill, who will always be remembered as "Alabama's Senator."

Today, we pay tribute to this great man whom history is destined to record as one of the truly courageous Americans of all time. Senator Lister Hill served our Nation in a time when awesome decisions need to be made and implemented. He rose to that task with conviction and determination.

As we mourn the passing of this great leader, let us remember that ability to communicate and reach the people which was Senator Hill's special quality. While serving with distinction in the United States Senate with many of our Nation's greatest leaders, Senator Hill never forgot the needs of the common man. Alabama's Senator always had the time for his constituents, and tried to help them most through advanced education and the opportunity to work and succeed.

Today, let us be thankful for the memory of this great American, Senator Lister Hill. Mrs. Nichols joins me in expressing heartfelt sympathy to members of the Lister Hill family.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is my understanding that Congressman BILL DICKINSON will enter a statement in the RECORD in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a statement from Hon. Armistead I. Selden, former Ambassador to New Zealand, who served in the House of Representatives while Senator Hill was in the Senate, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY HON. ARMISTEAD I. SELDEN

I am grateful to my good friend, Senator Heflin, for including in his remarks a brief statement of mine about my friend and former colleague Lister Hill.

My father and Lister Hill were lifelong friends and our families had been close for several generations. Consequently, I have admired and respected Lister since I was a child. At my father's invitation, Lister spoke at the high school in my home town of Greensboro, Alabama shortly after his election to the United States Senate, and he visited in our home on this and many other occasions. Little did I dream at the time that I would have the privilege of serving for sixteen years in the Congress as a colleague of Senator Hill.

His legislative accomplishments are legion, and I'm reminded of them wherever I turn. In my old Congressional District, Lister and I dedicated a Hill-Burton hospital in almost every county seat, and I never pass through and see those hospitals without remembering the specific occasion. If Lister Hill had done nothing but co-author the legislation that made possible the construction of thousands of badly needed Hill-Burton hospitals, he would be long remembered as America's statesman of health. But this legislation is only one of some sixty major pieces of health legislation introduced and guided through the Senate by Lister Hill.

In recent years I have had treatment at the National Institutes of Health, and I never go there without thinking of Lister. It was legislation introduced by him that created this institution in 1948 and every piece of NIH legislation from that date until his retirement in 1969 was sponsored by Senator Hill. The work that has been done and will be done at the National Institutes of Health is a monument to Lister Hill's concern for the health of the American people and his foresight in doing something about it. Indeed, the research conducted there has produced improvements in health care which affect countless people who live far beyond our shores.

When I came to Congress in January 1953, no one outside my immediate family was more delighted than Lister Hill. During the sixteen years we served as colleagues, he in the Senate and I in the House, I had no closer friend and confidant. We worked together on many projects that benefited my district and our state, and he was always extremely cooperative and helpful. Occasionally we voted differently on an issue but never once did he ever question my reasons or my judgment. He was truly a gentleman with whom it was a great privilege to serve.

When he finally decided to retire from the Senate, he called me to his office, told me of his decision, and urged me to seek the seat he planned to give up. This I did, with his endorsement and support, but unsuccessfully.

Future generations will look back on Lister Hill's service in the Congress with both gratitude and admiration. He was truly a great Alabamian and a great American. His death was not only a loss to his family and friends but to literally tens of millions who have benefited from his long service in the United States Congress.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a letter from Dr. S. Richardson Hill, Jr., M.D., president of the University of Alabama in Birmingham, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA
BIRMINGHAM, AL,
February 5, 1985.

Hon. HOWELL HEFLIN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: It is with a sense of deep pride and pleasure that the University of Alabama at Birmingham joins in the recognition of the great accomplishments of Alabama's late beloved Senator Lister Hill.

Those of us who have been at UAB since its early days have good cause to remember those accomplishments; daily we may see how UAB's Medical Center took shape and prospered because of Senator Hill's pervasive interest in the health and well-being of mankind. We are a tangible expression of the fruits of his work and, indeed, are representative of what it was possible to accomplish as a result of one man's interest in the humanistic problems of society.

Senator Hill's legislation was responsible for the construction of hospital and other health-related buildings, for aid to medical and dental schools, for organization of an international health research program, erection of centers for treatment of mental illness and mental retardation, training programs for nurses and paramedical personnel, regional centers for treatment of heart disease, cancer and stroke as well as other important health measures.

The Hill-Burton Act, which initiated the concept of local-state-federal cost-sharing of hospital facilities, transformed the character of health care of the United States. It began a spectacular renaissance of health facilities in Alabama and throughout the United States.

The legislation had an immeasurable impact upon this university. Not only were a number of our buildings constructed through Hill-Burton funds, but many of our health and education programs were initiated or aided by subsequent Hill-inspired legislation. These programs, along with our internationally respected research activities, have enabled UAB to recruit superbly qualified faculty members.

The establishment of the National Institutes of Health began a long and successful sponsorship of legislation that supported investigations not only in the NIH laboratories but in medical centers throughout the land. It is impossible to estimate the number of lives that have been saved, prolonged and made more comfortable because of diagnostic and therapeutic technology developed with this support. As a result of Senator Hill's efforts on behalf of NIH and its programs, millions of Americans—young and old, wealthy and impoverished—have benefited.

The magnitude of his work was appropriately recognized by UAB in 1971 when its new Medical Center library building was named the Lister Hill Library of the Health Sciences. Among the extensive library holdings are housed much of his memorabilia and an original sculpture and painting of Senator Hill. In view of his consuming interest in the transfer of biomedical information as well as all matters relating to health, this tribute is particularly fitting—a dynamic monument situated in the midst of an important medical center, in the Senator's own home state.

The words of Josiah Gilbert Holland express very well the nature and special qualities of this nation's foremost patron of health and education:

God give us men—A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands—
Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy,
Men who possess opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie,
Men who can stand before the demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking:

Tall men, sun crowned men, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

Such a man was Lister Hill of Alabama.

Sincerely,

S. RICHARDSON HILL, JR., M.D.,
President.

TRIBUTE TO LISTER HILL

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am honored to participate in this tribute to my late colleague, Lister Hill of Alabama. I had the privilege—and it was a privilege indeed—to serve for 8 years with Lister Hill as a Member of this body. I had the additional privilege of serving as a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, which Lister Hill chaired for the entire period we served together in the Senate, and which he chaired for another 8 years before I arrived.

When Lister Hill retired from the Senate, I called him one of the most respected, one of the most compassionate, and one of the most understanding Members of this body. Time has not diminished or tarnished those words. They ring just as true today as when I said them almost 16 years ago.

I said in 1968 that there would be a vacuum in the Senate when Lister Hill departed. But the void left by his retirement was even greater than I had anticipated. For I do not believe that there has ever been a U.S. Senator who did more for the Health and Education of our young people than Lister Hill did. It was his leadership as chairman of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee that enabled us to enact the landmark legislation in both of those areas.

Lister Hill was, as I said when he retired, my respected friend—my revered and valued friend. I mourn his passing, but I know for sure that our country is a better place to live because of his having been here, because of his work and contributions, and because of his gentle, progressive leadership.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR LISTER HILL OF ALABAMA

Mr. STENNIS. Senator Lister Hill had already been in the Senate over 10 years when I was elected in 1947, and I observed right away after coming here what a tireless worker he was. We served together until his retirement in 1969. I am grateful for many good memories of Senator Hill as a highly effective colleague and trusted friend.

I especially remember Senator Hill's contribution as a coauthor of the Hill-Burton hospital program which has contributed so much to the health and welfare of thousands of people in communities throughout the Nation. He developed the program, shepherded it through Congress, and then followed through with a determined effort to see that the necessary Federal funds were available. The results of his work continue to make life better for many individuals.

Senator Hill was a strong supporter of medical research, and he advanced our Government's participation in medical research in a splendid fashion.

I remember Senator Hill fondly as a friendly, genial man who was popular with his colleagues and with the people of Alabama. He was dedicated to his family, and provided an excellent example for all of us who were privileged to know him and serve with him.

Senator Hill's work on behalf of his constituents and his foresight and determination to improve life for all Americans are a tribute to him as an individual and a challenge to all who will ever serve in this body.

I share in the pride his family and State feel in his accomplishment during his wonderful, productive life, and I also share in their sense of loss at his death. He will always be remembered as one who dared to make a difference.

LISTER HILL—1894-1984

Mr. HATFIELD. When future historians chronicle the development of medical research and health care in the 20th century, one public figure will stand above all the rest: Senator Lister Hill.

It has been said that Lister Hill, who represented his home State of Alabama in the House of Representatives for 15 years and in the Senate for 30 years, was responsible for more legislation in the broad field of health than had been enacted in the entire history of the Nation before his time. He was known on Capitol Hill as the Nation's "Statesman for Health."

His death on December 20, 1984, is mourned by his neighbors in Montgomery, his fellow citizens in Alabama, and by all Americans who recognize his contributions to the Nation's health. His colleagues in the U.S. Senate—especially those whose memories go back to 1968 when he retired—remain in awe of his accomplishments. There is scarcely a piece of health-related legislation for a period of almost 50 years that does not bear his imprint.

Born in Montgomery, AL, in 1894, much of Lister Hill's interest in health care stemmed from his admiration of his father, Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, reputedly the first surgeon to perform sutures on the human heart. After graduating from the University of Alabama with a Phi Beta Kappa key, young Lister Hill pursued a degree in law and subsequently opened a law practice in Montgomery. At the age of 28 he entered the U.S. House of Representatives, later moving to the Senate in 1938, where he served until his retirement in 1968.

Among the major programs sponsored by Lister Hill were the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Housing Act, the Rural Telephone Act, and the GI bill of rights. The fields of health and education, however, were his special province. He used his influence as chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, and as chairman of the powerful Subcommittee on Appropriations to write into law and fund legislation which advanced the cause of health and education. He was a friend of Federal aid to education, as may be seen from his championing the building of public libraries under the Library Services and Construction Act, and his sponsorship of legislation that came to be known as the Hill-Elliott Act, which resulted in the construction of classrooms and language laboratories.

Of the many health programs Lister Hill had been associated with, one with profound effect on the Nation was the Hospital and Health Center Construction Act of 1946. He was the chief architect of this legislation and it came to be widely known as the Hill-Burton program. By the time of Senator Hill's retirement, that one law had resulted in the construction of almost 10,000 institutions: hospitals, tuberculosis sanatoriums, public health centers, nursing homes, schools for nurses, clinics for disabled children, rehabilitation facilities, diagnostic and treatment centers, and other medically related facilities. More than 404,000 inpatient beds had been added to hospitals and nursing homes under the program.

Also in the area of health, Senator Hill was a prime mover in creating the Comprehensive Health Planning and Public Health Services Act, the Regional Medical Programs Act, the Hill-Harris Act of 1963 that authorized financial assistance to construct a comprehensive network of facilities for the mentally retarded and mentally ill, and he was a strong supporter of the Medicare and Medicaid Programs and Social Security.

If any single Federal institution can be singled out as the primary beneficiary of Lister Hill's contributions, that institution is the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, MD. During his period in the Senate, he was closely involved with, and frequently the sponsor of, almost all substantive legislation affecting the NIH. He acquired over the years a sophisticated understanding of the processes of biomedical research, recognizing that medical research should follow the opportunities presented by evolving basic science and not be subject to every transient enthusiasm on the part of the Congress or the public. However, he never lost sight of the ultimate purpose of society's investment in the NIH, he wrote:

> The development of a solid foundation of fundamental knowledge concerning the biological processes is an essential condition for the breakthroughs from which significant victories in major disease areas will flow.

Through Senator Hill's persuasiveness with colleagues and adroitness in threading his way through the labyrinthine corridors of Capitol Hill, support and funds for biomedical research increased sixteenfold during his chairmanship of the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations. Lister Hill, said an admiring colleague:

Is so persuasive, so charming, so quietly indispensable, and so personally self-effacing, that we want to give him everything that it is possible to give him.

Today, on the grounds of the National Institutes of Health, stands a 10-story building named in his honor: the Lister Hill National Center for Biomedical Communications. The building is a part of the National Library of Medicine, whose legislation he cosponsored with Senator John F. Kennedy in 1956. Lister Hill was deeply concerned about the Library and its potential for advancing medical research and health care. He said:

We must develop a communications system so that the miraculous triumphs of modern medicine can be taken from the laboratory and transmitted to all in need.

Those words, engraved in marble on the building that bears his name, epitomize Lister Hill's concern for the health of American citizens. It was the scientific knowledge created under programs he fostered at the National Institutes of Health, taught in medical schools improved by legislation he sponsored, communicated through the biomedical library network he mandated in a 1965 act, and applied in the thousands of hospitals supported by the Hill-Burton Act that is his continuing legacy to the American people. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that we are all healthier today because of the compassion and tenacity of this man from Alabama—Lister Hill.

SENATOR LISTER HILL—PIONEER FOR BETTER HEALTH CARE IN AMERICA

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, 100 years ago a young physician from Montgomery, AL, named Luther Hill went to London to study with the world famous surgeon, Sir Joseph Lister. After a year of training and exposure to European medical giants like Pasteur and Koch, Dr. Hill returned to the States, established his practice, married, and raised a son named for his London mentor.

The public service of that son, who became Senator Lister Hill, has contributed immensely to the quality of life for all Americans. Three Kennedy brothers—John and Robert, and myself—were all privileged to serve with Lister Hill on the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee and to learn from him.

Above all, I will never forget Senator Hill's extraordinary sense of dedication to improving the quality of health care in America. As he once wrote in recalling the origin of that lifelong commitment:

I was 23 years old and in good health when I began my 2 years of duty in the U.S. Army in 1917. But I recall with sadness the many young men with a high sense of patriotic duty who had to remain behind in Alabama because they did not share with me in the benefits of a healthy body.

After the war, in 1923, Lister Hill was elected to Congress, where he served 45 years, first in the House of Representatives and then, from 1938 to 1968, in the Senate. Hill wrote that:

As a legislator from a predominantly rural state * * * I was keenly aware of how far behind we were in providing adequate medical care to those in need. In 1928 there were some 15 million Americans living in 1,200 predominantly rural counties without any hospitals of any kind.

His desire to assure that high quality health care would be the birthright of every American provided the passion and energy behind the rich legislative legacy he left us. In the Senate, he joined—and then led—a group of activist legislators, encouraged by the New Deal and inspired by a vision of a healthy America. Even in the company of giants like Wagner and Humphrey, Murray and Dingell, Hill stood out as a man of special genius.

He served on the Labor Committee from his first days in the Senate until his retirement in 1968, and he chaired the committee for the last 14 productive years of his service. He was the leading force on legislation advancing public health, health planning, health research, and access to health care. Laws crafted by Lister Hill brought the benefits of improved medical care to millions of Americans. The National Institutes of Health, which today is the center of the world's most advanced biomedical research, grew primarily through Senator Hill's efforts. The National Library of Medicine, a bill sponsored by Senator Hill and my brother Jack, was one of their first achievements in the Senate. And the Hill-Burton Act—perhaps the most famous of all his laws—built hospitals across rural America that to this day are monuments to the foresight of Lister Hill—and not just general hospitals, but mental hospitals, chronic disease hospitals, tuberculosis sanitoriums, public health centers, nursing homes, schools for nurses, crippled children's clinics, rehabilitation facilities, and diagnostic and treatment centers.

I served with him on the Labor Committee during his final term in the Senate. Those 6 years saw the passage of 19 major health measures which had originated in our committee. The scope of this final extraordinary burst of legislation included health education, promoted through student loan programs and construction grants for colleges and universities facilities; the disadvantaged were assisted through bills to train professionals to work with the mentally retarded and the deaf and blind; vocational rehabilitation centers and health centers for migrant workers were established; medical research and health planning were advanced through legislation to establish two new institutes at NIH, through funds for medical libraries, and through establishment of the Regional Medical Program Act and the Comprehensive Health Planning Act.

When Lister Hill retired from the Senate, the National Center for Biomedical Communications was named for him in a joint resolution passed by both Houses and signed by President Johnson. In the words of the resolution:

During his long and distinguished career in the Congress, Senator Lister Hill has achieved more forward-looking legislation relating to improved health and educational opportunities for the American people than any other individual in the history of this body.

Speaking in 1960 on the 10th anniversary of the first hospital built under the Hill-Burton Act, Senator Hill said:

Since we began work on this hospital we have added 6 precious years to the average American's life, and it is estimated that 1,800,000 lives have been saved due to medical research * * * Many of the diseases which robbed our cradles and sapped our manhood are now under control. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, yellow fever and typhoid fever, malaria, smallpox, pellagra and hookworm have been almost completely conquered. Pneumonia, whose advent brought terror to many an American family only two decades ago, has lost its fatal sting. Better housing, intensive public health checkups, and a series of new drugs have caused a miraculous drop in the death rate from tuberculosis. Our infant mortality is the lowest in our history and only one mother is lost for more than 1,000 babies brought into the world.

The pride he felt in those accomplishments 25 years ago inspires us today in our effort to continue the progress he began. Our goals are the same—to advance our knowledge about disease and to expand access to health care for all citizens—and because of Lister Hill, America is closer to them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, Lister Hill served this country and his native State of Alabama with honor and distinction for more than 45 years—first as a Member of the House of Representatives and then for 31 years as a Member of this body.

His passing last December at the age of 90 was a sad occasion for all of us who knew and respected him.

Senator Hill, who was the son of a leading American heart surgeon, made his mark on this country by pioneering legislation which insured Federal money for building hospitals in areas which had little or no health care.

Every time Congress tried to spend money to modernize older urban hospitals, Senator Hill successfully fought for the forgotten rural people of America and saw to it that those funds were appropriated to build new hospitals in the country.

Lister Hill left a proud legacy. And that is that the rural people of this country now enjoy fine health care largely because on one man's undying efforts.

His devotion to their well-being will not be soon forgotten.

Mr. President, I for one, very much miss Lister's warm, cheerful greeting which was so typical of him.

He was a great Senator and a dear friend.

A TRIBUTE TO LISTER HILL

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I would like to take this time to remember one of Alabama's finest men and one of the South's greatest statesmen, the late Alabama Senator Lister Hill, who passed away on December 20, 1984, at the age of 89. Senator Hill's illustrious career was filled with many outstanding achievements, especially in the area of health care reform.

Senator Hill's persistent efforts in behalf of social legislation made him, as much as any legislator of his generation, a key figure in bringing modern medical care and adequate educational facilities to every region of the United States.

A progressive Democrat, Senator Hill sponsored the Hill-Burton Hospital and Health Center Construction Act of 1946, which resulted in the construction of 9,200 medical facilities throughout the country through cost sharing among local, State and Federal governments. Senator Hill was an advocate of increased medical research and training programs throughout his tenure in Congress. He was the key sponsor of legislation that established a Federal assistance program to train teachers of mentally retarded children, and was instrumental in creating support for the National Institutes of Health.

Senator Hill coauthored the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, which was vital to improving economic conditions in the Tennessee Valley. He also sponsored the Rural Telephone Act, the Rural Housing Act, and the GI bill of rights for veterans for World War II and the Korean war.

Lister Hill was born into a noble Alabama family in Montgomery, AL, on December 29, 1894. His father, Dr. Luther Leonidas Hill, was a country doctor and a talented surgeon. Many who knew Lister Hill say he developed his compassion for his fellow man when he was but a youngster, when he helped his father tend to the sick, and often the poor, who had traveled miles over the rough roads to reach a medical clinic.

In the fall of 1911 Lister Hill entered the University of Alabama. He completed his B.A. in 1914. In 1915 Hill obtained his masters degree in law; the following year he was graduated from Columbia University Law School. He began law practice in Montgomery, and in 1917 became president of the Montgomery Board of Education. When the United States entered World War I, Hill quickly enlisted and served as a commissioned officer in the 17th and 71st Infantry. Upon returning to Montgomery after the war, he continued his law practice. In 1923 he was elected to the U.S. Congress, and was reelected six times without opposition.

Congressman Hill strongly supported the Civilian Conservation Corps plan, the Homeowners Loan Corporation, and the Farm Credit Administration Program. Not only did he accomplish much for the Nation as a Congressman but he also secured many civilian projects for the second district, including Maxwell Field, a new post office, and the veterans' hospital in Montgomery.

On January 4, 1938, Lister Hill was nominated in the Democratic primary as a candidate for the unexpired Senate term of former Senator Hugo L. Black, who had been appointed to the Supreme Court.

In 1946, Senator Hill had the joy of seeing the Hill-Burton Act passed. That act authorized the Federal Government to put up half the money for hospitals, especially to serve rural areas if the communities would put up the balance. The 50-50 matching formula caught on in many other fields, helping to change the face of the Nation.

In 1949 Senator Hill gave up his high-ranking spot on the Armed Services Committee and took the last seat on the Appropriations Committee. Already in line for chairmanship of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, which handled health and education matters, he was looking forward eventually to heading the Appropriations Committee Subcommittee on Health and Education. In 1955, he achieved his double chairmanship.

With Carl Elliot, a fellow Alabamian in the House, Senator Hill authored the National Defense Education Act, which since its passage has granted loans to more than a million students. Except for the earlier GI bill of rights, which Hill also sponsored NDEA was the first Federal education aid bill since the land-grant college bills of 1862, 1890, 1907.

The importance of Senator Hill's Labor and Public Welfare Committee was widely appreciated, and it was noted that under Hill's leadership "the committee had become one of the greatest instruments for human progress in the Senate's legislative history."

Senator Hill gracefully retired from the Senate in 1968 to return home to Montgomery, AL. He left behind a reputation of compassion for his fellow man, and a series of legislative initiatives that changed American education and health care.

While I did not know Lister Hill personally, it is with both sadness and respect that I pay tribute to Lister Hill, a good man, and one of America's finest Senators. I share the loss with his widow, Henrietta Hill, and their children, Henrietta Hubbard and Luther Lister Hill.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, today I join my colleagues in honoring the distinguished Senator from Alabama, whose passing we all mourn.

It was my privilege to serve with Joseph Lister Hill for 9 years, until he retired from Senate service in 1969. Senator Hill was a vocal and courageous champion of many of the causes dear to my own heart during his long years in this Chamber.

He was called the Statesman of Health. As his middle name indicates, his surgeon father had hoped that Joseph Hill would become a doctor as well. But no father could be disappointed in Senator Hill, who left a medical legacy to his country that no single physician could equal.

The centerpiece of his work was of course the Hill-Burton Act, which laid the groundwork for more than 10,000 of the finest medical institutions in our country. He authored the legislation which gave us the National Institute of Health. He unfailingly supported health programs, even in the face of powerful political opposition.

His effective leadership in promoting medical research was a prime factor in making our Nation the world leader in medical knowledge and technique.

As extensive as they were, Senator Hill's contributions to medicine were only a part of his national legacy. I cannot do his achievements justice here, but suffice it to say that Senator Hill's record stands as an example to all who enter public service.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I wish to pay honor today to the late, great Senator from Alabama, Lister Hill.

Lister Hill came to Congress as a freshman Representative in 1923, and when he left as a Senator in 1969, he had amassed a record of accomplishment and service to his State and country few will ever match. For 46 years, Lister was one of the anchors of our National Assembly. When I first came to the Senate in 1966, he was among the most distinguished and respected of my colleagues. I turned to him often for his sage advice, and he gave it freely. We shall miss him dearly.

Though he beat Franklin Roosevelt to Washington by 9 years, Lister Hill was a product of the New Deal. He had served as president of the board of education in his hometown of Montgomery, and knew instinctively the importance of cultivating and developing what we today call the "human infrastructure" of America. He was a key supporter of New Deal programs in the House, particularly the Tennessee Valley Authority, which played a key role in promoting economic development and growth in northern Alabama and the rest of southern Appalachia.

Lister ran successfully for the Senate in 1937, taking over the seat vacated by soon-to-be Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black. In the Senate, Lister quickly rose to the position of Democratic Whip, and was a strong ally of considerable influence with the Roosevelt administration. He was an enthusiastic supporter of FDR's foreign policy, backing lend-lease and other controversial measures that helped America meet the test of the dictators.

After the war, Lister was a prime mover behind national health care legislation. More than anyone else in the Senate, he was responsible for bringing quality hospital care to the rural areas of America. Passage of his major legislative achievement, the Hill-Burton Act of 1946, provided Federal funding for hospital construction all across the country.

Lister became chairman of the Senate Labor and Welfare Committee in 1955, and from there continued in his quest to assure all Americans fair access to adequate medical and mental health care facilities. He was truly one of the lions of our great Assembly, and we will miss him.

We all wish his dear wife, Henrietta, the best in this time of sorrow. Lister, your memory will live on with us always.

THE AGRICULTURE CRISIS

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield at this time to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. I thank my colleague from Alabama. I thank him also for raising his voice yesterday on the floor of the Senate as a part of those of our body who are concerned about the plight of the American farmer and the disastrous economic conditions that now face American agriculture.

Several of us have agreed that every day we will come to the Senate floor and again try to draw the attention of the American people to the crisis now confronting agriculture.

In addition, the Senator from Nebraska, Senator EXON, and myself have sent notice to the majority leader that following the upcoming congressional recess we intend to take whatever parliamentary steps that are necessary to delay action on other business confronted in the Senate until we are assured that effective farm credit legislation to deal with the current emergency will be considered and scheduled for timely action by the entire Senate.

Mr. President, this morning I picked up the morning paper and read the headline across the front page with great interest. I read two statements that are presented and two different issues by the Budget Director, Mr. David Stockman, who appeared before the Senate Budget Committee yesterday.

In one series of statements, the Budget Director was quoted by the newspaper as saying, and I quote the newspaper report, "* * * institutional forces in the military are more concerned about protecting their retirement benefits than they are about protecting the security of the American people." Further, he was quoted as saying, "When push comes to shove, they'll give up on security before they'll give up on retirement."

If that insensitive attack upon the patriotism of those who have served and continue to serve in uniform—many of them serving outside the boundaries of this country, many of them serving at financial sacrifice, many of them serving at the sacrifice of the time they can spend with their wives and children and a normal family life to provide services to this country—were not enough, Mr. Stockman at that meeting not only attacked the patriotism and the integrity of the men and women who serve in the Armed Forces, he then leveled a broadside of the most insensitive kind at the farm community, and then at least in my own opinion he personally insulted the integrity of every Member of the U.S. Congress and the U.S. Senate who represent agricultural constituencies, and who have had the temerity as elected officials of those constituents to speak up on their behalf and to try to see to it that this country takes some action to avert an economic disaster before it is too late.

He termed that representation under our democratic system of government as "blackmail."

Mr. President, I was shocked by both of those statements. I hope that the men and women in the armed services of this country know that those statements do not reflect the feelings of the American people or the American Congress, and I certainly hope they do not reflect the feelings of the American President about those who defend our country, and who serve our country at such a sacrifice.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BOREN. I am happy to yield to my colleague from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to inquire of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma relative to this statement about the military and the priorities of Mr. Stockman. Does the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma happen to know whether or not Mr. David Stockman has ever served in the armed services of the United States?

Mr. BOREN. I do not know the answer to that question. I wonder if the Senator from Alabama might be able to enlighten me.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know. I am just curious as to whether such a statement would appear as though a man is not very well acquainted with the patriotism of the average American who serves in the armed services of the United States. It may be that somebody in some ivory tower of economics in his feelings on that sort of thing would come forth with such a statement.

Mr. BOREN. I agree with my colleague from Alabama. I do not know if Mr. Stockman, from my own personal knowledge, served in the Armed Forces. I only say that you are clearly correct. The Senator from Alabama is clearly correct in the statement that he obviously does not have any understanding for what the average person who wears this uniform goes through. He obviously does not have any understanding of their motivation. He does not have any understanding or appreciation for their love of their country. He also clearly does not understand what is going on in another important sector, in the agricultural sector.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield further on that?

Mr. BOREN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to inquire whether the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma knows whether Mr. Stockman has ever been on a farm?

Mr. BOREN. I do not know. But I would say this: that he has an appalling lack of understanding of the effect that a collapse of the agricultural sector would have on the rest of this economy and he also does not seem to know much about what has happened in agricultural policy in this country over the past 50 years and the directives under which the farmers have been trying to operate. I would say to the Senator from Alabama, I read further in the morning press report the statement that Mr. Stockman made when he said that he was speaking for himself. They asked if his views reflected the President. He said "I don't think so. I am only stating a personal opinion."

I say to my colleague from Alabama I have served in the Governor's office of a State as have other Members of this body. I know the distinguished Senator from Alabama has served on the supreme court of his State. As a Governor I had responsibility for my own administration. I want to say to Mr. Stockman this morning that I do not consider representation of my constituents, I do not consider trying to call the attention of the American people to the danger of collapse of the agricultural sector, and I do not believe in saying that I will use the parliamentary prerogatives open to me to try to bring about action on this crucial issue before the U.S. Senate to be blackmail.

Nor do I apologize to anyone. I consider that to be an honest and sincere attempt not only to represent my constituents but to speak out for what I think is in the best interest of the United States of America, just as I think the patriotic people who work on the farms have tried to make a contribution to their country and just as I think the patriotic men and women who wear the uniform of our armed services are trying to make a contribution to their country.

Mr. Stockman was not elected to any office. He was appointed to his current office. He gave up elective office for an appointive office.

The President of the United States is the appointing authority.

I would only say this: If an employee or an appointee of mine as Governor of Oklahoma when I served in that capacity had made a statement of such insensitivity about millions of their fellow citizens, those in the Armed Forces and those who labor in the dire economic consequences which we now face in the agricultural community, if that had happened in my administration as Governor that particular appointee of mine would have remained in office long enough for me to have walked from wherever I was when I first heard that report to pick up a telephone and to have given him a directive that if there was not on the wire within 30 seconds an apology for that kind of insensitive statement, he would be out of a job.

It would not have taken me 24 hours to have waited, to have pondered whether or not anyone working under my authority had acted responsibly in making a statement like that.

It does not require any reflection to know that such an insensitive attack upon a whole segment of the American population has no place and no part of any representation of any person holding a position of responsibility in the Government of the United States, the government of any State, the government of any county, or the government of any city.

I would hope, Mr. President, that before the day is out—I cannot think of a better time for the President to talk about it than in his State of the Union Address tonight—the President will inform the Members of Congress who have been doing their own duty as they see it, conscientiously to speak out on the issues of the day and to bring about policy changes so badly needed in this country, that Mr. Stockman has apologized to them publicly, that he has, by that apology, finally indicated some understanding of how the democratic system of government is meant to work, that he has apologized to those in the agricultural sector, and that he has apologized to the brave and patriotic men and women who wear the uniform of the Armed Forces of this country.

I would hope that tonight when the President speaks to us, he will either announce that kind of apology on behalf of one of his appointees or he will announce the resignation and removal from his administration of the person who made those statements.

I think it would be a timely act on the part of the President. I do not think it should wait 24 more hours before it is made clear that these kinds of feelings do not represent the feelings of the administration and the feelings of the President personally.

I do not object to anyone in the administration or anyone in the Congress attempting to work on the budget deficits. I am for that. How many times have I come to the Senate floor and indicated a willingness myself, both in statements and by casting votes, to take the action necessary to bring down the horrendous deficits that are crippling our economy and endangering our future? I have made it clear by the votes that I have cast that, as far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to vote anything off limits. I have been prepared to vote on constraints on COLA's, entitlements, military buildup, and to ask that additional income be made available annually to the Federal Government to get these deficits under control. But in doing so, I have never questioned the personal integrity of Mr. Stockman or the President of the United States. I revere that office.

Nor would I allow anyone working in my office to question the personal integrity of the President of the United States or Members of Congress as they labor in their duties of making public policy as they see it right.

Nor have I ever made personal attacks on people in this country when I have urged that we consider a general sacrifice by all of us, as Americans, in order that we get the budget deficits under control.

I could not help but think what a lack of understanding the Senator from Alabama said Mr. Stockman had of the men and women in uniform and the service they render. I also could not help but think what a lack of understanding Mr. Stockman has of the agricultural situation and what the farmers of this country are now going through, as I read the morning paper.

He said, "Why should we not just let the farmers sink? It is all their own fault. They are adult people. They went out on their own free will and went into debt. Why should we have concern for them?" That is what Mr. Stockman said.

"Why not let them sink? Why not let the farms be thrown on the market? Why not let 13 percent of the farmers in Iowa go broke, for example, this year and put their farms on the market? Why not collapse land values all over this country? Why not stand by and say, 'Well, it is all their own doing when the banks begin to collapse all across this country and the effects begin to ripple all the way into the larger cities of this country and the largest financial institutions in this country, just as it did in the late twenties and early thirties. Why not let it happen again?' They are all adults. They should have known better."

I would like to ask him, was it the farmers of this country who entered into an embargo which cost them their long-term agreements, which cost them the right to have long-term arrangements to sell their products in a dozen or more countries of the world, agreements that were never entered into again after the embargo was over?

Obviously, that is not said in a partisan sense. That occurred in the administration of another President.

Was it the farmers' fault? No. The farmers were the helpless victims of a foreign policy decision made by the Government of the United States. The farmers were asked to sacrifice their own economic well-being so that a point could be made that our foreign policymakers felt was important to make at the time. But the farmers suffered and the farmers went deeper into debt, yes. The farmers, as adults, had to go to the bank and borrow money, and they lost more and more of their world markets.

But was it the farmers' fault that an embargo was imposed?

Was it the farmers' fault that American banks made large loans——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BOREN. I ask if the Senator from Alabama might yield me additional time?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I yield 5 more minutes.

Mr. BOREN. Is it the farmers' fault that the large American banks made loans to other countries and then, because of the fear that the failure to repay those loans might endanger the monetary system, that our Government has been forced to turn the other way with those countries that have been financing with those loan subsidies for agriculture production so that they could invade the markets previously served by American farmers?

I fail to see how that was the fault of the American farmer. But that farmer had to go to the bank and borrow more money because of that unfair competition, sometimes financed indirectly even by some of our own financial institutions and indirectly by our own Government, as we continued to try to prevent the collapse of the monetary system.

Is it the fault of the farmers that administrations in both parties and Members of Congress for the past two or three decades have failed to deal with the budget crisis and have created a deficit so large that it has forced up interest rates for everyone else; that we have had to rely upon those other countries to pay the interest due on our national debt; that we have, therefore, kept the value of the American dollar, by these incorrect policy decisions, so high that the farmer can no longer sell his products in the world market?

Is it the fault of the American farmer that the Argentine currency, for example, went down 86 percent compared to the value of the dollar last year, so that you could bring Argentine wheat into the United States, even pay a duty on it and pay the freight, and still undersell our own producers? I fail to see how that is the fault of the American farmer; but, yes, that farmer had to go down to the bank as an adult, as Mr. Stockman says, and sign other notes.

Well, enough about Mr. Stockman. I want again to focus the attention of my colleagues on the plight that we are facing in agriculture. Among the proposals made only yesterday, as I listened to the Secretary of Agriculture brief us on the farm bill for this year, was a proposal to cut back the conservation program at a time when we are facing an unparalleled crisis in soil conservation, so that the program will be only one-third what it is today in a couple of years.

Last week, I introduced a bill that would provide for a more effective long-term conservation program. Today, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, Senator BUMPERS of Arkansas, in expressing my commitment to soil conservation and my support of the Soil Conservation Service in particular.

Mr. President, today, I want to focus attention on the problems that we face in the conservation area, having last year lost the equivalent of 2 million acres of prime cropland to unacceptable levels of soil and water erosion.

Today, I want to continue to bring to the attention of the Senate the problems confronting the American farmer and the ultimate impact this will have on our Nation unless emergency action is taken, and action is taken immediately.

As a result of the depressed farm economy, many farmers simply lack the resources necessary to implement needed conservation treatments. On some highly erodible land, the only way to correct the problem is to remove the land from cultivation. Yet, converting the land to a less intensive use can reduce the farmer's income. Given the cash-flow problems our farmers are experiencing, they simply cannot afford to lose any income. It is a certain fact that the costs incurred or income foregone in soil and water conservation investments are rarely recovered in the short-term cash-flow of farm businesses.

Many may wonder why this state of affairs should be of any concern to them. Yet, when farmers cannot afford to maintain or implement soil conservation measures, the soil erodes at an unacceptable rate. In contrast, an acceptable rate is one that can be tolerated without reducing the soil's long-term productive capacity. For most cropland soils, this annual rate ranges from 3 to 5 tons of soil per acre. At this rate, 1 inch of topsoil is lost every 30 to 50 years. A reduction in the soil's productive capacity translates into an increase in the cost of producing crops. So, ultimately, the point will be reached where the soil will no longer be capable of producing crops at all. Inevitably, soil erosion threatens our future capacity to even produce food and fiber products for our Nation's citizens, let alone supply people of other countries.

It must be recognized that we have reached a crisis level in the erosion of our soil. According to the national agricultural lands study, we are losing the equivalent of 1.01 million acres of cropland annually to erosion. In the 10 Great Plains States, wind erosion results in the loss of an additional 240,000 acre-equivalents.

Soil erosion by water and wind is reducing the productivity on 141 million acres; that is, 1 out of every 4 acres. Nearly 3 billion tons of soil erode from the Nation's cropland each year. Over the next 50 years, productivity losses could equal the output of 25 to 62 million acres of cropland, or production of 50 to 75 million metric tons of grain annually. The Department of Agriculture estimates that more than a third of the Nation's cropland is eroding at an unacceptable rate. Combined water and wind erosion exceeds tolerable levels for maintaining soil resources on almost 300 million acres of non-Federal cropland, pastureland, forest land, and rangeland. For cropland alone, the combined wind and water erosion totals 2.8 billion tons each year for a per acre average of 6.8 tons annually. This erosion rate is of staggering dimensions.

For, each year, water alone causes 1.9 billions tons of soil to erode from our cropland. Sheet and rill erosion exceeds the average tolerance rate of 5 tons annually on 94 million acres of cropland; 54 percent of all sheet and rill erosion and 89 percent of the excessive sheet and rill erosion occurs on 10 percent of the Nation's cropland—41 million acres. So on this land alone, erosion annually exceeds 10 tons per acre.

Even if the lands eroding annually at over 10 tons per acre were adequately protected, erosion at 5 to 10 tons per acre would continue to threaten our long-term agricultural productivity on another 53 million acres—13 percent of all cropland.

In my home State of Oklahoma, sheet and rill and wind erosion is more than 5 tons per acre per year on 43 percent of the cultivated cropland. On an average, all Oklahoma cropland annually loses more than 7 tons per acre—an average of 4 tons erode due to water and an average of 3.43 tons erode due to wind erosion. Wind alone causes over 35 million tons per year to erode from Oklahoma cropland. Wind erosion in the western half of my State is a major problem, especially during drought conditions. In November and December of this past year, wind erosion reports showed that almost 114,000 acres were damaged by wind erosion. Over 53,000 acres of crops were destroyed during this period and there are presently 835,000 acres in condition to blow at the present time.

The conservation programs we have in place today have helped to reduce erosion over the past years, and we must acknowledge their contribution. Yet, they are simply not adequate. More and more soil is lost due to farmers lack of monetary resources. There is an obvious need for more to be done to protect our Nation's valuable resources. Over 35 percent of Oklahoma's cropland is eroding at rates greater than the allowable soil loss. It is estimated that 40 percent of the conservation job remains to be done in Oklahoma in all respects, including watershed protection and land treatment. Approximately 5.9 million acres of Oklahoma cropland need conservation treatment right now.

The current programs simply have not been able to meet the need for conservation treatments. Despite the fact that the Great Plains Program provided $1,240,192 in fiscal year 1984 for new contracts in Oklahoma, 228 applications were not approved because of insufficient funds. Right now, we have a 3-year backlog for this one program. For each year the land is not brought into approved conservation treatment, we continue to lose valuable soil at an alarming rate. Resources that go unprotected today will be unavailable to produce commodities tomorrow. Today, in the Great Plains, we are experiencing soil loss rates paramount to the amount of erosion during the Dust Bowl days. We cannot long retain a viable agricultural sector if we do not act now to control erosion.

Mr. President, we simply must protect and maintain the productivity of agricultural lands through actions that prevent gradual degradation caused by excessive soil erosion. If we are to continue to produce an adequate supply of food for home and exports, we simply must maintain high quality soil resources. Now is the time to increase the effectiveness of our conservation efforts, while the damage can be controlled.

This past week, I introduced legislation to provide for a long-term conservation program. Last year, Congress almost adopted a Conservation Reserve Program very similar to the one I introduced last year and reintroduced this year. We cannot wait another year to enact this type of legislation. Congress must also adopt some form of the so-called "sodbuster" bill. We just cannot allow highly erodible land to be brought into cultivation when such cultivation will jeopardize the future ability of this Nation to produce its own food.

At the same time we are providing for better conservation programs, we must also implement commodity programs which will allow the American farmer to receve a decent price for his products. By nature, American farmers want to be good stewards of the land. Yet, when cash prices remain low for a sustained length of time, thereby reducing his available cash, there simply is not enough money left over to implement or maintain conservation measures. If farmers were merely allowed to make a fair profit, they would implement these measures on their own.

Mr. President, Congress must act now. We cannot wait any longer. If we fail to take action now to preserve our valuable natural resources, we will one day be unable to provide basic foodstuffs for the citizens of our country. I urge my colleagues to join in our effort to enact legislation immediately. To enact legislation designed to bring profitability back to agriculture and in doing so to protect our future capacity to produce food and fiber products. I urge every Member to recognize the magnitude of the problem with which we are dealing and to act now while there is still time to avoid a complete collapse in this Nation's agricultural economy.

Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Alabama for yielding me sufficient time to make these remarks. I yield the floor.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. ALEXANDER NUNN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, today I am saddened to rise and say a few words about an outstanding Alabamian who passed away in January of this year, Dr. Alexander Nunn.

Dr. Nunn, who, I understand, was the uncle of my distinguished colleague in the Senate, Senator SAM NUNN of Georgia, had a long and outstanding career with the Progressive Farmer magazine.

A resident of Loachapola, Dr. Nunn attended public schools in Notasulga and Auburn, before beginning to write for the magazine at the age of 15. After earning his degree in agricultural education from Alabama Polytechnic Institute, now Auburn University in 1924, he joined the firm as a proofreader. The very next year, he was named assistant managing editor. Dr. Nunn would stay with the Progressive Farmer until his retirement in 1967 as executive editor and executive vice president.

In his retirement years, Alexander Nunn still did not slow down in his activities. Until his death, Dr. Nunn had been serving as Lee County's first official historian. That position had been established by the county commission in 1977, with him in mind. He was editor of Lee County and Her Forebears, published in 1983, and for years had been writing a historical column for the Opelika-Auburn News.

In addition, Dr. Nunn was joint author of the Community Handbook, editor of Agricultural Classics, a contributing author for This Is the South, author of Yesterdays in Loachapola and Communities Nearby, and editor of numerous other publications.

In 1959, he received an honorary doctor of science degree from Auburn University, and later served on the Humanities Advisory Council for the School of Arts and Sciences. Dr. Nunn was named Honorary American Farmer by Future Farmers of America, received the National 4-H Alumni Award, and was honored by the Soil Conservation Society.

In recognition of the many lasting contributions made by Dr. Nunn, a scholarship in agriculture will be established in his name. To the many who knew him, this is a fitting tribute to Dr. Nunn, for, more than anything, his legacy is one of helping people to help themselves.

Mr. President, I wish to express my deepest personal sympathy to his wife, Sallye Roe Nunn, his son, James William Nunn, and three daughters, Peggy Nunn Webster, Ruth Ann Nunn Bond, and Patricia Nunn Barkuloo.

I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the Opelika-Auburn News be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

COUNTY HISTORIAN, ALEXANDER NUNN, DIES AT AGE 80

Alexander Nunn, Lee County's first official historian, died early Sunday afternoon, Jan. 6, 1985 at Wesley Terrace, Auburn. He had served in that capacity since the county commission unanimously established the post in 1977, and was editor of Lee County and Her Forebears, published in 1983. For years he wrote a historical column for the Opelika-Auburn News.

Nunn was a resident of Loachapoka. His family had come into East Alabama with its early settlers. He was born Sept. 17, 1904, attended public school in Notasulga, and finished high school at Auburn in 1920. As a 15-year-old student, he began to write for The Progressive Farmer magazine, and after earning a B.S. degree in agricultural education from Alabama Polytechnic Institute in 1924, he went to work for the firm as a proofreader. He was named assistant managing editor the following year, and retired in 1967 as executive editor and executive vice president.

He was joint author of The Community Handbook, editor of Agricultural Classics, a contributing author to This Is The South, author of Yesterdays in Loachapoka and Communities Nearby, and editor of numerous other publications.

A founding member of the Lee County Historical Society and its museum, he was instrumental in getting the Loachapoka Historical District placed on the National Register of Historic Places.

He was named Honorary American Farmer by Future Farmers of America, received the national 4-H Alumni Award, and was honored by the Soil Conservation Society. A Methodist, he served as delegate to jurisdictional and general conferences, as well as the World Ecumenical Conference of Methodism in England in 1951.

In 1959 he received an honorary doctor of science degree from Auburn University, and later served on the Humanities Advisory Council for the School of Arts and Sciences. He also served on Emory University's Committee of 100.

A longtime member of the Lions Club in Auburn and Birmingham, he was a past president of the Birmingham Downtown Lions. He served on the boards of Blue Cross-Blue Shield of Alabama and the National Agriculture Hall of Fame, was a trustee of the Farm Foundation, and was a member of the Citizens and Southern National Bank Agricultural Advisory Board.

In 1961-62 he was chairman of the National Cotton Advisory Committee, and was national chairman of the Agricultural Advisory Committee in Vocational Education. He served in various advisory capacities in programs related to low-income farm families, and farm ownership development.

A scholarship in agriculture will be established in his name, and the family suggests that in lieu of flowers, those who wish may contribute to the scholarship fund, the Lee County Historical Society, or a favorite church or charity. The fund address is the Agricultural Alumni Association Scholarship Fund—Alexander Nunn Memorial, Auburn University Foundation, 116 Foy Union, Auburn University, Ala., 36849.

A graveside service will be held at 10 a.m. Tuesday at Loachapoka Cemetery with the Rev. Gary Miller officiating. Survivors include his wife Sallye Roe Nunn; one son, James William Nunn, Auburn; three daughters, Peggy Nunn Webster, Auburn, Ruth Ann Bond, Enterprise, and Patricia N. Barkuloo, Tifton, Ga.; 10 grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Frederick's Funeral Home is in charge of arrangements.

[From the Opelika-Auburn (Ala.) News, Jan. 13, 1985]

ALEXANDER NUNN: A NOBLE MAN

(By Hardy L. Graves)

(Editor, Opelika-Auburn News: This is an open letter to the Nunn Family, the people of Loachapoka and indeed, the people of the world.)

Dear Mrs. Nunn and Family:

The loss of your husband and father, Dr. Alexander Nunn, is shared and felt deeply by all of the people of Loachapoka, Lee County and people everywhere who knew him. Let me share with you exactly who I am, not for your benefit, but for the information of others who shall read this letter.

My name is Hardy L. Graves. I was born and reared in Loachapoka. I am black; Dr. Nunn was white. In spite of that Dr. Nunn was like a father to me. In short, he did more for me than any other person I know outside my immediate family. Please know that that is a tremendous compliment to your husband and father for I am everlastingly indebted to a lot of wonderful people in Loachapoka, both black and white. Whatever I have accomplished is due, in large measure, to Dr. Nunn and the people of Loachapoka.

My first contact with Dr. Nunn came in the early 40's; a time when a man of his stature and standing had no need to show kindness and concern in order to get me to work. Dr. Nunn was well aware of this fact, but he never missed the opportunity to teach me and others like me all that we were willing to learn. He had an insatiable appetite for learning and for helping others to learn and to improve themselves in every facet of life. I spent 29 years in the United States Army, retiring with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, an accomplishment that made Dr. Nunn extremely proud. I visited him in September 1981 and informed him of my intentions to retire and enter full-time into the ministry. He looked at me, as only he could, and said, "Hardy, I am proud you are coming home and will be a minister. You have already made history but I had hoped you would have stayed in the Army long enough for you to become the first Black General Officer from East Alabama." He never stopped pushing himself nor the people around him!

Dr. Nunn wrote two books and numerous articles about his beloved Loachapoka and the communities nearby. He was eminently involved in establishing the East Alabama Historical Society, the Annual Loachapoka Syrup Sopping Festival, the Loachapoka Beautification Program and numerous other civic, agriculture and social projects for our community. He walked miles, dug under and round more rocks than anyone to locate and preserve Indian Artifacts and other abandoned and forgotten cemeteries. He left a legacy for us to study and cherish. But more importantly, he left an example for all of us to live by.

Dr. Nunn believed wholeheartedly in education for all people! The O. L. Randolph Memorial Scholarship Fund was established in November 1978, principally to help and encourage black youths graduating from Loachapoka High School to continue their education. Since that time more of the youths graduating from Loachapoka High School than any other county high school in the Lee County area have gone on to college or junior college. Dr. Nunn contributed more, financially, to make that possible than any other person.

I want you to know that to the extent it has been possible, I have, for a long time, attempted to pattern my life after that of your husband and father. He was "The last of a breed." His was the noble example! An example, I pray, that is rooted deep in the hearts and lives of our people. I cannot now speak for all Loachapokians or any of the other countless individuals whose lives Dr. Nunn touched, but I pledge to you this day that I shall spend my life, and be spent, to demonstrate to you and others all the things Dr. ALEXANDER NUNN is to me. For even in death he lives, because I live!

A TRIBUTE TO HENRY GOODRICH

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to share with my colleagues an article from Sky, a publication of Delta Air Lines. This article profiles an outstanding business leader in Alabama, Henry C. Goodrich.

Mr. Goodrich plans to retire as chief executive officer of Sonat, Inc., an energy and energy-services company based in Birmingham in 1985. He is presently serving as the company's chairman of the board. As the South's largest energy supplier, Sonat, Inc., had revenues of $2.7 billion in 1983 and, when final figures are in, expects 1984 to mark its 25th consecutive year of increased profits. Employing about 7,000 people internationally, Sonat is the largest company in Alabama and is said to rank among the 10 most profitable companies in the South. While Sonat is obviously an invaluable asset to the State of Alabama and to the South as a whole, Henry C. Goodrich is valuable in his own right, to both his company and community.

Born in Fayetteville, TN, during the depression, Goodrich learned the value of hard work at an early age. Since his discharge from the Navy in 1945, he has risen straight to the top of every company with which he has been involved. Of his 23 years with Rust Engineering Co., he says, "I helped design most of the major paper mills in the South. I started out on the drawing board and wound up running the place."

Goodrich moved on after becoming senior vice president and a member of the board. He next rose from executive vice president to board chairman and chief executive officer at Inland Container Corp., a manufacturing company. Goodrich transformed this dying family company into a viable competitor in the public marketplace. Under his leadership, Inland was bought by Time, Inc., a move that landed him on Time's board of directors.

With this sort of background, it is not surprising in the least that, under Goodrich's direction, Sonat has grown from a little-known company to become one of the best-known energy companies in the world. Goodrich himself was chiefly responsible for focusing the company's interest on energy. Rather than diversify the company, Goodrich and others have divested Sonat of some interests while pursuing others which they hope will lead to a better future in the energy business. Thus far, this plan has been quite a success.

Along with Goodrich's shrewd business sense, he is admired and widely respected for his supreme managerial skills. By keeping management somewhat decentralized, Goodrich seeks to encourage an entrepreneurial spirit within the company—one which has encouraged the employees to think in broader terms about the business and future possibilities. This approach to business and the present strength of the company are the elements which will ensure the continued prosperity of Sonat, Inc., after the retirement of Henry C. Goodrich in May of this year. The financial community has a very high respect not only for Goodrich but also for the long-term potential of the company. Even this respect is largely due to Goodrich who was instrumental in broadening communication between company executives and financial analysts.

Goodrich and Sonat also enjoy the respect of their home community. Under Goodrich's leadership, Sonat has been involved in Birmingham—with everything from local city government, to local art exhibitions. The influence of Henry Goodrich will continue to be felt through the involvement in civic affairs which he has encouraged among Sonat executives as well as through the impact that Sonat will have on the Southern States.

Henry Goodrich is a great asset to Alabama and the South. Under direction like his, businesses and communities in our country cannot help but prosper.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from Sky magazine concerning Henry C. Goodrich be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HENRY C. GOODRICH—CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, SONAT, INC.

(Profile by Frederick Burger)

It's possible you've never heard of Henry C. Goodrich, or the company he heads. But that's understandable. Goodrich's corporation, Sonat, Inc., may be viewed as the quiet giant among American's energy-related industries.

Goodrich has been the chief executive officer and board chairman of Sonat Inc., an energy and energy-services company, for the last five years. Sonat—which had revenues of $2.7 billion in 1983—is the South's biggest energy supplier. Its 8,500-mile pipeline distributes natural gas to much of the region via such customers as Alagasco in Alabama and Atlanta Gas Light in Georgia. The pipeline, which operates as Southern Natural Gas Co., is Sonat's most profitable subsidiary, earning $105 million in 1983, accounting for half of the company's net earnings.

If you drive a car east of the Mississippi, you're an indirect Sonat customer, too. Among the company's five primary subsidiaries is Sonat Marine Inc., a Philadelphia-based operation that is the largest independent transporter of petroleum products in the U.S. Sonat's 54 tank barges and 40 tugboats work between refineries and distribution points along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

That's not all of it. The company has leases on about 350,000 offshore and some three million onshore acres, where it drills for oil and natural gas via another subsidiary, the Sonat Exploration Co., which is based in Houston.

Sonat's corporate address is downtown Birmingham, Alabama, home of a "medium-size" ocean-oriented energy company that, nevertheless, does business with virtually every oil and gas company in the world. Though Sonat's national profile and local influence have leaped under Goodrich's thoughtful, innovative tenure, the company's 30-story steel-and-glass tower, the tallest in Birmingham, bears no conspicuous identification to remind locals of the corporate giant residing in their midst.

Sonat, however, is far and away the largest company in Alabama. It employs about 7,000 internationally, and probably ranks among the ten most profitable companies in the South, placing it alongside the likes of R.J. Reynolds and Coca-Cola.

"Most size aspects are based on revenues," says Goodrich, chatting amicably in his tasteful top-floor office. "Our revenues are about $2.7 billion. The biggest company in the pipeline industry—leaving out Tenneco—probably has revenues of about $6 billion, the smallest about $500 million. So we're sort of in the middle.

"But if you look at some interesting statistics that Fortune put out, they group us in the service-industry category. Certainly on that basis, while we rank 50th in the utility category in the United States, we were first in profitability and first in growth over a ten-year period. On a pure profit basis, ranking all of Fortune's 1,000 companies, if they put us in there, which they don't because they claim we're a utility company, which we're not, we would rank about 150th in the United States as far as profitability is concerned."

Last year, Sonat posted net earnings of $210 million, an overall three-percent increase over 1982. That's an impressive record, considering the unpredictable fluctuations of the high-risk energy business. Sonat expects 1984 to mark its 25th consecutive year of increased profits.

All of which will be good news for Sonat and its stockholders. The profit figures attest to Goodrich's managerial skills, which have drawn approving nods from Wall Street analysts.

"Henry Goodrich obviously has achieved a good bit," says Ron Cassinari, first vice president and an energy-company analyst with E.F. Hutton in New York City. "He's been in office during a difficult time. There has been a cyclical downturn in offshore contract drilling, but when you look at the overall record, he's done a fine job. The financial community in general has a very high regard for Sonat, its management, and the long-term potential of its operations."

That analysis is directly attributable to Henry Goodrich's stewardship. Under his leadership, Sonat renewed its emphasis on, and commitment to the energy business. Investments in research and production increased dramatically, a tack that Cassinari says will enhance Sonat's chances for continued growth in the future. In addition, Goodrich has made it a point to broaden communications between company executives and financial analysts. Before Goodrich assumed the reins, Sonat maintained a low profile indeed, even in the financial community. Cassinari, in fact, recalls having little if any prior contact with Sonat executives. As a result, neither he nor other important Wall Street analysts knew much about the company, its strategies, or goals.

Goodrich changed all that. A recent survey conducted by Cassinari shows that energy-company analysts are more familiar with Sonat than other similar companies, some of which are larger.

"Under the aegis of Mr. Goodrich, security analysts have come to know the management of Sonat better than before," Cassinari says. "And he's been responsible for putting in a management-succession plan. Wall Street has a high regard for the people who will be leading this company in the future."

It is a measure of Goodrich's background, experience, and forsight that he has had a significant impact on Sonat. Some might have expected his tenure as CEO and chairman of the board to be that of a caretaker executive. However, Goodrich's shrewd business sense and the respect of his peers led him into a more active role than some probably anticipated.

"What he's really done is get people to think in broader terms," says William Koke, Sonat's director of financial relations. "He's thrown the window open and let fresh air in. He's been the right person at the right time."

Anyone who knows Henry Goodrich would have expected nothing less. He strikes first-time visitors as a gentle, courtly man. But his corporate success has marked him as a man of no small ambition. After all, he has led several corporate lives, all of which exposed him to competing ideas and sometimes divergent corporate strategies. His evolving curiosity and fascination with differing aspects of the business world prepared him for the broad range of tasks that ultimately enabled him to see clearly and deal with whatever was the job at hand.

All of those qualities began to take shape in his Depression-era childhood. He was born 64 years ago in Fayetteville, Tennessee, the son of a country doctor and a "fine Christian lady." His family was prominent for the times and place, though his father often had to barter his services with his rural patients. Goodrich recalls being exposed to the work ethic early: "I started carrying papers when I was in the fifth grade. I guess I've been working ever since."

Goodrich, too, considered becoming a doctor, but passed on the idea: "My interests were more technical. I guess I've always been interested in building things." When the opportunity arose to work his way through school, he enrolled at the University of Tennessee, where he received a degree in civil engineering in 1942.

From there, he went into the U.S. Navy's Civil Engineering Crops ("I got my first taste of management there"), spending the better part of three years building docks, bridges, and pipelines in Panama. Then, upon discharge in 1945, he started looking for a civilian job. He quickly landed one in Birmingham with the Rust Engineering Co., where he started out drawing plans for industrial plants that produced such things as steel, tires, paper products, and textile goods. Then he moved into sales, where he helped garner the company not only the planning work for plants, but the construction work as well.

"I helped design most of the major paper mills in the South," Goodrich recalls. "I started out on the drawing board and wound up running the place."

Goodrich spent 23 years with Rust, leaving after having become senior vice president and a member of the board of directors. In 1967, his career took another turn. Rust had been an engineering-construction business, but then came the opportunity to join the Inland Container Corp., a manufacturing concern that turns out corrugated boxes. It was something of a right turn career-wise, but one which he made easily. Goodrich stayed with Inland in Indianapolis for 12 years, starting out as executive vice president and leaving as board chairman and chief executive officer.

At Inland, he had presided over the complex sale of the company to Time Inc., a relationship that landed him on Time's board of directors, a position he still holds. The Inland post also found him being invited to join the board of Southern Natural Resources Inc. (now Sonat), which then had a forest-products division.

So his association with Inland played a major role in his career movement, but it also tested his mettle. Inland had been an ailing company, family owned and underfinanced for capital expansion. "It was a challenge," Goodrich says of his days at Inland. "We had to shift into the public marketplace. We went through all the interesting aspects of changing it from a family company to a public one whose stock was sold on the New York Stock Exchange. There's no question that [Inland] was not in the best of shape when I went up there. Looking back, it was in bad shape. We had to change the attitudes of a lot of people, who had given up. The founders weren't willing to put any more money into the company. Changing that attitude to a growth attitude was probably the most challenging part of it.

"We had a struggle at Inland, and I think we did an outstanding job. It wasn't just me; it was a whole lot of people. It [the sale to Time Inc.] was a good deal. Everybody was happy; nobody got fired. Everybody got promoted."

At the same time, Goodrich found himself the head of a subsidiary. It wasn't so much that he wished to remain top-dog as it was that the challenge at Inland had ended. And, too, he always had planned to return and settle in Birmingham. The hopes of that became reality when Southern Natural Resources started looking for a replacement for John Shaw, the company's retiring chief.

The line of succession was unclear, and some of the company's younger executives were untested. The board of directors started casting about and settled on one of its own: Henry Goodrich. Goodrich returned to Birmingham in 1979, and assumed the posts of president and chief administrative officer. Within three months, he was made CEO.

"You've got to remember, I had been an outside director for Southern Natural Resources for ten years," Goodrich says. "But this was another change in career. This is an energy company; Inland had been a manufacturing company. This job has a great deal to do with civil engineering, but as far as the processes are concerned, the manufacturing and energy processes are different. Of course, this company was in good condition. It was a little different compared to Inland."

Henry Goodrich was immediately charged by the board of directors to do several things: establish a line of succession, maintain the company's growth record, and increase company involvement in government affairs. He has done all of that. For instance, after several years of sorting through the abilities of younger executives, Sonat chose Ronald L. Kuehn, Jr., formerly president and chief operating officer, to step up and become the company's chief executive officer. Goodrich, in fact, retired as CEO on June 1, but is expected to remain as board chairman through next May.

He also established a full government affairs office in Washington, D.C., where the important decisions in the energy business are made.

Perhaps Goodrich's single most important corporate act, however, has been to refocus the company's sights on what it knows best: energy. He changed the corporate name to Sonat, which reflects the company's international operations, thus erasing an appellation that implied only regional activities.

He was instrumental in seeing that Sonat divested itself of its forest-products division—an equally split investment with the Boise Cascade Corp. In selling those interests to Boise for $300 million (Boise also will assume Sonat's $112-million share of the debt), Sonat expects to increase earnings by $50 million this year. That deal—Sonat will retain mineral rights to 700,000 acres of West Louisiana timberland—was seen as helping Sonat refocus its sights on the energy business.

In addition, Sonat spent $141 million earlier this year to buy Teleco Oilfield Services of Meriden, Connecticut, a high-tech inventor. Teleco pioneered development of sophisticated devices that reduce exploration costs by providing technical data during on-site drills for oil and natural gas. That acquisition is seen as a major investment in Sonat's future development of energy.

"The strategy of the company, sticking with the energy business, is obviously one they can hang around my neck, because that's exactly where I came out," Goodrich says. "I'm convinced this bunch could do most anything, but we're betting on the long term as far as contract drilling is concerned, so we're going ahead with building $100-million rigs. Nobody else is, but we are. We believe in the business and staking out a niche in the high-tech aspect of it."

Goodrich has been a manager long enough to know that there are precious few companies that went through major diversification programs and succeeded: "You can count 'em on two toes. Rather than undertake that, which really has a high degree of risk-taking, we decided to stick with energy. Why get away from a business you like and know something about?"

A cornerstone of Goodrich's management philosophy is that you don't drill a hole when the odds are the field is dry. Another is that you hire capable people and let them do their jobs. There are those with Sonat, who have worked with other companies in other states, that marvel at the Birmingham company's executive talent.

"Most companies are very badly managed," says Sonat's Koke. "They usually have one or two people who are dynamite, and their momentum carries the company along. When I came to Sonat, I never saw so many competent people. I've never seen such depth in a company."

Goodrich's management style clearly lures and encourages that kind of talent. He talks of the way managers should "take chances." He refers to nurturing Sonat's "entrepreneurial spirit."

"The entrepreneurial spirit is still out there, and that's one thing we've tried to introduce in a big way," says Goodrich, who's said to be an unyielding competitor on the tennis court and golf course as well. "It's very difficult, because we get so hidebound by all the trappings and rules and regulations. So I've tried to treat people like entrepreneurs, get them to think like entrepreneurs, try to get them to be risk-takers. Of course, ours is a risk-taking business, so we don't have the problem some companies do. We compensate people well, and we let 'em earn by doing. We don't fire somebody for failure if an honest effort has been made in a risk-taking venture, because you're going to have some failures."

Goodrich has encouraged that risk-taking spirit by seeing that management remains somewhat decentralized. As an example, strategic planning of subsidiaries was once performed at the company's highest levels; now it's put together at the subsidiary level, then approved by upper-echelon management.

When Goodrich retires from Sonat next year—and there are those who can't imagine him retiring—he will have left his mark on the company and the community as well. More than his predecessors, Goodrich has taken an active part in civic affairs and insisted that other company executives do the same.

Sonat executives regularly play major roles in local United Way campaigns. A couple of years ago, Goodrich loaned virtually all the company's financial whizzes to the city to study Birmingham's future revenue needs. Last year, the company cofunded an exhibit of Deep South artists at the Birmingham Museum of Art; after company employees voted on their preferred pieces in the 75-work exhibit, Sonat bought the two favorites for display at the corporate headquarters. The company has also had a hand in arranging for the exhibit of the prestigious Armand Hammer collection at the museum next year.

"I hope I leave corporate involvement as a legacy," says Goodrich, who loves nothing more than a good bird hunt. "I beleive in companies and people working for them paying their civic rent. And I hope our people will continue to play a major role.

"We've taken the position that Birmingham is our home base, that we're going to stay here and expand here. We've chosen to work with the city in a number of areas, primarily trying to help them in their financial problems, towards developing a program for the future.

"Whether it will be successful or not, I don't know," Goodrich concludes. "But we think it's got a fighting chance."

IN PRAISE OF DAVID STOCKMAN

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the RECORD today will show some remarks critical of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mr. Stockman. While I do not rise to contend with my colleagues who may be critical at the moment of Mr. Stockman and perhaps the choice of his words, at the same time I did not wish the RECORD to be closed today without some offsetting praise.

This Senator thinks that Mr. Stockman is doing a very difficult job very well indeed. If he is perhaps a little injudicious occasionally in his choice of words, that is understandable; certainly understandable to Members of this body who daily, with increasing intensity, are the focus of special-interest lobbying efforts. I think that Members of this body, therefore, can understand that Mr. Stockman is even more intensely the subject of the focus of even more intense lobbying.

It must be very frustrating indeed for him to find his proposals shot down time after time. So his frustration can be understood.

In fact, this Senator, at least, finds his candor refreshing. There are a great many fat, bloated sacred cows in this city and in this Nation which need to be skewered and punctured and Mr. Stockman is well justified in his criticism, and his choice of words can be understood.

I say more power to him. I say let him be frank and candid and renew his vigor in attacking the waste and unaffordable spending that goes on in this Government year after year.

Mr. President I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS ON TAIWAN

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I have risen on many occasions in the past to protest the denial of human rights and democratic freedoms on Taiwan. I do so again today.

I do this not to punish the Taiwan Government or to take sides in political disputes. On the contrary, I am convinced that many on Taiwan, unlike a number of other developing countries, genuinely want to make changes that can lead to greater democracy for all the island's people. Such a process is not easy. Progress can by no means be guaranteed. Positive steps forward are often followed by backsliding. Some on Taiwan fear change and do their best to frustrate the reformers. So, I speak out not to chastise all, but to encourage those who genuinely seek to bring basic democratic freedoms to all the people on Taiwan.

One of the basic freedoms of a democracy is a free press. Unfortunately, the press on Taiwan is not now, and has never been, completely free. The Government directly or indirectly controls most publications. Some opposition newspapers and magazines exist, but they are constantly harassed and frequently closed down. Their staffs often find themselves in jail. This situation, however, has not remained static.

A slow process of allowing greater freedom of the press can be traced especially under the current President, Chiang Ching-kuo. The process has been marred by a lack of clear guidelines on what were permissible activities and by periods of retrenchment in which harsh punishments were meted out for what had previously been acceptable practices. Needless to say, these periods have a tremendous chilling effect on the members of the press.

We are witnessing such a period of retrenchment and arbitrary judgments right now on Taiwan. The Neo-Formosa Weekly is under attack. Three persons associated with this publication—Mr. Chen Shei-ben, Lee Yi-yang, and Huang Tien-fu—have been found guilty of libel. They have appealed their case, but hold out little hope that the verdict will be overturned. From what I know of the case, it appears that Neo-Formosa has been singled out for punishment to serve as a warning to others that they might be next. A free press cannot exist under such conditions.

The Henry Liu case is another matter that disturbs me. Although it has nothing to do with freedom of the press, it has everything to do with the arbitrary powers sometimes practiced by the authorities on Taiwan or those employed by them. Numerous accusations have been made in the past concerning Taiwan's intelligence activities here in the United States. I do not know if all these accusations are true. I also do not know all of the relevant details of the Henry Liu case. I do know that we cannot tolerate illegal activities of any sort on our shores. If such acts have occurred in the past, I am appalled. If there are intelligence units operating illegally in this country now, they must be stopped immediately. Finally, Taiwan must be put on notice that we will not tolerate any such activities in the future.

Thank you.

THE COMING CRISIS IN TEACHING

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, over the last several years much has been made of the crisis in American education. I would like to take a few minutes of the Senate's time to discuss what I believe to be one of the most important aspects in the successful resolution of this crisis. The National Commission on Excellence in Education's report, "A Nation at Risk," spelled out in clear terms the great challenge that lies ahead of this country if we are going to adequately educate future generations. The report outlined a need for higher academic standards, greater attention to the rudiments of education, and a need to improve the capabilities of American teachers. The response to this report has been outstanding. Education now stands at the top of the national agenda.

In every State in the Nation a flurry of activity is underway to improve our elementary and secondary schools. State legislatures have concentrated on raising the competency of graduating high school students and providing incentives for more effective teaching. At last report, according to the U.S. Department of Education, 40 States have raised their high school graduation requirements, 23 have increased the instructional time for students, 45 have undertaken the process of curriculum reform. According to the Department of Education report, "A Nation Responds," 14 States have approved salary increases for teachers, and 30 have some scheme for master teacher/career ladder systems under consideration.

The groundswell of concern and the activity to improve our system of education were born at the local level. The National Commission merely amplified the cries of frustrated parents and of educators into a shout so loud that government at all levels was forced to respond. And respond it has. In almost every case, the States and localities have led the way toward a better education of America's students. Total spending on education in the United States has steadily risen since 1980. During the 1979 school year, resources totaling over $165 billion were committed to education by local, State, and Federal Government. By 1983-84 that commitment had risen by over 30 percent to $227 billion. More important, is the fact that although Federal outlays have risen over this same period, the State and local share of total spending has increased. Education has traditionally been, and should remain, primarily State and local responsibility and function.

The Federal Government bears the responsibility for helping to chart this Nation's course into the future. The education of our children is perhaps the most important factor we consider as we chart that course. And so, the Federal Government has a vital role to play in fostering better education. The National Commission on Excellence in Education turned out a virtuoso performance in this regard. I would like to reflect, however, on where we go from here.

Mr. President, in the classic sense there are two characters in an educational setting. There is the student and there is the teacher. Traditionally, the focus of Federal effort has been on assisting students. The National Commission focused on improving student performance. By and large, Federal education programs are designed to directly benefit students in the greatest need of assistance. Compensatory education, education for the handicapped impact aid, and college student assistance programs all serve students. The goal of these efforts has been increased access to education and to provide for an equal quality of instruction in all American public schools. We have found Mr. President, that over the years spending money on students is not necessarily the answer to achieving these goals of greater access, equality, and quality of instruction. There are other, more powerful forces at work that affect education.

Shifting demographics the state of the economy, and increases in crime and violence in our communities have had a profound impact on our schools. One of the most devastating forces affecting education is the state of the teaching profession.

Teachers are not well compensated. It is tragic that in a system that rewards productivity and individual initiative, teachers with these qualities who choose to stay in the classroom face dismal prospects when it comes to career earning potential.

There is not a great deal of respect for teachers in the community. In fact, there is often a certain disregard for teachers as professionals. Teachers are expected to inform, discipline, and inspire our children. Students are expected to show results. Consequently, when the school system is not performing up to our expectations, teachers get the blame.

Mr. President, we are all aware of the decline in college board scores throughout the 1970's and early 1980's. Teachers clearly share responsibility for the poor showing of American students on a range of academic measures. We are also aware that in 1984 that downward trend was turned around. For the first time in years, the average SAT score went up. Teachers share the credit for this as well.

Mr. President, as parent and grandparent, I know how important teachers are in the lives of children. For 13 years, a child spends more of his waking hours with his teacher than he does his parents. As a "guesstimate," our children spend about 1,400 hours each year for 13 years with their schoolteachers. Intelligent, skillful, articulate, enthusiastic, experienced teachers are crucial to the well-being of our Nation's most precious resource. It is clear that the quality of America's teachers have much to do with the future quality of American life.

Fortunately, there is a great deal of debate on how to improve the quality of today's teachers and what steps should be taken to insure an adequate supply of quality teachers in the years ahead. It is a lively debate in which the participants are numerous and the opinions are varied. In the coming weeks, I hope to help bring greater attention to this debate by including in the RECORD a number of articles, essays, and statements on the subject of teaching in America. In the end, as the Committee on Labor and Human Resources considers the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act, I hope to not only focus attention on the state of teaching in America, but to define a proper role for the Federal Government in assisting in the improvement of the profession as well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Rand Corp. report, "The Coming Crisis in Teaching," be printed in the RECORD following my remarks. I believe this report is a good commentary with which to start.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEYOND THE COMMISSION REPORTS: THE COMING CRISIS IN TEACHING

(By Linda Darling-Hammond)

PREFACE

The text of this report was first compiled and presented as a briefing to the Rand Corporation Board of Trustees on April 13, 1984. The research on which it is based was accumulated over the course of several Rand studies of the teaching profession, supported in part by the National Institute of Education and The Ford Foundation. Because of widespread interest in the topic, the briefing is being published as a report so that it can be made available to education policymakers, practitioners, and researchers who are concerned about the status of, and the prospects for, the teaching profession.

SUMMARY

This report treats the current status of the teaching profession at a time when renewed efforts to improve the quality of American education are occurring at the federal, state, and local levels. The report demonstrates that dramatic changes in our nation's teaching force will soon lead to serious shortages of qualified teachers unless policies that restructure the teaching profession are pursued. Until teaching becomes a more attractive career alternative, the problems of attracting and retaining talented teachers will undermine the success of other reforms intended to upgrade educational programs and curricula.

The report analyzes recent data indicating changes in the recruitment and retention patterns of the American teaching force, in the quality of teachers, and in the attractiveness of teaching as a profession. The current highly educated and experienced teaching force is dwindling as older teachers retire in increasing numbers and many younger teachers leave for other occupations. Recent evidence suggests that new recruits to teaching are less academically qualified than those who are leaving, and the number of new entrants is insufficient to meet the coming demand for teachers. The most academically able recruits to teaching leave the profession within a very short time. Shortages of qualified teachers in subject areas such as mathematics and science are expected to grow over the next few years into a more generalized teacher shortage as enrollments increase and the supply of prospective teachers continues to shrink.

Several factors contribute to this problem. Demographic trends are provoking supply and demand imbalances for teachers. More significantly, though, academically talented women and minorities, who were once restricted to teaching as a professional option, are now choosing other occupations that promise greater financial rewards, more opportunities for advancement, and better working conditions. Teachers' salaries fall well below those of most other occupations that require a college degree, and average teachers' salaries have been declining for the past decade. The non-pecuniary rewards of teaching have also been dwindling, as teachers are increasingly viewed as bureaucratic functionaries rather than as practicing professionals. Lack of input into professional decisionmaking, overly restrictive bureaucratic controls, and inadequate administrative supports for teaching contribute to teacher dissatisfaction and attrition, particularly among the most highly qualified members of the teaching force.

Unless major changes are made in the structure of the teaching profession, so that teaching becomes an attractive career alternative for talented individuals, we will in a very few years face widespread shortages of qualified teachers. We will be forced to hire the least academically able students to fill these vacancies, and they will become the tenured teaching force for the next two generations of American school children.

Higher salaries for teachers are only part of the solution to this problem. As in other occupations, working conditions that affect teachers' abilities to perform their jobs effectively are a partial substitute for wages. In teaching, a particularly important aspect of those working conditions is the degree of professionalism allowed in the work structure. Professionalizing teaching will require a new career structure in which improved preparation and professionally enforced standards of practice are combined with increased responsibility for technical decisionmaking by those who successfully demonstrate their competence. Upgrading teacher compensation and creating more professional working conditions are part of a structural solution, one that addresses the interrelated causes of the teacher supply and quality problems, rather than merely their symptoms.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This report is the product of many people's insights. Several years of research and reflection on teaching issues by Arthur E. Wise provided much of the conceptual background for this study. Rand researchers Thomas K. Glennan, Paul T. Hill, Sue E. Berryman, and Richard Shavelson contributed important criticisms as the briefing was being prepared. David Lyon provided motivation for compiling the briefing and this report. Mary Vaiana assisted in the cogent formulation of the ideas presented herein. The author, of course, remains responsible for any errors of fact or interpretation that have survived their careful scrutiny.

Wanted

"College graduate with academic major (master's degree preferred). Excellent communication and leadership skills required. Challenging opportunity to serve 150 clients daily, developing up to five different products each day to meet their needs. This diversified job also allows employee to exercise typing, clerical, law enforcement, and social work skills between assignments and after hours. Adaptability helpful, since supplier cannot always deliver goods and support services on time. Typical work week 47 hours. Special nature of work precludes fringe benefits such as lunch and coffee breaks, but work has many intrinsic rewards. Starting salary $12,769, with a guarantee of $24,000 after only 14 years."

The conditions described in this want ad accurately characterize the typical secondary school teaching assignment in the United States today. Who would take a job like this? The answer to that question is the topic of this report.

The Emerging Crisis in Teaching

Over the past eighteen months, a number of major reports have been issued on the quality of American education. Reports from the National Commission on Excellence in Education, the Education Commission of the states, the National Science Board, the Twentieth Century Fund, and other institutions have called for higher educational standards, increased course requirements, and other major reforms designed to improve the quality of instruction. The message of these reports is important. However, the crisis now emerging in the teaching profession could preclude the attainment of the other reforms being urged. If public schools are to attract enough highly qualified people to become teachers, working conditions and compensation must change in significant ways.

The nation's teaching force is changing dramatically. The current highly educated and experienced staff is dwindling as older teachers retire and many younger teachers leave for other occupations. Recent evidence suggests that new recruits to teaching are less academically qualified than those who are leaving; moreover, the number of new entrants is insufficient to meet the coming demand.

Chart 1 shows the decline in academic ability of students planning to become teachers, as measured by scores from Scholastic Aptitude Tests (SAT). The scores of students planning to major in education have traditionally been lower than those of other students. In addition, over the past decade, the scores of potential education majors have declined more steeply than those of other students.[1] Most teaching recruits are now drawn from the bottom group of SAT scorers; most of the few top scorers who are recruited to education leave the profession quickly.[2]

Chart 2 shows the pattern of attrition from teaching, using data for white female

entrants to the teaching profession in 1973 in North Carolina. Here the measure of ability is the National Teachers Examination (NTE), which is given to prospective teachers in many states. The attrition rates of the North Carolina teachers tested in 1973 were directly related to NTE scores: Many more top scorers than bottom scorers left teaching within 7 years. By 1980, almost two-thirds of the top decile had left, whereas only about one-third of the bottom decile had left.[3]

Although these measures of academic ability do not fully predict teaching performance, it is clear that the teaching profession is attracting and retaining fewer academically able young people than it has in the past.

For most of the past decade, there has been a widely recognized surplus of teachers, so policymakers have not been aware of recent changes in recruitment patterns. In the past few years, though, shortages have been occurring in certain teaching areas, particularly in secondary school specialties. A recent survey of teacher placement officers[4] identified nationwide shortages in the following areas:

Mathematics; physics; computer programming; chemistry; data processing; bilingual education; special education; Earth science; biology; and English.

The shortages in mathematics and the sciences are particularly severe, but other teaching areas that formerly showed surpluses are also joining the list. The shortages have immediate effects on educational quality, because they mean that courses must often be taught by teachers who are not qualified in the subject areas.

Charts 3 and 4 show the dimensions of this qualifications problem. In 1981, the most recent year for which data are available, fewer than half of the newly hired teachers in mathematics and science were certified or eligible for certification in the subjects they were assigned to teach. Fewer than two-thirds of the newly hired teachers in English, social studies, and other secondary subjects were qualified by this criterion.[5]

The shortage of mathematics and science teachers exemplifies the magnitude of the long-range teacher supply problem. According to one set of estimates, of a total teaching force of about 200,000 mathematics and science teachers, 9 percent left in 1982-83, 30 percent are not fully qualified for the subjects they are teaching, and over 40 percent with retire within the next decade.[6] The National Science Teachers Association estimates that 300,000 new mathematic and science teachers will be needed by 1995—more than the total number of mathematics and science teachers currently teaching.[7]

Furthermore, there is not indication that the teaching profession is attracting new mathematics and science teachers at a rate that might potentially meet the increased demand. In fact, as Chart 5 shows, exactly the opposite is true. In 1981, the nation's colleges granted fewer than 1400 bachelor's degrees in the fields of mathematics and science education combined.[8] This number represents less than one mathematics or science teacher for every ten school districts in the United States. In the following school year, 1982-83, about 18,000 mathematics and science teachers left their teaching positions. (About 37 percent of these teachers left for non-teaching employment; 9 percent retired; and the remainder took other teaching-related jobs.)[9]

All indications are that the shortages of specialized teachers will expand to a more general shortage of qualified teachers within the next few years. Given current trends in school-age population, entrants to the teaching profession, and attrition, the supply of new teacher graduates may satisfy only about 80 percent of the demand for additional teachers by 1988[10] (see Chart 6).

Although teacher shortage have occured before, most recently in the 1960s' there are new reasons for the current shortages, and new response will be required. Demographic trends, expanded opportunities for minorities and women, and the low salaries and lack of prestige associated with teaching—each a powerful force in itself— combine to make solutions to the shortage problem more difficult to design and implement.

Demographic trends have provoked supply and demand embalances in teaching before, and they are doing so once again. As Chart 7 showns, the sources of supply and demand are moving opposite directions for the sources of supply and demand are moving in opposite directions for the short-term future. After a decade of declining enrollments in elementary and secondary schools, a baby boomlet that began in the early 1980s will begin to cause enrollment increases starting to 1985. At the same time, the college-age population from which most potential teachers will be drawn will continue to decline through the remainder of the decade and slighty beyond.

Meanwhile, the number and proportion of bachelor's degrees conferred in education have declined fairly steeply over the past decade. In times past, public education was a major employer of college graduates. In 1971, for example, more than 20 percent of the bachelor's degrees conferred were in education. By 1981, the proportion had dipped to less than 12 percent.[11] This decline may have been partly a response to the teacher surpluses that characterized the 1970s; however, the data suggest that other market forces are at work as well. Alternative occupations are available to a wider spectrum of college graduates, and many are choosing these more lucrative fields, even though the demand for teachers is growing. There is no sign that supply is responding to demand even in fields where there are widely publicized shortages. The number of education degrees conferred in mathematics and science, for example, continues to decline.[12]

One of the labor market factors having the greatest effect on the teaching profession is the growth in opportunities available to women and minorities. Women have traditionally comprised the large majority of the teaching force, and they still do so. However, academically talented women, in particular, are increasingly pursuing other occupations. Between 1970 and 1980, the proportion of women receiving bachelor's degrees in education decreased by half, from 36 percent to 18 percent. By 1981, the proportion had dropped to 17 percent.[13] During that decade, women's professional options expanded enormously, as Chart 8 shows. Women's occupational choices shifted from education, English, and the social sciences to business and commerce and the health professions. The proportion of degrees granted to women also increased tenfold in the biological sciences, computer sciences, engineering, and law.[14]

Why Has Teaching Lost its Appeal?

Can academically able students be reattracted to the teaching profession in a labor market that offers other, more attractive choices?

The current salary structure of the teaching profession will surely not provide strong motivation. Beginning salaries for teachers are lower than those in virtually any other field requiring a bachelor's degree (Chart 9). Even when teaching salaries are adjusted to reflect a twelve-month salary equivalent, they fall short of the next lowest category (liberal arts graduates).[15] Teachers' salaries also reach a ceiling much sooner and at a much lower level than do the salaries of other college-educated workers.

The situation is made worse by the fact that teachers' salaries have lost ground relative to other occupational salaries over the past ten years. Although there is a common perception that teachers' salaries have improved as a result of collective bargaining, average salaries for teachers actually declined by nearly 15 percent in real dollar terms between 1971 and 1981,[16] even though the average experience level of the teaching force increased over that period, as did the average education level. The majority of teachers now have at least a master's degree and about 13 years of experience.[17]

The data paint a rather gloomy picture of the recruitment potential of the teaching profession. But many studies suggest that people are attracted to teaching for altruistic reasons—because they love to work with children and want to make a contribution to society. Indeed, the primary rewards of teaching are the intrinsic, non-pecuniary satisfactions derived from imparting knowledge and seeing young people grow and learn.[18] But even these satisfactions have been declining as the nature of teaching work has changed. Teachers express increasing dissatisfaction with the conditions under which they work and the policies that define their classroom activities.

For several decades, the National Education Association has polled several thousand teachers annually about their teaching conditions and views. One question asked in each poll is, If you could go back and start all over again, would you still become a teacher? Chart 10 shows the dramatic change in the response to that question over twenty years. Between 1971 and 1981, the proportion of respondents saying they would not teach again more than tripled, rising from about 10 percent to nearly 40 percent. Less than half of the present teaching force say they plan to continue teaching until retirement.[19]

It is easy to summarize the factors that contribute to teacher dissatisfaction. Teachers feel that they lack support—physical support in terms of adequate facilities and materials; support services such as clerical help for typing, duplicating, and paperwork chores; and administrative support that would provide a school environment in which their work is valued and supported rather than obstructed by interruptions and a proliferation of non-teaching tasks. They see their ability to teach hampered by large class sizes non-teaching duties. And they feel that they are not treated as professionals. They have limited input to decisions that critically affect their work environment, and they see few opportunities for professional growth.[20]

Let us translate these categories into more concrete terms. Imagine that you are a high-school English teacher. You have at least a master's degree (as do most teachers today) and you would like to impart to your students the joys of great literature and the skills of effective communication. You have at your disposal a set of 100 textbooks for your 140 students. You cannot order additional books so you make copies of some plays and short stories, at your own expense, and you jockey with the 50 other teachers in your school for access to one of the two available typewriters so that you can produce other materials for your class. You stand in line after school to use the secretary's telephone to call parents of students who have been absent or are behind in their work.

You spend roughly 12 hours each week correcting papers, because you believe your students should write a theme each week. You feel guilty that this allows you to spend only 5 minutes per paper. You spend another 6 hours each week preparing for your five different sections, mostly writing up the behavioral objectives required by the system's curriculum guide, which you find meaningless and even counterproductive to your goals for your students. You do all of this after school hours, because your one preparation period is devoted to preparing attendance forms, doing other administrative paperwork, and meeting with students who need extra help. Between classes, you monitor hallways and restrooms, supervise the lunch room, and track down truants.

You are frustrated that the district's new competency-based curriculum is forcing you to spend more and more of your time teaching students to answer multiple-choice questions about the mechanics of grammar. Meanwhile, your efforts to teach writing and critical thinking are discouraged, as they do not seem to fit with the district's mandated curriculum and testing program. You have no input into decisions about curriculum, teaching methods, materials, or resource allocations. You will, of course, never get a promotion; nor will you have an opportunity to take on new responsibilities. You receive frequent feedback about public dissatisfaction with schools and teachers, but little reinforcement from administrators or parents that your work is appreciated. Sometimes you wonder whether your efforts are worth the $15,000 a year you earn for them.

This description is not an overdramatization. It reflects the model conditions of teaching work in this country today. The importance of professional working conditions to teacher satisfaction and retention has recently been recognized in a number of studies at Rand and elsewhere. Conditions that undermine teacher efficacy, i.e., the teacher's ability to do an effective job of teaching, are strongly related to teacher attrition. These conditions include lack of opportunity for professional discourse and decisionmaking input; inadequate preparation and teaching time; and conflict with or lack of support from administrators.[21]

A particularly troubling aspect of teachers' dissatisfaction with their working conditions is that the most highly qualified teachers are the most dissatisfied. Chart 11 summarizes some results from a recent Rand study of teachers' views of their work environment.[22] Those with academic majors (i.e., those who have a bachelor's or master's degree in their discipline in addition to a teaching certificate) are more dissatisfied with the lack of administrative support for their work, with bureaucratic interference in their work, with their lack of autonomy, and with salaries and other working conditions than are those with education degrees only. Academic majors have typically taken substantially more college coursework in their area of specialization than education majors, and they also tend to be the teachers who hold more advanced degrees. These highly qualified individuals are the kinds of teachers that many would like to attract to and retain in teaching, yet they are the ones most frustrated by the profession's current work environment. They are also much more likely than other teachers to say they plan to leave teaching.

Unfortunately, the approach to improving education reflected in most of the policy initiatives of the past decade has done little to increase the attractiveness of teaching; it may, in fact, have exacerbated the problem. Based on a factory model of schooling in which teachers are semi-skilled, low-paid workers, at least two-thirds of the states enacted policies in the 1970s that sought to standardize and regulate teacher behaviors. Elaborate accountability schemes such as management-by-objectives, competency-based education, minimum-competency testing, and other efforts to develop a teacher-proof curriculum were imposed in the belief that if teachers do exactly as they are told, students will learn exactly as they are supposed to.[23] Bureaucratic controls on teaching behaviors were used as an alternative to upgrading the quality of teachers or of professional decisionmaking. As Porter notes:

"The accountability movements of the 1970s view teachers not as autonomous decisionmakers but as agents of public school policymakers, agents subject to hierarchical controls."[24]

These policies have not had the desired effect, because they are based on an inappropriate model of teaching and learning. Indeed, they have had some dysfunctional consequences. Teachers resist bureaucratic attempts to constrain their classroom decisions,[25] not because they are opposed to accountability, but because standardized teaching prescriptions reduce their ability to teach effectively.[26] Highly prescriptive teaching policies often limit the curriculum to those subjects and types of thinking that are most easily tested; such policies also prevent the use of alternative teaching strategies that are more appropriate to students' learning needs and creates paperwork burdens that detract from teaching time.[27] The results are twofold: emphasis on procedural conformity to narrowly configured objectives at the expense of more creative forms of teaching and learning; and dissatisfaction on the part of teachers who find their ability to respond to students' needs reduced.

Research on effective teaching suggests a very different model for improving education. Studies conducted over the past two decades show that students have different learning styles, and that effective teaching techniques vary for students of different characteristics and at different stages in their development, for different subject areas, and for different learning goals.[28] Appropriate teaching techniques must be determined by diagnosing student needs and matching those diverse needs to appropriate methods of instruction. In this context, professional judgment is a prerequisite for good teaching, because unless students are treated according to their particular learning needs, they will be mistreated. Standardized practice is, in essence, malpractice. The need for diagnosis of individual situations and for judgments about appropriate strategies and tactics is what defines a profession.[29]

Our own research on teachers reinforces this view. Teachers find that uniform teaching prescriptions prevent them from attending to the variable needs of their students and to the conceptual demands of their academic disciplines. In one study, 45 percent of the teachers we interviewed said they would resign from teaching if prescriptiveness of teaching content and methods increased.[30] For them, a nonprofessional work structure diminished the satisfactions of their work to an unacceptable degree. Future policies ought to respond to the fact that these professional incentives are very important to teachers.

Professionalizing Teaching

The many factors that discourage qualified people from entering and remaining in the teaching profession are converging at a time when teacher retirements and student enrollment trends are leading to increased demand for teachers. As a consequence, it will be necessary to hire and retain large numbers of marginally qualified people into teaching unless major changes are made in the structure of the occupation.

Higher salaries for teachers are only part of the solution to the problem. The non-pecuniary aspects of teaching are at least as important as salaries in attracting and retaining good teachers. (In any case, the public is not likely to support higher salaries if serious efforts are not made to upgrade the perceived quality of the teaching force.) As in other occupations, improved working conditions for teachers are a partial substitute for higher wages. A particularly important aspect of those working conditions is the degree of professionalism allowed in the work structure. Upgrading the quality of teacher preparation and creating more professional working conditions are part of a structural solution, one that attends to the interrelated causes of the problem rather than merely to its symptoms. In fact, teaching is now much like the legal and medical professions were at the turn of the century. Until fundamental changes were made in the structure of these professions, they, too, were characterized by low wages, easy access, poor training, no real standards of practice, and a poor public image.

What would it mean to "professionalize" teaching? The following features that characterize most modern professions serve to ensure and allow competent performance:

Rigorous entry requirements; supervised induction; autonomous performance; peer-defined standards of practice; increased responsibility with increased competence.

Entry requirements are rigorous because the work requires mastery of a body of knowledge. Induction into the occupation is supervised by experienced practitioners because developing professional judgment means learning how to translate theory into practice. Performance after induction is autonomous because treatment must be tailored to the clientele and their specific needs. Peers define standards of practice because specialized expertise is the basis for informed judgment, and standardized procedures cannot meet the demands of the work. Tying increased responsibility to demonstrated competence is the means by which professional standards of practice are promulgated and conveyed. Experienced practitioners induct new entrants and are responsible for technical decisions.

On the basis of these characteristics, we make the following recommendations for reforming the teaching profession. First, establish professionally competitive salaries for teachers; in the current marketplace, this means starting salaries of $20,000 with career increases of up to $50,000 (the salary level of middle-management school employees). Second, offer recruitment incentives such as scholarships and forgivable loans for academically talented colleges students to enter teaching, similar to the National Defense and Education Act loans of the 1960s. Third, improve teacher education by making it more intellectually rigorous and requiring internships supervised by senior teachers before tenure is granted. Fourth, improve working conditions by allowing paraprofessionals to assume the non-teaching duties now performed by teachers and by allowing teachers more time to teach, to prepare, and to share in instructional decisionmaking. Fifth, allow experienced teachers to assume responsibilities for supervising new teachers and for developing programs as they move up a more differentiated career ladder with specific evaluation and promotion points. Taken together, these reforms suggest a new career structure in which professionally enforced standards of practices are combined with increased responsibility for technical decisionmaking by those who successfullly demonstrate their competence.

Although these proposals start with higher salaries for teachers, they also imply changes in resource allocations within schools. As bureaucratization took hold in American schools, teacher salaries slipped from 49 percent of educational expenditures in 1972 to only 38 percent in 1982.[31] Changing the teaching career structure would also change administrative structures and roles, and hence the allocation of educational dollars. If teachers were to assume many of the instructional tasks currently performed by administrators (e.g., curriculum development and supervision), the layers of bureaucratic hierarchy could be reduced. Of course, further study will be needed to determine how administrative structures could be changed and to inform strategic planning efforts at the local level. However, we believe that efforts in these directions can lead to a more professional and more instructionally productive approach to schooling as well as to teaching. Reduced bureaucratic accountability demands would allow schools to become more client-oriented; and within a professional accountability structure, teachers could rely on peer support and assistance in working out problems of practice.[32]

Restructuring the teaching occupation is not a trivial undertaking. These proposals entail substantial costs; they are politically difficult, particularly in the light of public preceptions of low teacher quality; and they require some profound organizational changes, which are never easy to initiate. However, there are some opportunities for change that could offset these obvious barriers.

The attention to education generated by the recent commission reports has created a climate for reform that is in fact causing a great many states to entertain new proposals. Several states have already increased teachers' salaries and are trying to implement some kind of teacher incentive program. The coming large-scale retirements of teachers will provide new opportunities in two ways. First, the very experienced, expensive teachers will be replaced with less expensive teachers, so that the costs of upgrading salaries can be absorbed over a longer period of time. Second, it is more feasible and cost-effective to restructure induction into the profession when a major change in the membership of the work force is occurring. Finally, the costs of the reforms are not as enormous as they might at first appear. As noted above, some reallocation of resources is implicit in a new career structure. Furthermore, as fewer of the educational dollars have been spent on teachers over the last decade, fewer dollars have also been spent on education. Public elementary and secondary education expenditures dropped from 5.5 percent of personal income to 4.6 percent between 1972 and 1982.[33] We can, if we choose, return to a higher level of commitment to education.

In addition to asking about the barriers and opportunities for significant reforms, we should also ask what the alternatives are. If we choose to ignore the structural problems of the teaching profession, we will in a very few years face shortages of qualified teachers in virtually every subject area. We will be forced to hire the least academically able students to fill these vacancies, and they will become the tenured teaching force for the next two generations of American school children.

If we are serious about improving the quality of education, we will have to make more than marginal changes in the attractiveness of the teaching profession. The search for excellence as it is being conducted in most states will not solve the problem. Fundamental reform of the teaching profession will be required.

BENEDICT "SPARKY" GARMISA

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, it is with deep sadness that I call to the attention of the Senate, the passing of a great public servant from the city of Chicago, Benedict Garmisa.

He was a decorated veteran of World War II. He served with distinction in the Illinois State Senate from 1955 to 1956 and the State house of representatives from 1965 to 1982. He was dean of the Illinois House.

Perhaps the most important legacy of Sparky Garmisa is that he touched so many people in the State of Illinois through his many years of dedicated service and his ready smile and outstretched hand. He was a politician in the best sense of the word—he helped make the world a better place for many people.

Senator PAUL SIMON and I both served with Sparky in the Illinois General Assembly. He was an expert in transportation issues, having served as chairman of the Regional Transportation Authority, the Illinois Toll Highway Advisory Commission, and the Transportation Study Commission. Following his retirement from the legislature, he continued as a public member of the Transportation Study Commission. He was appointed a member of the Interstate High Speed Rail Compact, representing Illinois on that board.

Sparky was a devoted husband to his wife, Estelle and the proud father of three sons, Steve, Tom, and Gregg, and a daughter, Bonnie. Gregg has served on my staff for the past 4 years, following in his father's footsteps, serving the people of Illinois. He was also a very adoring grandfather of a beautiful granddaughter, Sarah Catherine, daughter of Gregg and his wife, Lauren Gash.

Illinois was served long and well by Benedict Garmisa. His contributions to the city of Chicago, the State of Illinois, and the entire country are not fleeting, but will serve as a living memorial to him for many years to come.

Sparky will be greatly missed for his kindness, his skill, and his friendship. We were all enriched for having known him.

A FEDERAL SLAP TO CHICAGO

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I cannot contain my frustration and disappointment at another example of the Federal Government's inability to be fair with the good people of Illinois. Mr. Samuel Pierce, Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, has just negated the many long hours and years invested in the planning of the North Loop redevelopment project in the city of Chicago.

Mr. Pierce's rejection of a $5 million urban-development grant for the proposed Chicago theater entertainment project hits at the heart of the city's plan to reinject life into the historic heartbeat of Chicago's urban community.

In the most recently recorded fiscal year of 1983, Illinois received 75 cents for every Federal tax dollar it sent to the Federal Treasury. As cochairman of the Northeast-Midwest Coalition, I ask Mr. Pierce to examine carefully the fairness of his decisions. The money has been appropriated. The project surpasses each and every guideline set by Congress. Private investors are contributing over three times the requested amount of the Federal Government, and the city of Chicago is supplying another $2 million.

Mr. President, the Chicago Tribune recently expressed in editorial form its serious concerns regarding the action by Mr. Pierce. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD for my colleagues' consideration.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FEDERAL SLAP TO CHICAGO

Just when Chicago's effort to revive its North Loop was finally moving ahead, it got shoved backward by the Reagan adminstration.

Samuel Pierce, secretary of housing and urban development, rejected the city's bid for a $5 million urban-development grant to help transform the Chicago Theater buildings into an entertainment complex with live shows, movies and restaurants. He did this despite the fact that the project meets every qualification set by Congress when it created this program, including solid local financial support. Private investors are willing to put up more than three times the federal portion and Chicago's own hard-pressed government will give $2 million.

Mr. Pierce can't point to the huge federal deficit as an excuse. The money for these urban grants already has been appropriated and will be spent before the end of the fiscal year. The only question is which areas will benefit. Someone—preferably the entire Illinois delegation in Congress, speaking in unison—should remind the secretary and his bosses in the White House that this state for years has been at the bottom of the list in the return it gets from Washington on its federal tax dollars. A number of studies, including recent ones by the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago and the Commercial Club, have blamed the chronic shortage of federal development dollars for this area's economic slide.

It might also be useful to remind President Reagan of his noble inauguration-day pledge to spur economic growth in "distressed areas."

Federal officials say they rejected the Chicago Theater bid and all nine smaller requests from the city because there wasn't enough money to fund every worthy project submitted for this round of grants. That may be true; they exceeded their quota last fall in a preelection spending binge.

Another round of urban development grants will be awarded in May, and Chicago will resubmit its theater project. But some Western congressional delegations are talking about revising the award formula to give more money to newer cities. This region, which supposedly has considerable clout in Congress, had better organize to block that move.

After a 10-year search, it looks as though Chicago finally has found a developer for a hotel at State Street and Wacker Drive, a pivotal part of the North Loop project. Plans are also progressing for a major development in the block across from the Marshall Field & Co. store. But investors in both projects say a new after-dark activity center is critical to their success. The Chicago Theater project would be the nucleus of that entertainment strip.

A $5 million federal investment in the Chicago Theater would be repaid many times over in new tax revenue. Chicago deserves it and should get it.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Chicago Tribune lead editorial that has been inserted in the RECORD properly criticizes the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development for his decision on a $5 million urban development action grant for the city of Chicago.

What irks me is not only the obvious merit of the case on which the wrong decision was made, a decision that at least temporarily is going to setback innovative development efforts in downtown Chicago.

For the first time in my 10-plus years in the U.S. Congress I found a Cabinet member who was unreachable to discuss a problem. I have served under two Republican administrations and one Democratic administration. I have found Cabinet members universally available for discussion of problems. They did not always do what I wanted, but they listened.

I hope my recent experience is not typical, that I caught Secretary Pierce at the wrong time—though his failure to return calls day after day is hard to understand.

It is not a kingdom he reigns over; he is there serving the people of Illinois and all other States. He should not be aloof from the representatives of those people.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

S. 395—DISLOCATED WORKERS ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing the Dislocated Workers Act legislation to assist dislocated workers who are in job training programs under title III of the Job Training Partnership Act.

We are all becoming too familiar with the term "structurally unemployed," a phrase that refers to the thousands of jobless workers whose skills are obsolete because their industries are being phased out or are changing to more technical production processes. This term also represents the many who are unemployed because of this Nation's ongoing transition from traditional and smokestack manufacturing industries to high technology and service-oriented businesses.

Dislocated workers comprise the most challenging aspect of our current economic problems because their numbers continue to grow. Many members of this group are skilled and dedicated workers, victims of an economy experiencing profound structural changes.

I have heard many individuals heralding the evolving technological revolution as the answer to our economic prayers. They claim that we must reap the fruits of high technology to maintain our leading position in world economics. While I also believe in harnessing high technology, I am concerned that not enough is being done to prepare our work force to meet the challenges of advanced technology. The Department of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates a shortage of 2.5 million skilled workers in all technical fields during the 1980's. This mismatch between jobs and available labor is alarming: A shortage of skilled personnel may well inhibit the future technological growth this Nation is counting on to remain the world's industrial leader.

Mr. President, it is my view that the tools to address the dual problems of dislocated workers and the acute shortage of technically skilled labor are available in the Unemployment Insurance Benefits Program and the Job Training Partnership Act. The Unemployment Benefits Program provides essential relief to those who are unemployed. But what happens when benefits run out and jobs are still unavailable? It is imperative that this situation, the scenario for too many families, be addressed with training for jobs that exist or are emerging.

The Jobs Training Partnership Act has the potential to be a valuable mechanism for providing training. Title III of the JTPA specifically authorizes assistance for persons forced out of work by the permanent closing or phasing out of a plant or facility. The emergency jobs appropriation of $125 million for the startup of title III has enabled States to lay the groundwork for implementing this program's development activities, retraining, and relocation assistance that are sorely needed.

The promise of the JTPA underscores the role which the Dislocated Workers Act can play in retraining our work force. If implemented, this measure will provide a useful incentive for dislocated workers to participate in State authorized training programs. For example, an unemployed electrician from Pennsylvania, recently laid off from an electrical contracting concern, will have an additional 10 weeks of unemployment benefits to obtain training for available computer technician jobs while receiving benefits. It is my view that most dislocated workers possess skills which can be applied to emerging technologies. The Dislocated Workers Act can help enhance these skills with training necessary for meeting the demand for skilled labor.

Mr. President, at a time when we have great economic problems in States like Pennsylvania, it is vital that innovative and imaginative programs be formulated to address these issues. While it is true that we face an enormous deficit at the present time, we must utilize available resources in a way that will provide job opportunities for unemployed workers in States like mine where the smokestack industries have experienced such tremendous problems and so much unemployment has resulted.

It is for all these reasons that I introduce the Unemployment Compensation for Dislocated Workers Act. It is my belief that the added 10-weeks assistance will provide encouragement and reward for those who are skilled but need enhanced abilities to obtain jobs in fields where employment is available. The fund of $85 million specifically for title III of JTPA for fiscal year 1983 sets the stage for the States to enact this program.

Mr. President, I understand that this legislation should be implemented carefully, allowing States and local governments sufficient time to prepare for its operation. Because this program will take time to develop, we should begin to set the wheels in motion as quickly as possible to promptly address the current critical unemployment problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 395

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Unemployment Compensation for Dislocated Workers Act".

FEDERAL-STATE AGREEMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Any State which desires to do so may enter into and participate in an agreement with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") under this Act. Any State which is a party to an agreement under this Act may, upon providing thirty days' written notice to the Secretary, terminate such agreement.

(b) Any such agreement shall provide that the State agency will make payments of Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers—

(1) to individuals who—

(A) have exhausted all rights to regular compensation under the State law;

(B) have no rights to compensation (including regular compensation, extended compensation, and Federal supplemental compensation) with respect to a week under such law or any other State unemployment compensation law or to compensation under any other Federal law (and is not paid or entitled to be paid any additional compensation under any such State or Federal law);

(C) are not receiving compensation with respect to such week under the unemployment compensation law of Canada; and

(D) are participating in a job training program for dislocated workers under title III of the Job Training Partnership Act;

(2) for up to ten weeks of unemployment which begin in the individual's period of eligibility, except that no payment of Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers shall be made to any individual for any week of unemployment which begins more than two years after the end of the benefit year for which he exhausted his rights to regular compensation.

(c) For purposes of subsection (b)(1)(A), an individual shall be deemed to have exhausted his rights to regular compensation under a State law when—

(1) no payments of regular compensation can be made under such law because such individual has received all regular compensation available to him based on employment or wages during his base period; or

(2) his rights to such compensation have been terminated by reason of the expiration of the benefit year with respect to which such rights existed.

(d) For purposes of any agreement under this Act—

(1) the amount of the Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers which shall be payable to any individual for any week of total unemployment shall be equal to the amount of the regular compensation (including dependents' allowances) payable to him during his benefit year under the State law for a week of total unemployment; and

(2) the terms and conditions of the State law which apply to claims for extended compensation and to the payment thereof shall apply to claims for Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers and the payment thereof; except that the compensation shall not be terminated or reduced because of the individual's participation in the job training program or because of the application of any provision of law relating to availability for work, active search for work, or refusal to accept work.

(e)(1) Any agreement under this Act with a State shall provide that the State will establish, for each eligible individual who files an application for Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers, a Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers account with respect to such individual's benefit year.

(2) The amount established in such account for any individual shall be equal to ten times his average weekly benefit amount (as determined for purposes of section 202(b)(1)(C) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970) for his benefit year. The total amount of compensation payable to an individual under an agreement entered into under this Act shall not exceed the amount in such individual's account.

(f) No Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers shall be payable to any individual under an agreement entered into under this Act for any week beginning before the week following the week in which such agreement is entered into.

PAYMENTS TO STATES HAVING AGREEMENTS FOR THE PAYMENT OF FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION FOR DISLOCATED WORKERS

SEC. 3. (a) There shall be paid to each State which has entered into an agreement under this Act an amount equal to 100 per centum of the Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers paid to individuals by the State pursuant to such agreement.

(b) No payment shall be made to any State under this section with respect to compensation to the extent the State is entitled to reimbursement with respect to such compensation under the provisions of any Federal law other than this Act of chapter 85 of title 5 of the United States Code. A State shall not be entitled to any reimbursement under such chapter 85 with respect to any compensation to the extent the State is entitled to reimbursement under this Act with respect to such compensation.

(c) Sums payable to any State by reason of such State's having an agreement under this Act shall be payable, either in advance or by way of reimbursement (as may be determined by the Secretary), in such amounts as the Secretary estimates the State will be entitled to receive under this Act for each calendar month, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any amount by which the Secretary finds that his estimates for any prior calendar month were greater or less than the amounts which should have been paid to the State. Such estimates may be made on the basis of statistical sampling or any other method as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the State agency of the State involved.

FINANCING PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. (a)(1) Funds in the extended unemployment compensation account (as established by section 905 of the Social Security Act) of the Unemployment Trust Fund shall be used for the making of payments to States having agreements entered into under this Act.

(2) The Secretary shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to each State the sums payable to such State under this Act. The Secretary of the Treasury, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, shall make payments to the State in accordance with such certification, by transfers from the extended unemployment compensation account (as established by section 905 of the Social Security Act) to the account of such State in the Unemployment Trust Fund.

(b) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, without fiscal year limitation, to the extended unemployment compensation account, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. Amounts appropriated pursuant to the preceding sentence shall not be required to be repaid.

(c) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury, without fiscal year limitation, such funds as may be necessary for purposes of assisting States (as provided in title III of the Social Security Act) in meeting the costs of administration of agreements under this Act.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 5. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the terms "compensation", "regular compensation", "extended compensation", "base period", "benefit year", "State", "State agency", "State law", and "week" shall have the meanings assigned to them under section 205 of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970; and

(2) the term "period of eligibility" means with respect to any individual, any week which begins on or after the date of the enactment of this Act, except that an individual shall not have a period of eligibility unless—

(A) his benefit year ends on or after June 1, 1984, or

(B) such individual was entitled to extended compensation for a week which begins on or after June 1, 1984.

FRAUD AND OVERPAYMENTS

SEC. 6. (a)(1) If an individual knowingly has made, or caused to be made by another, a false statement or representation of a material fact, or knowingly has failed, or caused another to fail, to disclose a material fact, and as a result of such false statement or representation or of such nondisclosure such individual has received an amount of Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers under this Act to which he was not entitled, such individual—

(A) shall be ineligible for further Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers under this Act in accordance with the provisions of the applicable State unemployment compensation law relating to fraud in connection with a claim for unemployment compensation; and

(B) shall be subject to prosecution under section 1001 of title 18, United States Code.

(2)(A) In the case of individuals who have received amounts of Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers under this Act to which they are not entitled, the State is authorized to require such individuals to repay the amounts of such compensation to the State agency, except that the State agency may waive such repayment if it determines that—

(i) the payment of such compensation was without fault on the part of any such individual, and

(ii) such repayment would be contrary to equity and good conscience.

(B) The State agency may recover the amount to be repaid, or any part thereof, by deductions from any Federal unemployment compensation for dislocated workers payable to such individual under this Act or from any unemployment compensation payable to such individual under any Federal unemployment compensation law administered by the State agency or under any other Federal law administered by the State agency which provides for the payment of any assistance or allowance with respect to any week of unemployment, during the three-year period after the date such individuals received the payment of the compensation to which they were not entitled, except that no single deduction may exceed 50 per centum of the weekly benefit amount from which such deduction is made.

(C) No repayment shall be required, and no deduction shall be made, until a determination has been made, notice thereof and an opportunity for a fair hearing has been given to the individual, and the determination has become final.

(3) Any determination by a State agency under paragraph (1) or (2) shall be subject to review in the same manner and to the same extent as determinations under the State unemployment compensation law, and only in that manner and to that extent.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(Mr. McCONNELL assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of William Bennett to be Secretary of Education and that it be considered under the following time agreement: 1 hour on the nomination to be equally divided between the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] or their designees; and that, following the conclusion or yielding back of their time, the Senate proceed to vote, without any intervening debate, motion, appeal, or point of order, on the nomination of William Bennett.

I ask unanimous consent that no motion to recommit the nomination of William Bennett be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I shall not object. I take the floor simply to say that we have cleared the nomination on this side of the aisle. We have also cleared the agreement and there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the nomination.

51-059 O-86-18 (Pt. 2)

NOMINATION OF WILLIAM J. BENNETT TO BE SECRETARY OF EDUCATION

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of William J. Bennett, of North Carolina, to be Secretary of Education.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to support the confirmation of Dr. William Bennett to be Secretary of Education. A week ago Monday Dr. Bennett spent 3½ interesting and informative hours with the Committee on Labor and Human Resources. Our discussion covered the educational spectrum from specific Federal programs to Oedipus at Colonus. The hearings showed clearly that Dr. Bennett has a broad and profound grasp of educational issues and a keen desire to work for further educational reform. Since the hearing, Dr. Bennett has responded to over 100 written questions from various Senators. His nomination has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources. I believe that it will be well for us to have him as Secretary of Education.

Dr. Bennett is an eminent educator and administrator. He holds a baccalaureate degree from Williams College, a doctorate in political philosophy from the University of Texas and a law degree from Harvard. Dr. Bennett has taught at seven and holds honorary degrees from nine colleges and universities. He has been an administrator at Boston University and president and director of the National Humanities Center in North Carolina. Most recently, Dr. Bennett has been Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Dr. Bennett's record at the Endowment has been exemplary. He has been responsible for 22 initiatives there, many of which have focused on serving the needs of working elementary and secondary school teachers. In addition he authored "To Reclaim A Legacy," which is a report on the status of humanities education in America. He has been a visible and outspoken champion of the recent educational excellence movement.

The need to improve American education is not the news it was a year and a half ago, but the need remains strong. The Department of Education is still a new agency that has not yet completed its shakedown cruise. The Department was pieced together from programs drawn from a number of agencies. Considering that the broad availability of quality education is of preeminent importance to the future of America and considering that the Department of Education is the lead agency in defining the Federal role in education, it is vital that the Department's capacity for the task be thoughtfully reviewed and improved by an exceptional administrator who is also an eminent educator. I believe President Reagan has found such a person in William Bennett. I am enthusiastic about this appointment, and I urge my colleagues to vote to confirm Dr. Bennett to be the Secretary of Education.

Finally on a personal note, I have to say that I had an excellent and wonderful relationship with his predecessor, Dr. Terrel Bell. I think Dr. Bell was as a good a Secretary of Education as we could have had. I think he fought for those things that were properly fought for and I believe he accomplished those things that he should have accomplished as Secretary of Education. In that vein, I have to admit that I have been extremely impressed with Dr. Bennett, with the work that he has done since he has been in Washington, and I have a personal fondness for him because of his leadership ability. I believe that he will add a great deal to the Department of Education and will continue on this heritage that I think was bequeathed to the Nation by the former Secretary of Education, my own fellow Utahan, Dr. Bell.

I wish Dr. Bennett godspeed and every good wish that he might be able to enjoy this experience, work closely with our committee, have the success that he desires and, of course, above all be a motivating influence in implementing those educational programs, procedures and other activities that are so important for the viability of American education.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to offer my support for the nomination of Mr. William Bennett to be the next Secretary of Education.

As a member of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources that unanimously approved Mr. Bennett just last week, I am pleased to say that I have reviewed his credentials, and I believe him to be eminently qualified for the post for which he has been nominated.

Mr. Bennett served from January 1983 as the U.S. Government representative to the United Nations Educational, Scientific, Cultural Organization [UNESCO], until the recent United States withdrawal from that organization. Mr. Bennett has been a member of President Reagan's Committee on Arts and Humanities, a past Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, and a director on the Board of the Institute for Educational Affairs in New York City.

Mr. Bennett, a native of Brooklyn, NY, is a graduate of Williams College in Massachusetts. He earned a Ph.D. in philosophy from the University of Texas, and a law degree from Harvard.

Mr. President, I do not know of anyone who would question the qualifications of this distinguished educator. While we all may be concerned about the direction of education in this country, no one is more concerned or better qualified to address these difficult issues than the man President Reagan has nominated to be Secretary of Education.

Mr. President, I would also like to point out to my colleagues that Mr. Bennett's lovely wife is from Orangeburg, SC, and will be an asset to him in his new post.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to follow the recommendation of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources and unanimously support the nomination of William Bennett to be Secretary of Education.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of William J. Bennett to be Secretary of Education.

By confirming Dr. Bennett, the Senate will be sending to the Department of Education a man with impeccable credentials—as both an administrator and educator—as well as a man with a commitment to quality and excellence in the field of learning which is second to none.

A QUALIFIED CANDIDATE

Having received widespread praise during his 4-year term of service as Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, Dr. Bennett's managerial skills are well respected. He is amply qualified to continue the course set by former Secretary Bell toward more effective and efficient administration of Federal education programs and improved coordination with State and local school officials.

A graduate of Harvard Law School, and recipient of a Ph.D. from the University of Texas, Dr. Bennett has received a total of nine honorary degrees from some of the most distinguished institutions of higher learning in this country. He has over 15 years of teaching experience and has written extensively on the problems currently confronting the Nation's school systems.

He is known for his tireless efforts in behalf of a renewed emphasis on scholastic standards and achievement in higher education and for his strong advocacy of ensuring that every school child is taught the basic skills needed to succeed in this increasingly complex society. On the basis of his outstanding academic credentials, teaching experience, and enthusiasm for making America a leader in the education of her youth, the Senate can expect Dr. Bennett's tenure as the Federal Government's top education official to be a distinguished one.

A COMMITMENT TO EXCELLENT EQUALITY

In response to concerns raised during his confirmation hearings, Dr. Bennett has emphasized that as Secretary of Education, his efforts will be devoted to improving the quality of education—not to abolishing the Department—and has taken the extra step of having the President write a letter backing him in that position. He has also made strong statements in favor of enforcing our civil rights laws and, I was gratified to learn, has also expressed strong support for legislation I have introduced to overturn last year's Grove City ruling. Based on these statements, I believe it is clear Dr. Bennett understands the fundamental importance of equal educational opportunity to minorities, women, and the disabled and the appropriate role for the Federal Government to play in protecting their civil rights.

In short, on all counts, Dr. Bennett is well-qualified for the post to which President Reagan has nominated him and I urge his prompt confirmation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I understand that there have been 30 minutes allotted to the minority, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, there are few nominations that we will consider in the U.S. Senate this year which will be more important for the future of our country than who will assume responsibility as the Secretary of Education. I rise today to urge my colleagues to support Mr. Bennett for that position. I think he has demonstrated by his experience and qualifications that he has the ability to be a great Secretary of Education. The times demand, Mr. President, that we have the best.

Mr. Bennett graduated from Gonzaga High School in Washington, DC, and received his undergraduate degree from Williams College in Massachusetts. He has a Ph.D. in philosophy, received a law degree from Harvard. Mr. Bennett taught philosophy at Boston University from 1971 to 1976 and served as president and director of the National Humanities Center in North Carolina. For the last 4 years, he served as Chairman of the National Endowment of the Humanities. Mr. Bennett has written extensively on the humanities and on various education topics.

I think all of us in this body and parents across this Nation recognize we are facing a crisis in education. That issue has been fairly well explored by the National Commission on Excellence in Education. I hope, Mr. President, that this Secretary will have the opportunity to review this study and indicate to the Congress of the United States where the responsibility lies for strengthening the whole educational process.

Mr. Bennett comes to the Department of Education at a time when the challenges facing American education have never been greater. The challenge of excellence and quality remain a high priority for this Nation. Recent reports demonstrate that the education reform movement continues to gain momentum. Other reports, however, demonstrate that the excellence and quality we seek is not reaching our Nation's minority and disadvantaged youth. Although achievement scores on the SAT have improved in the last 4 years, blacks and Hispanics continue to score significantly below whites. While the national dropout rate exceeds 15 percent, the dropout rate for Hispanics is twice that level.

We presently face a shortage of teachers in subjects such as math, sciences, and foreign languages. Experts predict a general shortage of teachers by 1990. Many of our teachers currently are not adequately trained in their subject areas. For instance, of the 55,000 teachers currently teaching in a foreign language, only 12,000 have the necessary academic qualifications. These are problems of national significance requiring a national response.

These challenges come at a time of enormous Federal deficits and severe budget constraints. President Reagan's 1986 budget proposes to cut $3 billion from the Federal education budget. These cuts come on top of the significant pullback from the for education over the last 3 years.

The Secretary of Education must be a national leader in education. As Secretary of Education, Ted Bell promoted the goals of excellence and quality, urged us to improve access and opportunity, and provided courage and reason in challenging us to do better. It will be just as vital, particularly during the current budget debate, that the new Secretary of Education exercise similar leadership and courage in defending the education budget.

I note, incidentally, that the 1986 budget for the National Endowment for the Humanities proposes to reduce Federal spending for the humanities by $13 million, including a $2 million reduction for humanities instruction at the elementary and secondary level. I hope that the cuts Mr. Bennett proposed in the humanities are not a prognosis of Mr. Bennett's support for education.

I must say to my colleagues that I was troubled by Mr. Bennett's failure to make a strong commitment to the Department of Education during his confirmation hearing. While I am sure that Mr. Bennett will prove capable as an administrator, the Department of Education requires a leader, not just an administrator. I am convinced that the Secretary in the coming months will be required to be an activist and an advocate in promoting sound education policy.

I would like to express my concern at this point over the administration's proposals to cut student financial assistance programs, particularly the GSL Program. In the President's 1986 budget, more than $1 billion will be cut from the GSL Program alone. The effect of the President's proposals will be to deny low-interest loans to over 800,000 students.

In my State, Madam President, many mothers and fathers, with large families, are working and have combined incomes which may exceed $32,500. If we accept the President's recommendation, we will see the end of the children of those mothers and fathers being able to participate in a Guaranteed Student Loan Program, regardless of the needs of those families. Madam President, I am told that 40,000 students in my State will be denied loan assistance as a result of the President's proposals. Those are the sons and daughters of hardworking, middle-income families who take great pride in education, recognize its importance and believe in the educational system of our Nation as a path for future opportunity for their children.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

If we accept this proposal, Madam President, we are in effect putting the dollar sign back on the schools and colleges in this country.

For the last 22 years, I have supported the belief that if a young American has the talent and the skill and the desire to go to our fine schools and colleges across this Nation, the financial limitation of their parents should not be an absolute bar to that opportunity.

In that regard, Madam President, I am concerned that the President's proposed $4,000 "megacap" on total Federal assistance will severely restrict many students' ability to attend the college of their choice. A survey conducted by the National Association of Independent Colleges showed that such a cap would adversely affect at least 27 percent of all aid recipients attending independent colleges and universities. According to this survey, each student would lose an average of $1,585.

There are ways to achieve cost savings in student aid without eliminating students from the program. For instance, the defaults in student loans will cost the Federal Government over $800 million this year. Certainly, more vigorous enforcement in this area will achieve immediate savings without affecting current loan availability.

I urge Mr. Bennett, as his first task as Secretary, to carefully review the administration's proposed cuts in education. Mr. Bennett comes to the Department with a fresh view, not having participated in the Department's budget process. In the hearings on his nomination, I think the message was clear from both sides of the aisle that Congress considers these proposals harsh and draconian. In light of these facts, I believe it is within the Secretary's authority—indeed it is his responsibility—to reassess these proposals and to make further recommendations.

Finally, I hope that Mr. Bennett will, as the new Secretary of Education, vigorously pursue the affirmative action policies and civil rights enforcement that will be entrusted to him. In response to my questions on this subject, Dr. Bennett affirmed that he is "a proponent of affirmative action" and that, as Secretary of Education, he would "obey the law and enforce the law." I am confident that Mr. Bennett will fulfill his duties in this regard.

I would urge Mr. Bennett not only to "enforce the law" but also to vigorously pursue these policies.

In spite of our efforts over the last quarter of a century to achieve a more racially balanced society, the statistics in our schools reflect a widening rift between the races. An ABC documentary, "To Save Our Schools, To Save Our Children," referred to the "racial schism" that is growing in our elementary and secondary schools. The statistics show declining enrollments in higher education among black and Hispanic youth. And in graduate education, there is a decline, both in terms of percentages and actual numbers, of minorities enrolling and graduating in most subject areas. Only by vigorously pursuing the civil rights laws and affirmative action goals will we reverse these trends. Ernest Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, addressed this subject in the ABC documentary. He stated:

> If you have one group of students who become empowered through education * * * that is they can use language effectively * * * and on the other hand you have students who have simply marked time for 4 years, who haven't gained any degree of confidence or skill * * * then we've built a two-class system in which people with power control the lives of the unempowered. That's not only not good democracy and not good government, it's disastrous social policy. In the end, those who don't have the authority will become increasingly angry that they can't participate and help shape their own destiny. The end would be a crisis and confrontation and I think a dramatic erosion in the dream we call America."

Madam President, I submitted for the RECORD a number of questions to Dr. Bennett on this subject which I believe would be of interest to my colleagues. I ask unanimous consent that these questions and Dr. Bennett's answers be printed in the RECORD.

I look forward to working with Dr. Bennett to strengthen our educational system.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS SUBMITTED TO WILLIAM J. BENNETT, BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

8(a) In January of 1984, you wrote a letter to Clarence Thomas, Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in which you stated your views concerning the use of goals and timetables. Does that letter continue to represent your views on this subject?

A. Yes.

8(b) In particular, you wrote that "(T)o request that we set and state numerical 'goals' for hiring is to ask us to anticipate hiring on the basis of such goals . . . (and) . . . asks us to consider race or sex or color as reasonable ingredients in such decisions."

Does your view of the use of goals or timetables apply to other areas of civil rights law such as desegregation of higher education (Criteria for Dismantling DeJure Systems of Public Higher Education 43 Fed. Register 6658, Feb. 15, 1978)?

A. I adhere to the principles articulated in my referenced letter to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and believe that they should apply wherever possible within existing civil rights law, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. As the letter observed, importantly, there has never been a finding of discrimination against the National Endowment for the Humanities, either under my Chairmanship or previously. The EEOC request, therefore, was clearly distinguishable from those situations where race-conscious remedies have been imposed in the context of a judicial finding of discrimination. I do, in general, believe that remedial action is appropriate to address the effects of past discrimination in various segments of American society, including educational institutions.

8(c) If the answer to 8(b) is "yes", do you as Secretary intend to follow your own views rather than the criteria cited above?

If the answer to 8(b) is "no", how would you square your obligation to enforce such regulations as an officer of the United States with what you have indicated are deeply held personal views?

A. If confirmed as Secretary, I intend, consistent with my sworn obligations, fully to comply with and enforce existing statutory and regulatory requirements. Where I believe such laws or regulations are unjust, or reflect misguided social policy, I will endeavor, within all legal requirements, to see that such statutes or regulations are appropriately amended.

9. As Secretary of Education, will you submit an affirmative action plan to EEOC as required by Reorganization Plan 4?

A. (I presume that the question refers to reorganization Plan #1 of 1978) Yes.

10(a) Are you aware that affirmative action plans are one of the principal remedial tools used by the Department of Education where there has been a finding of discrimination?

A. Yes.

10(b) Do you support affirmative action plans to remedy a finding of past discrimination?

A. Yes.

10(c) If the answer to 10(b) is "yes", how do you square that answer with your view that race should never be taken into account in any government decision making?

A. See my response to 8(b) above.

Q: (a) Are you familiar with the case of Adams v. Richardson, now Adams v. Bell, currently pending in Federal Court in the District of Columbia?

(b) That case involves state systems of higher education where the Office of Civil Rights made specific findings of discrimination as long ago as 1969. In 1973, the D.C. Circuit ordered the Department to begin enforcement proceedings against state systems of higher education which had not fully dismantled their dual systems. After numerous negotiations and further commitments by the states, six states are now under court order to achieve their commitments by the fall of 1985. Data will soon become available on how they are doing.

If the evaluation of this data indicates that these states will not meet their commitments by the fall of 1985 do you intend to initiate enforcement proceedings?

If the answer to (b) is "no" please indicate why not and detail the steps you intend to take under these circumstances. Be specific.

A: My understanding is that the court order required the Department to commence Title VI enforcement proceedings against any state determined to have failed to achieve substantial progress toward the goals of its plan. The Office of Civil Rights reviewed the plans and the progress of these six states as required by the order. As of this date, OCR has determined that all six states have made substantial progress in meeting their goals. OCR will continue to monitor implementation of the plans and appropriate action will be taken if any violations of Title VI are found.

ADDITIONAL QUESTIONS

1. a. Does existing civil rights laws, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, permit the federal government to require public and private entities to "consider race or sex or color as reasonable ingredients" in reaching employment, school assignments or other civil rights related decisions?

b. If the answer to (a) is "yes", will you use these legal tools in carrying out your responsibilities as Secretary?

Answer:

1(a) Yes.

1(b) I will do so, as the law requires. I intend to comply fully with the letter and spirit of the law.

2. You did not answer my question regarding Adams v. Bell. Judge Pratt's March 24, 1983 order requires the Department to secure full compliance from the states no later than the Fall of 1985. If the Department concludes that the states have not fully met each of their commitments and have not fully dismantled their dual systems by the Fall of 1985, will the Department begin enforcement proceedings against the states at that time?

Answer: If it is determined that states are not in compliance with title VI and it is determined that enforcement proceedings are the best way to bring them into compliance, I intend to see to it that statutory enforcement remedies will be pursued.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, today the Senate will consider the nomination of William Bennett to be Secretary of Education. As chairman of the Senate Education, Arts and Humanities Subcommittee, the area of education is one of my greatest interests. Over the last 4 years I have been continually impressed with the work of Secretary Bell and other officers of the Department of Education as they have administered our vitally important Federal education laws in a very difficult time. Strong positive leadership is needed at the Department to implement the elementary, secondary, and higher education laws which are vital to the future success of our Nation.

I rise in support of the nomination of William Bennett to be Secretary of Education, after having participated in Dr. Bennett's confirmation hearing before the Labor and Human Resources Committee. During that meeting, and in two private meetings, Dr. Bennett assured me that he will be a strong advocate within and outside the administration for the structure of the Department of Education and for the funding of Federal education programs. On the basis of these conversations, and the letter which the President sent our full committee chairman, ORRIN HATCH, I will vote for Dr. Bennett and urge my colleagues to do likewise. And, I look forward to working closely with him as we seek to improve Federal education programs over the next few years.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield to the ranking minority member of the Education Committee, Senator PELL.

Mr. PELL. I thank my friend and colleague, the Senator from Massachusetts.

Madam President, it is a pleasure for me to rise in support of the nomination of Dr. William Bennett to be Secretary of Education.

I have known, liked and worked with Bill Bennett during his tenure as Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities. I am impressed with his candid and forthright manner and his personal integrity and ability, and only hope that the nominee to be his successor at the Endowment will possess those same qualities, too.

During the confirmation hearing, I questioned Dr. Bennett closely about the administration's proposals for program changes and budgetary cutbacks in student aid. I expressed my strong opposition to those proposals, and pointed out that they would have an adverse impact on more than one million students who now use grants, loans and work study to help finance their postsecondary education. How can we have an opportunity society if our young citizens do not have full educational opportunities?

In his response, Dr. Bennett acknowledged that the proposals would have "difficult consequences for many people." He also pledged to work with the members of the Labor and Human Resources Committee on the possibility of coming up with alternatives. I liked the fact that he did not duck the issue, and I particularly liked his willingness to attempt to work with us in this area of such great importance.

I am sure that Dr. Bennett and I will find ourselves on opposite sides of issues from time to time. That is as it should be in our system of Government. Yet, from his work at the Endowment and from his approach to this position, Bill Bennett has given us more than ample reason to believe that we will be able to work together, even though we may hold opposing views.

Madam President, this nomination holds out the bright promise of a frank and open dialog on the critical issues confronting us in education. Ted Bell, who has just expressed his negative reaction to the administration's proposed cutbacks, did an admirable job of fulfilling that same kind of promise while he was Secretary and I am very hopeful that Bill Bennett will do likewise. The opportunity is his, and I fervently hope he will succeed.

I urge my colleagues to join me in voting to confirm the nomination of Dr. William Bennett as the next Secretary of Education.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], the former chairman of the House Education Committee.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Madam President, I also am going to join in voting for Mr. Bennett. I have known him some years prior to his coming on the Washington scence, when he was with the Center For Humanities, in North Carolina.

I do express some reservations, however. We have just heard about the former Secretary, Ted Bell, who did a remarkable job, who fought within the administration to see that those education figures were as high as they possibly could be, and he performed a great service to the Nation.

At the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities, Dr. Bennett in many ways added a creativity factor, but he took the figures handed to him by OMB. When he appeared before our committees, he was so supportive of OMB that one of the members asked him whether he was working for OMB or was he Executive Director of the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities.

I think it is important that he fight for the education programs of this Nation, and I hope he will do so.

My second concern is that his written statements and his record in some regard are not strong in the area of civil rights. As Secretary of Education, one of his major functions will be to see that minorities within our country have a better opportunity, particularly in urban school situations. We do not need to go very far from this Capitol building to find schools that can be described, at best, as mediocre. That should not be, in this great, rich, talented country, and it has to change. I want a Secretary of Education who is going to be sensitive in this area.

Having said that, there is no question that he is a creative person. He is a person of great ability, and I hope he will do well. I intend to work with him to see that he does well, so that the people of this Nation win.

I think he has to make a basic decision: Whether he is going to serve primarily those at OMB and those in the administration who want to cut back and do less and less, or whether he is going to serve the educational interests of this country, whether he is going to take a look at how history is going to judge him.

We are in a situation in this country in which we need leadership, not drifting. I hope he will provide leadership. There is no question that Dr. Bennett has the intellectual capacity to contribute a great deal. I think there is some question whether he is going to have the backbone to contribute a great deal.

I hope he will weigh carefully this new responsibility he has and serve the people of the Nation well. I will vote for him. I hope he will keep in mind the comments of the Senator from Massachusetts on the report card that he will have to make not only to this body but to the Nation and to his country.

I thank my colleague for yielding the time.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Madam President, I rise in support of the nomination of William J. Bennett for the office of Secretary of Education. As a member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, I fully support the President's choice of Mr. Bennett to serve in this very important post. I would like to commend my committee chairman for his effective work in bringing this nomination before the full Senate for consideration today.

Madam President, William J. Bennett is an excellent choice to become the third Secretary of the Department of Education. His long history as an outstanding scholar, administrator, and spokesman for the study of the humanities amply qualifies him to hold this most important post. During the next 2 years we will need a man of his experience and commitment to education to help guide national education policy.

On Monday of this week, the President submitted his budget proposals for fiscal year 1986. Among those proposals are sweeping reforms in Federal Education Programs. Specifically, the President has proposed important changes in the structure of Federal student assistance. These programs are vital to college and other postsecondary students and their families as they struggle with the high cost of education. The President has proposed instituting a mega-cap on the total amount of assistance any one student can receive in a year. In addition, the President has proposed to link eligibility for grants and subsidized jobs as well as subsidized loans to measures of economic need. Finally, the President has proposed a number of changes in the financing mechanisms by which these programs are provided through lending institutions. But, Mr. President, as the wise man once said, "the President proposes and the Congress disposes."

The issues that the President has raised by submitting his package of educational reforms are important ones. In the face of continuing deficits in the neighborhood of $150 to $200 billion each year, we must take steps to curtail spending and economize Federal programs. But we must also continue to provide assistance to those most in need of help.

Traditionally, Federal education policy has been to provide access to education for deserving students who seek an opportunity to attend a college or university. Its purpose has been to guarantee that no student who seeks to improve himself or herself should be denied that opportunity. Over the years, however, these programs have grown substantially beyond what reasonable men and women would have conceived.

Fortunately, the Higher Education Act is due to be extended during the 99th Congress. It is the natural time to reexamine these Federal programs and to make adjustments if necessary. But only if they are truly necessary. Once that fact has been determined, any changes must be fair. They must be fair to the taxpayers, fair to the lending institutions, fair to the public and private institutions of higher education. First and foremost, they must be fair to the students whom these programs serve.

Madam President, I do not envy the new Secretary of Education. Before him lies an arduous task. He must rein in a growing bureaucracy at the Department, he must distinguish among the many good and bad proposals being pushed by this city's education associations and he must negotiate with Congress over proposals to cut back one of the Nation's most popular programs—student aid. Yes, Mr. President, the new Secretary of Education will face a difficult challenge. I can think of no higher compliment for William J. Bennett than the fact that President Reagan has chosen him for this assignment. I urge my colleagues to support his nomination.

● Mr. DODD. Madam President, I extend my support and congratulations to Dr. William J. Bennett, President Reagan's nominee to be Secretary of Education.

Dr. Bennett is a well-qualified, longstanding proponent of quality education for all students.

He has been an outspoken advocate of strengthening the quality of education in elementary and secondary schools, encouraging more local control of education issues, increased recognition of outstanding teachers, and reform in teacher education and training curricula.

My support for Dr. Bennett to be Secretary of Education does not come, however, without some apprehension.

For example, I am concerned about Dr. Bennett's statement of advocacy for Federal support of private schools.

I share his high regard for the essential contribution which private schools continue to make to the quality and diversity of educational opportunities in this country, and I sympathize with parents over the difficulties which these costs place on them in these financially troubled times. Nonetheless, I cannot agree that tuition tax credits or school vouchers represent sound public policy—either for education or the economy.

This issue is of special importance in light of the administration's proposals to freeze most major grant programs at their 1985 level at the same time many smaller grant programs are being reduced or eliminated—total fiscal year 1986 education funding under the proposed budget is a 3-percent decrease from the fiscal year 1985 level. It would be hard to justify undertaking a major new subsidy of private education—one that has been estimated to cost as much as $7 billion by 1986—under these circumstances.

A policy under which private education is subsidized or cost free would result in a dual school system dependent upon Federal financial support. Many Federal, State and local education leaders have expressed concern that an expanded dual school system would result in nonpublic schools serving the most capable and least troublesome young people while public schools would enroll the academically borderline and those with discipline problems. I do not believe that this is an outcome which should be tolerated.

I encourage Dr. Bennett, as the new Secretary of Education, to address these concerns prior to lending support to these important issues.

In summary, I urge Dr. Bennett to stay the course for education progress during his administration by continuing his strong leadership in reinforcing our national commitment to excellence in education. I extend to him my sincere congratulations on being named Secretary of Education and offer him my support.●

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. EAST. Madam President, as soon as this body votes to confirm the nomination of William Bennett to head the Department of Education, the State of North Carolina will have two of its citizens in the Cabinet of the President of the United States—Mrs. Elizabeth Dole and, now, Bill Bennett. It is my pleasure to note that no other State in the Union is so strongly—or so well—represented. The citizens of North Carolina are honored by his nomination and proud of his achievements.

From the end of the 1960's until just recently, America went through one of the most depressing and shameful eras in its educational history. When I met Bill he was the director of the National Humanities Center in North Carolina, an institution that he helped found in order to help put back the pieces of American learning. While educators in this country were abdicating their responsibility to teach the heritage of civilization and learning, when teachers were coerced to follow every fad and whim that might come by, when students were given precious little guidance as to what might be better or worse, more or less important—that's when Bill Bennett started to call for a return to sanity. He put together a place in my home State where teachers and professors might come together to talk and study and write about things that matter.

When the President chose him to be the head of the National Endowment for the Humanities, he knew exactly what he was getting. Bennett was by that time—and he was still only in his thirties—a national leader in the fight against moral and intellectual laxity in schools. From everything I've seen and heard and read, Bill Bennett has one overriding mission—to offer the opportunity to restore seriousness in teaching and learning back to our classrooms. He wrote recently how the mission of education must now be "to reclaim the legacy of our civilization for our children and our students." He's a man who knows that civilization is always only one generation deep, and if we fail to offer our students, all our students, the wealth of their heritage, that heritage is lost.

Bill Bennett is not shy. When a fight is called for, he will fight it. In the report I just alluded to Bennett points his finger exactly where it should be pointed—at the failure of people in his profession, teaching, to offer our students an exposure to the best that's been thought and known. At the NEH he won the respect of all sides by not catering to this group of favoring that interest. Rather, he did what I wish every politician and administrator should do—he set out the highest of standards, the best of standards, and then asked anyone who could meet them to work with him. The special interests might feel left out but everyone else I've talked to, liberals as well as conservatives, have nothing but praise for his leadership at NEH.

So, just as Bill has spoken up for standards and quality in education, I myself am happy to speak up for Bill Bennett. He has made those of us who come from North Carolina very proud.●

Mr. GRASSLEY. Madam President, I rise in full support of the nomination of Dr. William J. Bennett for Secretary of Education and urge my colleagues to speedily approve his appointment. Dr. Bennett, a distinguished educator, is eminently qualified to be our Nation's chief spokesman for education policy. His academic and management credentials speak highly of his abilities to use the Department as an effective tool to improve the education of our children.

Dr. Bennett holds a Ph.D. in philosophy from the University of Texas and a law degree from Harvard University. He has taught at Boston University, University of North Carolina, and University of Texas, and has served as the executive director of the National Humanities Center in Chapel Hill, NC. He has always been a strong promoter of the humanities in education and was nominated by President Reagan in 1981 to serve as Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities. During his tenure at the National Endowment for the Humanities, Dr. Bennett was a champion of excellence in education and initiated a number of programs to improve the quality of teaching.

I believe that in his role as Secretary of Education, Dr. Bennett will find that there has never been a greater challenge to our public education system. Our public education system is being called on to satisfy a widening insistence on equality in educational opportunities, to offer a greater diversity and choice for students, to maintain higher academic standards, to meet higher demands for accountability and to meet society's needs for educated and skilled workers in new fields. And in the wake of new challenges, the publication of "A Nation at Risk" and other major studies have indicated an educational system in trouble. As Dr. Bennett discussed in his confirmation hearing, a groundswell of major education reforms have been initiated appropriately at the State and local level to tighten standards for teachers, to stiffen graduation requirements and to toughen curriculum. However, there is also the recognition on the part of Dr. Bennett that the Federal Government has a legitimate, however, limited role in providing leadership in improving our educational system, in providing technical assistance, and in ensuring access for all students. In pursuit of these national goals, however, we must take care not to diminish those aspects of education which are best protected by the diversity and direction of locally elected school system leadership.

I believe that our Nation's greatest strength is the education, experience, and knowledge of its citizens. As a member of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, I look forward to working closely with Dr. Bennett to advance the cause of education. With his special blend of expertise and his strong advocacy for the President's reform agenda, I feel he will help return basic values, basic traditions, and basic good sense to the Nation's classrooms.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. HATCH. The majority yields back its time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield back all my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of William Bennett, of North Carolina, to be Secretary of Education.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], would each vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] is necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] would each vote "aye."

The result was announced—yeas 93, nays 0, as follows:

So, the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified that the Senate has given its consent to this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT

Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate turns to the consideration of the nomination of John Herrington to be Secretary of Energy, the nomination be considered——

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BYRD. This is a unanimous-consent request, and I assume Senators will want to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is absolutely correct. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate turns to the consideration of the nomination of John Herrington to be Secretary of Energy, the nomination be considered under the following time agreement: 1 hour and 15 minutes on the nomination, 1 hour to be equally divided between the Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] or their designees, with 15 minutes to be controlled by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

Following the conclusion of, or the yielding back of, time, the Senate will proceed to vote immediately without intervening debate, motion, appeal, or point of order on the nomination of John Herrington to be Secretary of Energy.

Further, I ask unanimous consent that no motion to recommit the nomination of John Herrington be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I have no objection on this side with respect to this request. There had been a thought that we might be able to get time agreements on both Mr. Hodel and Mr. Herrington, with a vote back-to-back on those two. But I have not been able to clear that. If I can see Mr. PROXMIRE, I might be able to.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for yielding. On the part of the committee, such an arrangement would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that would be not only satisfactory but preferable to the minority.

Mr. BYRD. I thank both Senators.

May I ask the distinguished majority whip if he will, for a moment, pull this request back and go with his request on Mr. Hodel, during which time I may be able to clear this matter with Mr. PROXMIRE and any others who may be interested?

Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate turns to the consideration of the nomination of Donald Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior, the nomination be considered under the following time agreement: 1 hour and 20 minutes on the nomination, 1 hour to be equally divided between the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Louisiana or their designees, and 20 minutes to be controlled by the Senator from Wisconsin. Following the conclusion of, or the yielding back of, time, the Senate will proceed to vote immediately without intervening debate, motion, appeal, or point of order on the nomination of Donald Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior.

Further, I ask unanimous consent that no motion to recommit the nomination of Donald Hodel be in order.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, reserving the right to object, will there be any objection on my side if we combine the two time agreements with respect to the nomination, the motion, appeal, et cetera, and then have two back-to-back votes, once the time on both had been yielded back or had expired?

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I say, I would prefer not to do it that way, but I want to accommodate my colleagues. I know it is convenient to them, and I will not object to that. I want to make sure I have 15 minutes to speak on Mr. Herrington and 20 minutes on Mr. Hodel. I may not use all that time, but I would like to reserve that much time, if possible.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my friend from Wisconsin.

Would the distinguished majority whip like to proceed and make a combination of time?

Mr. SIMPSON. Madam President, in accordance with the agreement just reached, I would ask that these be joined and the time agreement be reentered with regard to Mr. Herrington. That is, that that be considered under the following time agreement: 1 hour and 15 minutes on the nomination, 1 hour to be equally divided between the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Louisiana or their designees, and 15 minutes to be controlled by the Senator from Wisconsin. Following the conclusion of, or the yielding back of, time, there will be votes immediately thereafter on the two nominations, proceeding to vote immediately without further debate, motion, appeal, or point of order on the nominations of both of those individuals.

Mr. BYRD. Is the majority leader then asking that there be 2 hours and 35 minutes on both nominations, with Mr. PROXMIRE to be given 20 minutes on the nomination of Mr. Hodel and 15 minutes on the nomination of Mr. Herrington?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. After which the Senate would proceed to vote on both back-to-back?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. The first vote to be under a 15-minute time limitation and the second to be under a 10-minute time limitation?

Mr. SIMPSON. I think we will have to clear any reduction of the time on the second vote.

Mr. BYRD. Reserving the right to object, Madam President, it is my understanding, then, that if this agreement is entered into, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Mr. Herrington first, and then to the nomination of Mr. Hodel, with the time to be as follows: 2 hours and 35 minutes to be utilized on both nominations, with the time to be equally divided as set forth in the request, with the additional proviso that Mr. PROXMIRE may have 15 minutes under his control on Mr. Herrington and 20 minutes under his control on Mr. Hodel, at the end of which time, if it is used or yielded back, the votes would begin to occur, first on Mr. Herrington and, second, on Mr. Hodel, with the other provisions of the joint request being agreed to?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Hearing no objection, without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to ask for the yeas and nays on both rollcalls with one show of hands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. I ask for the yeas and nays on both rollcalls with one show of hands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nominations.

NOMINATION OF JOHN S. HERRINGTON TO BE SECRETARY OF ENERGY

NOMINATION OF DONALD P. HODEL TO BE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

The bill clerk read the nomination of John S. Herrington, of California, to be Secretary of Energy.

The bill clerk read the nomination of Donald P. Hodel, of Virginia, to be Secretary of the Interior.

NOMINATION OF JOHN S. HERRINGTON

Mr. McCLURE. Madam President, on February 5 the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources favorably reported the nomination of John S. Herrington to be Secretary of Energy. The vote was 20 to 0. Mr. Herrington has fully complied with the committee's rules requiring submittal of a detailed information statement and a financial disclosure report.

The hearing on Mr. Herrington's nomination was held on January 31. In his testimony before the committee, Mr. Herrington expressly acknowledged the statutory mandate established for the Department of Energy by the DOE Organization Act, and he assured the committee that he would uphold that mandate. He also emphasized his intent to carry out his duties as Secretary in a spirit of cooperation with the committee and the Congress. I look forward to that cooperation. The Department of Engery, under the leadership of Mr. Herrington's predecessor, Donald Hodel, developed and maintained a close working relationship with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. I am confident that the relationship will continue.

Four years ago, in January 1981, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources considered the nomination of Gov. James Edwards for the position of Secretary of Energy. During the hearing on that nomination, the members of the committee discussed the need for action in a number of areas, such as eliminating excessive Government management of fuels, and removing certain Federal regulations that were then imposed on the energy industry. I expressed the opinion that the Department of Energy was ill-prepared to deal with any serious disruption in our energy supplies. In the area of nuclear waste policy, I observed that we needed to take action without delay to improve the procedures for the siting of nuclear waste storage facilities.

Now that 4 years have passed, where do those issues stand today? In some areas, substantial progress has been made. For example, all remaining price and allocation controls have been removed from crude oil and petroleum products. As of the first of last month, wellhead price controls no longer apply to over half of our natural gas production. In addition, we have initiated a new Federal program for the siting and development of permanent storage facilities for nuclear waste.

The Energy Emergency Preparedness Act of 1982 improved our ability to respond effectively to oil supply disruptions and other energy emergencies. Moreover, this country is now much less dependent on crude oil imports from the Middle East and Africa, two of the more volatile oil-producing areas. Last year, imports from Middle Eastern and African countries amounted to less than half of what they were in 1981. Our vulnerability to import disruptions has also been reduced by the increasing size of the strategic petroleum reserve, which now contains about 454 million barrels of oil. The average fill rate over the past quarter has exceeded 211,000 barrels per day.

Four years, ago, at the beginning of 1981, the strategic petroleum reserve contained only 110 million barrels. Today, with a reserve four times larger, we have substantially improved our national security, and I am confident that we have also added stability to the world oil market, which no longer appears to react so strongly to unexpected events.

With all of this good news, some may be tempted to ask, why do we need a Secretary of Energy? In my judgment, there are sound reasons. First, although our energy picture has improved, it continues to have a dark side. This country continues to import large volumes of oil. Thus, we continue to be vulnerable to disruptions in the supplies of crude oil in the world markets. During 1984, our imports of crude oil and petroleum products averaged over 5 million barrels per day. This volume was about 32 percent of total demand last year, and it amounts to more than a 9-percent increase over 1983 import levels. Imports for 1985 are projected by the industry to increase further by 4 percent over last year's level.

Reliance on the strategic petroleum reserve, large as it is, may not adequately offset this increasing dependence on imports. If a serious import disruption should occur, it is not at all clear that SPR oil would be distributed in a timely and effective manner. New distribution facilities are needed if there is to be reasonable assurance that serious fuel shortages in certain areas of the country would be avoided. We need a Cabinet-level officer, a Secretary of Energy, with clear responsibility for assessing the circumstances of any energy emergency, serving as the Government's spokesman, monitoring events and activities within the oil industry, and making the necessary judgments regarding the availability of SPR oil.

There is also an ongoing need for a separate Federal agency that can serve as a clear focal point for formulating national energy policy, effectively implementing that policy, and managing the energy-related Federal programs, such as energy research and development, Federal power marketing, uranium enrichment, and the national laboratories. Other activities include managing the strategic petroleum reserve, developing nuclear waste storage facilities, planning for energy emergencies, and managing the Atomic Energy Defense Program.

During the coming months, the Reagan administration will be evaluating the merits of merging the Department of Energy with another department. I would note that the starting point for such an analysis is a convincing demonstration that greater efficiency would ultimately result from such a merger. Within the Congress, there is considerable doubt about whether the advocates of the merger can meet their burden of proof on that issue.

Mr. Herrington is a former practicing attorney and businessman who has served in the Reagan administration since March of 1981. He served first on the White House staff, then as an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and most recently as assistant to the President for Presidential personnel.

Although Mr. Herrington has not been involved in the energy policy debates of recent years, he will bring to the Department his considerable management experience as a Federal Administrator. He will be in a position to apply a fresh and unbiased perspective to the decisionmaking within the Department.

Madam President, on behalf of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, I am pleased to recommend Senate approval of Mr. Herrington's nomination.

Madam President, let me conclude at this time by saying very simply that, first, there is a feeling on the part of this Senator, as concurred in by the committee, that we need a full-time Secretary of a full-time Department. Mr. Herrington has indicated that it is his intention to be both.

Second, I think it is important to note that the legislation under which the Department of Energy was created has set up some very strict limitations with respect to conflict of interest. Because of that, it is essential that we find somebody with managerial experience, but it is impossible to find someone with that experience who comes from the energy community, as such. I think Mr. Herrington admirably fits the criteria established.

I know a great many people have said, when the nomination was submitted, "What is his experience in the field of energy?" The act, itself, makes it almost impossible to find somebody with such past experience. I should not say almost impossible, but certainly very difficult.

I am convinced that Mr. Herrington's nomination is a good nomination. I have been very favorably impressed with his capacity to understand and to learn the issues. I have been informed, by people who have known him much longer than I, that indeed he is a quick study.

I look forward to a very affirmative, positive, and helpful administration of a very complex and difficult agency.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Madam President.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. McCLURE. Madam President, I yield to the distinguished Senator 6 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I rise to voice my strong support for the nomination of Mr. John S. Herrington to be Secretary of Energy.

Mr. Herrington has demonstrated exception abilities and leadership qualities in each and every endeavor he has undertaken in both his private and public careers. He is a man of commitment, dedication, integrity, and principle. Not only is he eminently qualified to carry out the important responsibilities of Secretary of Energy; but, I believe he is the right man for the right job at the right time.

Mr. Herrington was educated in California. Following his graduation from University High School in Los Angeles, he attended Stanford University, where he obtained a bachelor of arts degree in economics. In addition to his academic pursuits at Stanford, Mr. Herrington was also an active participant in the varsity sports of rugby, soccer, and boxing.

After completing his undergraduate studies, Mr. Herrington decided to further his education through the study of law. He enrolled in the University of California, Hastings School of Law at San Francisco, where he successfully completed the requirements for both a J.D. and LL.B. degrees.

Beginning his legal career in 1965, Mr. Herrington had a long, distinguished, and varied practice. He served as a criminal prosecutor with the Ventura County district attorney's office. Later, in private practice, he quickly established himself as a capable corporate and real estate practitioner. In addition to becoming an able, skillful lawyer, he also became known as a sound businessman, through his ventures in real estate development, ranching, and other financial undertakings.

Madam President, the accomplishments of this fine man are not limited to those of his private life. John S. Herrington also has a distinguished record of public service to his country. He served in the military as a first lieutenant in the U.S. Marine Corps. Continuing his involvement in, and complementing his understanding of the importance of defense to our country, Mr. Herrington has been associated with numerous organizations whose purpose and aim are to promote the defense of this Nation.

The President's nominee to be Secretary of Energy has also served in a number of other capacities in recent years. When he first came to Washington in January 1981, Mr. Herrington assumed the duties of Deputy Assistant to the President and also Director of Presidential Personnel at the White House. After performing ably in that post, Mr. Herrington was nominated to become an Assistant Secretary of the Navy. His outstanding work in this key defense position in charge of manpower and reserve affairs earned him the Department of Defense Distinguished Service Medal. President Reagan then summoned Mr. Herrington back to the White House team in February 1983, to head the Presidential personnel office, a position in which Mr. Herrington has further distinguished himself during the past year.

Madam President, it is essential that the Secretary of Energy not only have a background and understanding of our Nation's energy needs, but also of its defense requirements. Many persons are not aware of it, but a substantial portion of the Energy Department budget is devoted to atomic energy defense activities. With his experience in the Defense Department and his military background, Mr. Herrington is especially well qualified to direct the Federal agency charged with the vitally important mission of producing the nuclear weapons material necessary to our national security. In my capacity as the ranking Republican member of the Armed Services Committee, and as a Senator representing a State in which one of our most important atomic energy defense facilities is located—the Savannah River plant in Aiken County, SC—I intend to work closely with Mr. Herrington in his new capacity to see that our Nation's defense needs are met.

Through his service to President Reagan, Mr. Herrington has earned the respect and trust of the President; and rightly so. John Herrington is a bright, dedicated, hard working individual. I firmly believe he is qualified and capable of being one of the finest Secretaries of Energy we have ever had. I strongly support his nomination, and I urge my Senate colleagues to act favorably and swiftly in confirming the nomination of John S. Herrington to be Secretary of the U.S. Department of Energy.

Madam President, I yield the floor. I thank the able Senator from Idaho for his courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

JOHN S. HERRINGTON

Mr. JOHNSTON. Madam President, John S. Herrington does not have an extensive background in energy. As a matter of fact, as he himself says, he has had no training in this area. Nevertheless, I support his nomination to be Secretary of Energy. I do so because, his background in business, in the military, as a prosecutor, as a lawyer and as manager of the personnel division at the White House—evidences a wide range of admirable qualities. From all of those standpoints and in all of these positions I believe John Herrington has shown himself to be a man of judgment, of integrity, and of intelligence.

I think that qualifies him to be Secretary of Energy.

Madam President, in discussions with Mr. Herrington, both in the committee and in my office, I found he was quite attuned to some of the big issues that are coming up in the field of energy. He recognizes, I believe, that while there is a surplus and a correspondingly low price of crude oil, it is a temporary phenomenon. The same is true of natural gas, a temporary deliverability and an accordingly low price. He recognizes it is temporary in nature; that we need to push ahead in this country with alternative fuels, with synthetic fuels, with conservation, and with measures to reduce our dependency on foreign imports. He stressed that in his testimony, he stressed that in my office, and I believe he will do that.

Madam President, I also believe he has the intelligence to understand the need for a healthy domestic oil and gas industry. He understands that the Secretary of Energy will need to be one of the point men in the administration to speak for the survival, the health of that domestic oil and gas industry vis-a-vis an attack by a tax policy which could be very destructive to that industry. When I speak of tax policy, I mean the various tax proposals which have been proposed beginning with the Treasury tax bill—which has been endorsed, if not by title and line, by the President, at least in principle—and the other versions of so-called tax reform including the Bradley-Gephardt bill and the Kemp-Kasten bill. All of these bills would have the effect of taking from the oil and gas industry all of those incentives which now exist in the law.

My contacts in the oil and gas industry, which are extensive, have told me that the domestic oil and gas industry would be dealt a body blow, if not a fatal blow, by these tax proposals. The elimination of the expensing of intangibles together with the elimination of the percentage depletion allowance, not to mention other provisions such as the elimination of investment tax credits, accelerated cost recovery, and other provisions, would make it virtually impossible to survive in today's market of low oil and gas prices. I am advised that about 50 percent of the wells drilled today would not be drilled, certainly not by independents, if these incentives were eliminated. I believe, Madam President, that Mr. Herrington will have the intelligence and the integrity to investigate that issue and to speak out on it at least within the councils of the administration.

So for all of these reasons, Madam President, I believe that Mr. Herrington can be an excellent Secretary of Energy. Those who know him best, including the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER], speak very highly of him and recommend him without qualification. I believe that speaks well for him in the whole Congress. I therefore endorse his nomination.

DONALD HODEL

Madam President, Donald Hodel is an individual well known to me pesonally and professionally. He first came to my knowledge as Secretary of Energy, where I believe he has done an outstanding job. He comes to the Department of Interior with a better background in Interior matters and in the whole panoply of issues facing the Department of Interior than perhaps any Secretary nominee since I have been in the Congress and perhaps in the whole history of the Department of the Interior. This is very appropriate and very important at this particular time in our history. I say at this particular time in our history because as everyone in our Nation knows, certainly everyone in this body, the post of Secretary of the Interior can be one of the most controversial of all posts in the Government. It is certainly the most sensitive in matters concerning the environment. It may not be the only Cabinet post concerned with the environment, but it is clearly the most important. The Secretary of the Interior is the Ambassador to environmentalists, the supreme court to environmentalists, and the Administrator of environmental matters. When he fails to handle matters in the best way possible, it can mean the worst possible in terms of controversy for the administration. We have seen that well illustrated in the very recent past at the Department of the Interior. It is therefore most important that you have a man who knows these issues—issues like coal leasing, Outer Continental Shelf development, management of national parks, acquisition of lands for parks and wildlife refuges, grazing rights; the myriad of issues that affect the Department of the Interior are vitally important to millions and millions of Americans. I believe that Mr. Hodel has that experience, that knowledge, that background, and that subtlety and sensitivity to deal with the issues intelligently in such a way as to serve the dual interests of national policy and what you might call the concerned client groups whether they be environmentalists or those who would like to develop areas in national parks. It is a delicate balance to achieve.

One of the real travesties of the James Watt years at Interior was the politicization of conservation and natural resources policy in this Nation and the lack of meaningful communication and dialog that resulted from such a policy. I know that Secretary Hodel will not fall into this trap. I am confident that he will leave the lines of communication open between the Department and all interested parties, and that he will actively seek the advice and counsel of a wide range of interests, not just those who happen to agree with him. I know I can also count on him to work openly and on a bipartisan basis with the members of the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, as well as the other congressional committees with jurisdiction over the Department's program and budget.

The Secretary of the Interior has one of the most challenging and important jobs in Government. He is charged with protecting some of America's most precious natural assets—our national parks and wildlife refuges. The Secretary is also responsible for management and development of the vast energy resources on Federal lands. These include oil and gas on the Outer Continental Shelf and onshore, coal, oil shale, and tar sands. Management of these resources, which include 60 percent of U.S. oil and gas and almost 50 percent of our coal, is probably the Nation's single most important energy program.

As Secretary Hodel put it at his confirmation hearing before the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, "I do not believe the Nation must choose between adequate energy and an improving environment. We can do both." Of course, this is easier said than done, but I agree with Secretary Hodel. With careful planning and wise decisions, the apparent conflict between these two objectives can be reconciled. I intend to do what I can to help achieve that end.

I believe Bill Clark as Secretary of the Interior has achieved a commendable record of success in communication with the environmental groups, in the care in which he had approached all of these issues. For example, in offshore drilling, while it has not proceeded nearly as fast as I think the facts would warrant and as fast as the Nation needs, I believe Mr. Clark did his very best in that very highly illustrative issues. He was most cooperative in dealing with the environmental groups and making them feel that they were being heard, that their concerns, if rational and reasonable, would be adhered to. I believe the same thing is true of Mr. Hodel. I think he is an excellent choice. I will be greatly surprised and greatly disappointed if he fails to be one of the finest Secretaries of the Interior that we have had appointed in recent decades. It is with real pleasure that I endorse his nomination.

DONALD HODEL

Mr. THURMOND. Madam President, I rise to express my strong support for the nomination of Mr. Donald Paul Hodel to be Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Few individuals could bring to the Department of the Interior the qualifications possessed by this nominee, who already holds a Cabinet-level position within the Reagan administration.

Mr. Hodel has done an outstanding job as Secretary of the Department of Energy, and I am confident that he will perform equally as well in his new role as Secretary of the Department of the Interior. It has been my privilege to work closely with Mr. Hodel in his capacity as Energy Secretary on a number of issues, including matters relating to the Savannah River plant, an atomic energy defense facility in Aiken County, SC, and other issues relating to the defense nuclear weapons programs.

Mr. Hodel has demonstrated that he is a man of great understanding and reasonableness. He has the ability to readily grasp complex issues, and the strength to act decisively in the best interests of the Nation. I commend President Reagan for his selection of this fine and outstanding individual to be Secretary of the Interior.

Of course, this will not be the first time Mr. Hodel has served in the Department of the Interior. In 1981, he was appointed Undersecretary of the Interior and served ably and responsibly in that capacity. Prior to that, Mr. Hodel was associated with the Bonneville Power Administration. First appointed as Deputy Administrator in 1969, Mr. Hodel later was named Administrator of that agency and quickly became a central figure in northwestern energy matters.

Madam President, I believe Mr. Donald Paul Hodel is eminently qualified for the position to which he has been nominated. I am confident he will merit the trust placed in him as guardian of our national and historic resources by performing the responsibilities of Secretary of the Interior in a competent, professional, and dedicated manner. I strongly support his nomination and urge that he be confirmed.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. WILSON]. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

JOHN HERRINGTON

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I first thank the distinguished chairman of the Energy Committee, Chairman McCLURE, and the distinguished ranking minority member, Mr. JOHNSTON, for their very fair, thorough, and courteous consideration of both the nominations of Mr. Herrington and Mr. Hodel. I rise at this moment to unequivocally endorse the nomination by the President of John Herrington to be the Secretary of Energy.

Mr. Herrington, who has an honorable record of service to this Nation, is a native of Los Angeles, and graduated in economics from Stanford University.

He received his law degree from the University of California, Hastings College of Law, and has practiced for 16 years both as a criminal prosecutor and a business attorney.

Throughout his career, John Herrington has been recognized as a man of impeccable integrity, a skillful businessman and attorney, a master of management, and an extraordinarily quick study.

In his current job, Assistant to the President for Presidential Personnel, he has gained the trust and respect of many competing interests and factions for his handling of difficult decisions.

Prior to that he served as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, a department with which I have some familiarity.

When he arrived on the job in October 1981, he read a report detailing drug use in the armed services.

Within 2 weeks he designed, drafted, and implemented a plan for the Department of the Navy's war on drugs, one of the greatest untold success stories in recent years in the Department of the Navy.

With the help of thousands of sailors and marines, drug use in the Navy and Marine Corps was cut fivefold, to the point where it was the lowest in the Armed Forces.

For this initiative, and others, he was awarded the Department of Defense's Distinguished Service Medal. With his keen intellect, fine character, high standards, and fastidious attention to detail, I am confident that he will serve with excellence the President, the Nation, and Congress as Secretary of Energy.

Together with his lovely wife, Lois, who independently has established her own distinguished career as a public servant, they presently have a home in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Just this afternoon, the Secretary designee met with the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BYRD, and other Members of the Senate, together with Mr. Stockman, on a most difficult issue. At that initial meeting, working with Congress, although unofficially, since his nomination has not been confirmed, he displayed a very fair and objective approach to a tough situation. I think that all present at that meeting were highly impressed, and I believe it is indicative of the type of service he will render to this Nation.

I thank the chairman, and I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I understand that I have 15 minutes on the nomination of Mr. Herrington. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the nomination of John S. Herrington to be Secretary of Energy.

Why do I oppose this nomination? The answer is simple. Mr. Herrington has no direct experience with any of the important subjects he will deal with as Secretary. None. Not 1 year. Not 1 month. Not 1 day. Not 5 minutes.

Does he have any experience dealing with nuclear weapons? No. Alternative fuels and conservation? No. Electric power marketing? No. What does he know about his new domain? Absolutely nothing.

If you or I recommended this kind of appointment to a position of authority in a corporation, we would be laughed right out the door. If anyone wonders why the Federal Government is such a slovenly, wasteful, incompetent stumblebum, this kind of appointment is a big part of the answer.

Why should the Secretary of Energy know anything about his job? For starters, because he will preside over an almost $10 billion a year budget, thousands of employees and contractors, weapons factories, nuclear waste sites, and high-tech laboratories. That would boggle the mind of even the most sophisticated energy buff.

The Department of Energy is no small-time agency. Its budget is about as big as those of Interior and EPA combined, and its responsibilities are enormous. Does it need a big-time administrator, one who knows the technical details of his complex responsibilities? Of course it does.

I have often called for the dismantling of the Department and transferring its functions elsewhere in the Government, as has the President. But there is little congressional support for such a change. So if Congress chooses to perpetuate this bloated bureaucracy, the least we can do is assure that it runs efficiently.

I have usually vigorously disagreed with Secretary Hodel's priorities at Energy. They were bad, very bad. But at least he knew his business. He was unlikely to become unwittingly bamboozled by departmental rivalries or harebrained energy development schemes. He knew enough so that all of even his worst decisions were his own. And he could be held fully accountable.

However, with Herrington we have no such guarantees. Mr. Herrington is said to be a quick study—I have heard that now from several Senators who have spoken on his behalf—and a good manager. Is he? And will he be for Energy? All of the Herrington Government experience, whether at the White House or the Pentagon, is in personnel and manpower management. He has never had to deal with complex, substantive policy issues.

Well, he cannot escape difficult, complex, highly technical questions at Energy. With no background, he will have to make billion-dollar decisions. Whether it is deciding the location of our first nuclear waste dump or preparing for our next oil shortages, the policy questions he will face are big and they are tough. They will have a profound effect on our country. They are too tough for someone with no background, someone who has to rely entirely on the advice of others.

Suppose we faced a significant cutback in our oil supply. Remember the last time that happened? The loss of only a few percent of oil imports threw the United States into mass confusion and panic. Since that time, we have established a strategic petroleum reserve to tide us over shortages. But how will the Secretary allocate the reserve during the next shortage? Will his plan work, and what will the oil cost? This is the kind of situation in which experience helps, and Herrington has none.

Does not the United States deserve better? Do we not need someone as Secretary who thoroughly knows the policy alternatives?

What about energy research to make us independent of foreign sources of supply? The choices are bewildering. Should the Department do research on advanced nuclear technologies or simple solar devices; should it look into better ways to burn coal or to enhance production from existing oil wells; all of these, none of these, or something else entirely?

Once again, without knowledge or experience in the energy field, a Secretary cannot make the wise decisions our country needs for our energy security.

My colleagues may well ask me, just how qualified should a nominee be to head this Department? After all, previous Secretaries include a dentist and a soft drink executive. In fact, aside from Secretary Hodel, Energy Secretaries have all been grossly, pitifully unqualified for the job. John Herrington fits right into that miserable tradition. Yet, Mr. Herrington will win the overwhelming approval of the Senate as Secretary of Energy.

Mr. President, Members of this body take an oath when they are sworn as Senators to support the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution gives us the responsibility to advise and consent to the top policy appointments of the President. Senate approval of John Herrington as Secretary of Energy will represent a sad abdication of that responsibility.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I yield the floor.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, let me respond to only one comment that has been made on the floor so far, with respect to Mr. Herrington, and that was a reference made to the Treasury tax bill and the provisions of that Treasury tax bill.

The statement was made, if I heard it correctly, that the bill has been endorsed at least in principle by the President. I have been watching that matter very carefully, and unless I have missed something, I think a correct statement of the President's position is that he is in favor of tax reform and tax simplification; but, I think some people have noted that he has almost studiously refrained from endorsement of the Treasury bill, and some people have been interested in whether or not he does support it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I hope the distinguished Senator is correct.

When I heard the inaugural address, it sounded very close to an endorsement, to me.

Yesterday, in the Budget Committee, some of the Members on my side of the aisle were getting on Mr. Stockman as to why he had not done anything about tax reform. He said, "Well, we have. It is our bill. Right here." He proceeded to say what had been done on various items of tax reform.

Others said to him, "Well, that has not been submitted yet."

He said, "Well, it will."

So I guess you can hear what you want to hear on that tax bill.

I hope, though, that Mr. Herrington will remind the President that he has not endorsed it and will look very carefully at some of these more destructive provisions.

I understand, of course, that the President clearly has not endorsed it line by line, item by item, concept by concept.

And it is in this very difficult time, when you are looking at it concept by concept, that I think he needs to consider whether or not it is important to have a domestic oil and gas industry, a healthy one, and what the effect of it is, what the effect of the tax bill is on the industry.

I think if he looks at it he will see that the two cannot simultaneously coexist, that is, the healthy oil and gas industry and that tax bill.

I must say, as the distinguished Senator knows, it is rather hard to get a lot of sympathy for what people would consider loopholes for rich oil men, but the fact of the matter is that it is a very highly risky business. Those who remain in the business are usually the winners and do fairly well. Those who go broke are out of business and are not there to hold up as examples.

Moreover, unless those who are successful continue to drill, you are not going to find the oil and gas, and I know the distinguished Senator knows all this and he and I do not disagree on the issue.

I do hope that he is right in what the President's attitude is on the tax bill.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, let me say to my friend from Louisiana, I do not know that I can say the President has said he is not in favor of the Treasury's tax bill, because as carefully as I have been following that subject, I have not heard him make any statement about it which tells me something.

In this business, when you are watching what a President does with respect to what Cabinet officers may have said or done, if he does not say anything about it at all, you can be pretty sure he did not approve it.

To my knowledge, he has not said anything about it at all.

I was not aware of the statements that Mr. Stockman may have made to the Budget Committee yesterday about the tax legislation, but Mr. Stockman made some other statements yesterday, too, and I understand the President may put some distance between himself and Mr. Stockman with regard to those statements, and I think appropriately so.

I believe that the issue of what the tax bill is or is not needs to be separated, and I do so at this time very carefully, because I agree with my friend from Louisiana that many of the provisions of the proposed bill that came from Treasury simply are unworkable in the real world, in my judgment. In spite of the protestation of some experts to the contrary that there are offsetting provisions in the tax schedules that are contained in that bill, I think it would be a damaging bill, and I would not support those provisions, just as I know my friend from Louisiana would not, and we will be watching with a great deal of care as to whether or not the President does or does not embrace those provisions.

I agree with the statement that was made by my friend from Louisiana that Mr. Herrington has exhibited a knowledge of those issues, a sensitivity to them, and a willingness to get himself involved in those discussions within the administration in the future. I think that bodes well for the concerns that my friend has expressed, and which I share.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today to support the nomination and confirmation of John S. Herrington as Secretary of Energy.

I believe President Reagan has made a good choice, that Mr. Herrington has the necessary qualifications to be Secretary of Energy. In assuming his new post, he will bring with him strong management and organizational skills which he demonstrated as Assistant to the President for Presidential Personnel.

At Mr. Herrington's confirmation hearing last week, I was greatly encouraged to hear his commitment to developing a balanced and mixed energy resource base, ranging from oil, natural gas, coal and nuclear; to hydroelectric power, solar, wind ocean thermal energy conversion, biofuels, and geothermal energy. In addition, he stated, "I consider conservation and efficiency gains are also energy resources."

This is a worthy goal. A balanced energy base is vital not only to this Nation's energy security and energy independence but to continued economic recovery. These issues are important to Minnesotans because we are at the end of the energy pipeline and energy shortages hit us hard.

One of Mr. Herrington's first responsibilities upon confirmation will be to begin work on the fifth national energy policy plan. This plan will shape our energy policy for the next 10 years. In light of this, there are two aspects of our Nation's energy future which I would like to take a moment to discuss. The first is our Energy Emergency Preparedness Program.

We have made substantial progress as a nation since the energy crises of the 1970's and with any luck gas lines will be history. We are less dependent on OPEC oil, world oil prices are dropping, we've learned to conserve and we have close to 450 million barrels of oil in the strategic petroleum reserve.

Our investment in our energy security is over $10 billion. That figure is roughly what it cost the Nation to fill the SPR to its current level. A substantial commitment by any yardstick. A good insurance policy, most would think. But an insurance policy, however high the premium is only good if you can collect on it in a time of need. And in that respect—how and when to use the SPR, if we need to—we still have no firm policy or consensus among policymakers. We need to make sure our policy works for us, to make sure our investment is not in vain.

Second, with world oil prices falling all around us, it is easy to grow complacent about energy conservation. But we must remember it was our ability to conserve that broke the camel's back. From 1973 to 1983 we reduced our petroleum consumption by over 2 million barrels a day. Oil imports, however, are on the rise. In 1984, imports were 9 percent above 1983 levels, and imports for 1985 are projected to increase further, by 4 percent over last year's levels.

We all recognize the enormous economic benefit of falling oil prices. By continuing successful conservation policies, we can increase downward pressure on world oil prices.

Energy conservation and emergency preparedness planning are just two of the issues that Mr. Herrington must face as we move into our energy future. Mr. Herrington has no easy task. But he will bring a fresh perspective to the process and I look forward to working with him when he becomes Secretary of Energy.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of John S. Herrington to be Secretary of the Department of Energy.

THE NOMINEE'S QUALIFICATIONS

John S. Herrington will bring to the Department of Energy highly respected skills as a Federal administrator, a solid educational background, and a strong record of accomplishment during his 4 years with the Reagan administration.

A graduate of Stanford, Mr. Herrington received his law degree from the University of California at Hastings. After practicing law for nearly 20 years, Mr. Herrington moved to Washington to work for the administration—first at the White House, then at the Department of Defense as Assistant Secretary of the Navy. While at DOD Mr. Herrington managed the personnel matters of over a million employees, and administered a budget of nearly $26 billion. His energy-related duties at DOD included oversight of the Navy Petroleum and Oil Shale Program, the Nuclear Power Officer Programs, and the Navy's energy-related scientific community.

In 1983, Mr. Herrington returned to the White House to serve first as Special Assistant to the Chief of Staff, and then Assistant to the President for Presidential Personnel.

GOALS OF THE NOMINEE

During his confirmation hearings, Mr. Herrington made clear that he intends to be a full-time Secretary of Energy, not a caretaker. It is apparent from his statements, that he fully understands the importance of energy to the Nation's economic well-being and national security. He can be expected to bring strong, vigorous leadership to the Department, and to work diligently in carrying out the national energy policies established by the President and Congress. His primary goals will be to minimize Federal control and intervention in energy markets, while maintaining public health, safety and environmental quality, and to develop a balanced energy resource base to avoid dangerous dependence on any one energy source.

CONCLUSION

Though Mr. Herrington does not have extensive experience in the energy field, he is a man of proven competence and ability who, I'm sure, will quickly learn the in's and out's of running the Department, while at the same time, bringing a fresh, objective viewpoint to his job. The President has made a sound choice in nominating him, and I urge his prompt confirmation by the full Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, today the Senate is considering the nomination of John Herrington as the new Secretary of Energy.

Although Mr. Herrington's background does not include extensive experience with energy policy issues, he has a good reputation as a strong manager. In addition, he has an appreciation for the important role that coal must play in providing the Nation's energy needs. In this regard, I will be especially interested in the Department of Energy's handling of the Clean Coal Technology Program, which was established by the Congress last year as a part of the compromise agreement on the Synthetic Fuels Corporation.

I look forward to working with Mr. Herrington, as I did with his predecessor, Mr. Hodel.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, I rise in support of the nomination of John Herrington to be Energy Secretary.

While Mr. Herrington is not a specialist in the energy field, he does bring a record of management accomplishment to the post from other assignments with the current administration. Also, I have been favorably impressed by his responses to questions, both written and in open hearing, from members of our committee. I also have had the opportunity to meet with him in person and discuss our Nation's energy problems. I believe he brings to the Department a willingness to assess policy from a broad perspective, rather than a narrow and ideological framework. He has the confidence of the President and should be confirmed. I will vote to confirm his nomination.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, what a pleasure it is for me to join in the accolades for this fine individual, John Herrington, who has demonstrated so many fine qualities which will make him an ideal person to take the helm at the Department of Energy.

I have known John and have worked closely with him on numerous occassions in these recent years past. He is a proven "quick study" in any endeavor which he undertakes. John Herrington has consistently demonstrated the most adroit administrative skills in his recent service to our President. He took over the tough task of Director of White House Personnel and brought swift order to the monumental requirements of that position. Subsequently he served as Assistant Naval Secretary for Manpower Affairs, and then returned to the White House to shepherd and administer the massive personnel assignment duties of this administration's second term in office.

John has shown me time and again that he is a "hands on" kind of person—he is calm, collected, thoughtful, accessible, available—when John Herrington tells you he will take on a problem, you can wager he will come up with an equitable solution—even though the task at hand might be a rough one indeed.

At the Department of Energy, he will be dealing with some of the really tough ones—such as the health and well-being of this country's domestic uranium industry. We have witnessed a sad erosion in the health of this vital industry over the past 5 years, and now we are at the point of necessary fundamental decisions to be made concerning the future of the industry. The annual reports required under the Nuclear Regulatory Commission Authorization Act are part of an important initiative designed not only to provide the Congress with the basis for making those decisions in an informed manner, but also to focus the attention of the administration on the grave condition of this industry. More important, a healthy uranium industry will require a dedicated and committed effort at the highest level of the Department of Energy—a dedication and a commitment that I think this nominee will bring to his new job.

John Herrington is a man who will work with the Congress—make every effort in order that we may all understand the magnitude of the tasks of energy independence with which we are faced—and work together to come to a resolution of the various problems. Suffice it to say I have every confidence in placing the stewardship of our Nation's energy reserves in the hands of John Herrington. A facilitator, a man of great patience, a tremendous organization man, a person of dedication and commitment—this is the stuff that will make John Herrington the right man for a difficult job—the developing and directing of our Nation's energy resources at this most critical time in our history. I do wish him every success, and am fully and enthusiastically supportive of his nomination to be Secretary of Energy. And I express my kind regards to his fine wife, Lois—and wish them both well in this new endeavor.

DONALD HODEL

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring before the Senate the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources that the Senate consent to the nomination of Donald Paul Hodel to be Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

Secretary Hodel has completed and submitted all forms and other requirements of the Senate and committee rules. The committee conducted a hearing to consider the nomination on February 1, 1985, and the nominee has responded to all questions submitted to him by members of the committee and other Senators. The committee considered the nomination in an open business meeting on February 5, 1985, and unanimously ordered the nomination reported favorably to the Senate.

For the past 2 years, Mr. Hodel has served as Secretary of Energy, and prior to that, performed the duties of Under Secretary of the Department of the Interior. He has also served as Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration. He brings a solid reputation as an effective administrator; a broad knowledge of our natural resources and the environment; and a keen sense of the responsibilities he faces. It is obvious that his sound record qualifies him to be Secretary of the Interior.

This will likely be an active Congress and I look forward to working with Secretary Hodel in resolving the various issues which will be before the committee. We share the commitment of the administration to bring the budget under control and I am pleased that we have received Secretary Hodel's assurance that we will have the full support of the Department and the administration in seeing that our responsibilities to the American people are performed in a manner which will not only be cost-effective but which will also contribute to the future growth and welfare of this Nation. The Department of the Interior's responsibilities include both protection and development of the public lands, research and conservation, the care and management of our national parks and historic resources, and the welfare and development of our citizens in the territories. The task is complex, involving many difficult judgments and often requiring a balancing of varied conflicting interests.

That task is made all the more difficult in the face of the budget deficit, and it will require considerable skill and sensitivity to determine where budget savings can be made without jeopardizing our responsibilities or our future. Certain activities, such as the Mineral Research Institutes, are investments in our future, and the protection of our national parks is an obligation we have to other generations. We will need to work together if we are to resolve the tasks before us affecting the public domain, including rangeland issues and section 3 of the Federal Coal Leasing Act and section 2(c) of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act. We need to bring an order to the development of the Outer Continental Shelf and we need to exert our efforts to assist the territorial governments to become economically self-sufficient. We will need to consider innovative solutions to some of our problems, such as land exchanges rather than acquisition, and we will need to be receptive to proposals which may promote more effective management of our resources. In that regard, I hope that the recent proposals by the Bureau of Land Management and the Forest Service on Land transfers will be carefully considered by everyone as the proposal is developed. The committee was assured by Secretary Hodel that both the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture would consult closely with not only the Congress and the affected States, but also with the many organizations and individuals who will be interested and affected. There have been several reports of potential reorganizations affecting the responsibilities of the Department of the Interior. I am reassured and pleased to report Secretary Hodel specifically committed to consult with the Congress prior to effecting any such reorganization except for any internal changes within the Department for which the Secretary already has clear legislative authority.

The nominee assured the committee that the administration will again transmit the Compact of Free Association to the Congress for approval and I look forward to working with him and other members of the administration to ensure that our commitments to those emerging governments are fulfilled in a manner which fully recognizes their sovereignty and self-government.

As I stated at the outset, Secretary Hodel brings to this job the background and experience to deal with these issues as well as the commitment and sensitivity which are so vital.

I urge the Senate to consent to the nomination of Donald Paul Hodel as Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today in very strong support of the confirmation of Donald Paul Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior.

Don Hodel comes to this job with a long and highly distinguished record of public service, most recently as Secretary of Energy. On many occasions, I had the opportunity to work with him as a member of the Energy Committee on issues relating to his Department.

His keen intellect, sound judgment, and willingness to listen to all points of view have been hallmarks of his service as Secretary of Energy.

He is a leader who has the vision and knowledge to be a truly outstanding Secretary of the Interior.

I am confident that with Don Hodel at the helm of the Department of the Interior, the appropriate balance will be struck between the need to develop our critical energy resources and equal need to protect our fragile natural environment.

He will make the tough decisions required of the occupants of that high office.

I congratulate Don Hodel on his new position and look forward to continuing my work on these subjects.

Together with his lovely wife, Barbara, they are currently making their home in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and I hope they will stay there happily for many years.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I wish to add my wholehearted support for the nomination and confirmation of Donald P. Hodel as Secretary of the Interior Department.

For the past 2 years, Mr. Hodel has served the President and this Nation well as Secretary of the Department of Energy. He has earned well-deserved praise for efficient management and his ability to carry out the administration's policies. It has been a pleasure to work with him on issues of emergency preparedness and alternative energy for I found him to be well-informed and attentive to the concerns expressed in the Congress.

At his confirmation hearing last week, I was very pleased to hear that he will not allow any oil or gas drilling or other minerals development within national parks or in designated wilderness areas. This, I believe, is sound policy and in keeping with Interior's preservation mandate. Mr. Hodel's commitment to the sometimes conflicting preservation goals of the Department is important to my Minnesota constituents because we place a high value on the preservation of natural resources which display unique natural and environmental qualities.

I have a strong faith in Mr. Hodel's ability to balance the management and development activities of the Interior Department. He will be asked to increase the taxpayer's return on the Federal resources under his jurisdiction. But we will also expect him to invest a significant portion of those funds into the development and management of areas set aside for protection and recreation.

Of particular importance to Minnesota are the Voyageurs National Park and Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuge which are under the management of the Interior Department.

Both of these areas are recent additions to the National Park System and the National Wildlife Refuge System. As such, their management plans have not yet been completed. I anticipate working closely with Mr. Hodel to assure that the management and development plans for both areas are completed on a timely basis.

I believe that President Reagan has made an excellent choice, for Mr. Hodel is certainly well qualified to be Interior Secretary. I am confident that he will continue to demonstrate his high degree of loyalty, integrity, and leadership. And I look forward to working with him on the whole spectrum of natural resource issues, from parks, rivers, and refuges to minerals management and development.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the confirmation of Donald Hodel as Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Hodel has an extensive background in Government service, including serving as Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, Under Secretary of the Interior, and Secretary of Energy. He is a proven administrator with broad exposure to the issues he will be facing.

The Secretary of the Interior is important to Florida. We have what is probably a larger presence by the Department than any other State east of the Mississippi. Florida has eight national wildlife refuges, and I am hopeful that legislation to establish a ninth will come before this body later this year, two national seashores, two national parks, including the Everglades National Park, and one national park preserve. These areas are important to Floridians, as environmentally protected lands, and they are important to our economy as significant tourist attractions.

The stewardship of the Secretary of the Interior is therefore a very important matter to Floridians.

In addition, as I am sure every Senator knows, the Department has been very actively engaged in seeking to lease the areas off our coasts for oil exploration, to the concern, if not dismay, of many Floridians.

Every formal and informal poll taken in Florida in the past few years shows protecting the environment, and the quality of life generally, to be far and away the most important issue to Floridians. We view our beaches, our wetlands, and our wildlife as major elements of the quality of life in Florida.

In addition, tourism is the No. 1 industry in Florida, and our beautiful beaches are the No. 1 tourist attraction. We have both selfish and aesthetic reasons for wanting our beaches and estuaries kept free of oil.

I hope Mr. Hodel will display the same sensitivity to our concerns that Secretary Clark did. Secretary Clark had voluntarily, at an early stage in the planning process, agreed to the retention of approximately 95 percent of the buffer zone established off our gulf coast, after so much turmoil in 1983, in connection with the lease sale upcoming this November. I have been in frequent touch with Interior officials over the disposition of the remainder, and I would strongly urge Secretary Hodel to continue former Secretary Clark's approach to this matter.

I am sure Donald Hodel will do this. I had several occasions to work with him on matters of concern to Florida while he was Secretary of Energy, and I always found him to be most reasonable and understanding of our problems. I am pleased we have moved so rapidly to confirm him, and I anticipate his being an outstanding Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I express my strong support of Donald P. Hodel as nominee for Secretary of the Interior. He has outstanding credentials and an excellent record of service in the public sector.

In his role as Secretary of Energy, Donald Hodel has proven himself to be an exceptionally talented individual and an extremely effective manager. His competence is attested to by Mr. Edward Burke, chairman of the New England Conference of Public Utilities Commissioners, who has worked with Mr. Hodel on the issue of Canadian electricity imports. Mr. Burke, in a recent letter, praises Mr. Hodel's "demonstrated willingness to appreciate regional differences, readiness to explore new ideas, and openness to direct meetings with concerned groups."

I have the highest regard for Donald Hodel and hope he continues the spirit of openness demonstrated by former Secretary Clark. I am confident of his solid commitment to building a national consensus on the challenging issues facing the Interior Department. I urge my colleagues to join in unanimous support of his nomination as Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Burke's letter of January 28, 1985, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS, PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION, Providence, RI, January 28, 1985.

Hon. JAMES MCCLURE,
Chairman, Senate Energy Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLURE: I am writing to express support of the nomination of Donald Paul Hodel to the position of Secretary of the Interior, and my hope that your Committee will vote to approve the nomination. As I am unable to testify on February 1, I would appreciate your consideration of this written statement.

The New England Conference of Public Utilities Commissioners, which I chair, asked Mr. Hodel, in his role as Secretary of Energy, to meet with us for a discussion of Canadian electricity imports. Secretary Hodel has expressed considerable skepticism about such imports, which the New England governors, utilities, energy officials and regulators have strongly supported in our search for lower cost electricity supplies for the region. Mr. Hodel acquiesced at once, and met with us in Los Angeles in late November for a full and frank exchange of views which we found heartening. The Secretary's willingness to explain his perspective fully and, particularly to listen carefully to our point of view, was very much appreciated by the commissioners—representing every New England state—who were present. Secretary Hodel assured us that the Department of Energy would not block the planned imports, and indicated that, while maintaining some concern, he could understand why they appear to be an optimal choice for New England at this time.

It seems to me that this demonstrated willingness to appreciate regional differences, readiness to explore new ideas, and openness to direct meetings with concerned groups are exactly the qualities that a Secretary of the Interior, with the vast responsibilities that office entails, should have.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

EDWARD F. BURKE,
Chairman.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate is considering the nomination of Donald Hodel to be the new Secretary of the Interior. I intend to vote in favor of his confirmation.

While Mr. Hodel was serving as the Secretary of Energy, I was always impressed by his willingness to meet to discuss issues of concern, and to try to reach an accommodation. We had several occasions to discuss such issues as acid rain and the need to expand the use of coal.

As the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hodel will serve as the Chairman of the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and the Environment. I am confident that his abilities will serve the Nation well as he addresses the difficult issues which lie ahead. I look forward to working with Mr. Hodel in his new capacity.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure, and with some pain and sadness, that I rise in support of both Mr. John Herrington to be Secretary of Energy, and Mr. Donald Hodel to be Secretary of Interior. I do not rise with any fear or misgivings on the part of these two men—I admire both of them and am confident they will do excellent work in their new posts. Yet, on the other hand, it is precisely that same sentiment—my deep admiration for Secretary Clark—that forces me to view this process with a heavy heart.

It has been quite a relief to be able to sit back and know that there is such a high level of competence and understanding within the Departments of Interior and Energy concerning the problems and needs of my State of Wyoming. I do, however, welcome both of these confirmations, but at the same time I am sorry to see Secretary Clark leave, and I am sorry to see Secretary Hodel leave. I am confident, however, that both Secretary Hodel and Mr. Herrington will ably and enthusiastically fulfill their new assignments within the administration, and I look forward to working with them.

At this time, I should like to mention a few areas of utmost concern to this Senator, my State of Wyoming and the West in general. Briefly, these issues involve land protection and rangeland improvement issues, along with several policy changes in the water and mineral resource areas which are floating about in the administration's recently released fiscal year 1986 budget proposal.

As chairman of the Public Lands and Reserved Water Subcommittee, I am very concerned about the backlog of authorized but unacquired land in our national parks and forests as well as our wildlife refuges. It is extremely critical, in my view, given our present budget constraints, that the Department pay extra attention to other techniques of land protection—such as exchanges—in lieu of outright acquisition.

Also, I am very pleased about the positive approach the Department has taken in establishing a new Recreation Commission. This approach more than anything else illustrates the role of the public/private partnership concept in planning and providing for America's recreational needs, and the demands those needs will place on our lands into the next century.

As far as legislative priorities are concerned there are many that will draw the Senate's attention during this session. One of particular concern and importance, not only to me but also to Senator McCLURE and my other Western colleagues on this committee, is a package of various rangeland issues.

Already, a number of these issues have been identified at workshops conducted by the Congressional Research Service at the request of Members from both Houses. As we speak, over 20 groups are working on a legislative package which will include recommendations on setting equitable grazing fees, the wild horse and burro question as well as methods of funding range improvements and various approaches to insuring broad representation on advisory boards and councils, and looking at measures to protect sensitive rangeland areas.

Like many of my colleagues, I am extremely concerned about several far-reaching proposals contained in the OMB budget. These would include a steep increase in not only grazing fees but recreation user fees as well. The proposed shift from gross receipt to net profit sharing from Federal mineral and timber sales is very worrisome to me as I am sure it is to my other Western colleagues.

I am also concerned about the OMB proposal to place the $12 billion in existing hydropower and irrigation debt on a fixed amortization schedule and to raise the interest rates on all debts to the current Treasury cost of money. In my view, this would effectively preclude irrigation projects in the future, and so substantially raise the rates for consumers that needed projects may not get built. I will be extremely interested in seeing how the Department handles some of these proposals.

I will conclude by noting that while our country is apparently enjoying our energy surplus, we must remember where we were in the 1970's and vow never to retrace our steps. That is why the Department must continue to get its domestic coal and oil and gas leasing programs in order. The Department also must—even if it is with a strong guiding hand from Members of Congress—continue promptly with its review of the Federal Oil and Gas Royalty Management Act regulations that are ridiculously inflexible and punitive, and are about ready to place America's oil and gas industry into bankruptcy.

I look forward to working with both Secretary Hodel and Mr. Herrington on the many public lands and energy and water issues that will affect not only the West, but also the future energy security of America.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I wish to state the considerations involved in my decision to support the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Donald Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior.

As we all know, the position of Interior Secretary is important to all the people of this country. It is uniquely important, however, to my own State of Colorado, where nearly 36 percent of the lands are federally owned and controlled. This importance can be expected to grow in coming years as more and more people migrate to the West and so-called Sun Belt States, adding to existing population and pressures associated with rapid growth. The persons who will serve in this important capacity through the rest of this century will have profound influence on Colorado—its people, its land, and the quality of life Coloradans have come to know and appreciate.

I should like to express my deep and continuing concern about the manner in which this administration has chosen to manage the public resources of our Nation. While the storms presided over by Secretary Watt have calmed down since his departure in 1983, there has been little measurable change in the policies and approach he ushered in. This Senator continues to hear from those who are concerned that about the stewardship of our public resources, and who fundamentally disagree with administering those resources with a single objective—that being the transfer and exploitation at any cost public resources for private benefit. My support for Mr. Hodel should not be interpreted as support for continued insensitivity to the legitimate concern about wise and balanced stewardship of our priceless lands and natural resources.

Many important decisions will be required of the new Secretary during the next few months. Each will require the attention of an activist Secretary willing to tackle difficult resource and policy questions and restore long overdue balance to our public lands policies. Perhaps none of the decisions will be more indicative of the direction Mr. Hodel intends to pursue than who he chooses to fill important vacancies at the Department of Interior, including Assistant Secretary for Fish, Wildlife and Parks; Assistant Secretary for Land and Minerals; and Director of the National Park Service.

I urge Mr. Hodel to carefully analyze and select people for these critical positions who reflect the unwavering commitment of the American people to protection and proper management of the country's lands, waters, minerals and other resources.

As important as these positions are, there are a host of other programs, policies and agencies at the Department of Interior which must be evaluated and aggressively administered in order to restore public confidence in Government management of our lands and resources. These programs include the following:

Strengthening Indian tribal government and Federal Government relations and cooperation to ensure the U.S. Government continues to abide by its special trust relationship with Native Americans. This cannot be accomplished short of restoring critical funding to Indian education, social service, financial and technical assistance programs necessary for continued economic self determination on reservation lands throughout the country.

Redirecting those in the Department who have seen fit in recent years to undermine the National Wildlife Refuge System by allowing increased development activities and thereby reducing wildlife protections. Recently promulgated rules for management of some 76 million acres of refuge lands in Alaska represent a significant departure from congressional objectives. Efforts to preserve habitat and wildlife continue to enjoy broad bipartisan support and we cannot tolerate further efforts to erode these protections.

Further efforts to protect our national park and wilderness areas from threats of development, encroachment and pollution spillover from neighboring growth. These areas are the crown jewels of our spectacular land conservation system, a system which is the envy of the entire world. I am greatly disturbed by the message accompanying the President's fiscal year 1986 budget earlier this week which indicates that he intends to seek a greatly expanded leasing program in our wilderness and wilderness study areas.

According to those documents, the administration is interested in permitting additional slant drilling access to BLM wilderness candidate areas, RARE II recommended wilderness and RARE II further planning areas. Given the candidate status of many of these spectacular and undisturbed areas, I urge the Bureau of Land Management to continue to vigorously pursue identification and review of lands for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System and to take every necessary step to protect these areas from unwarranted and unlawful intrusion.

Progress on adoption of a balanced water resources policy which reflects the continuing importance of water in the West. Four more years of inactivity and rhetoric about cost-sharing simply will not suffice. New sources of funding are needed and proposals—such as innovative use of Federal hydropower revenues, and a rededication to conservation, shared use and reuse—must be fully explored.

Reordering priorities in leasing of public reserves of coal, oil, gas, oil shale, and timber. Although Secretary Clark made progress in this area by virtually stopping much of the leasing, it is important that we reestablish a program of leasing resources at a fair price, avoiding leasing of excessive reserves, and abandonment of proposals to lease in environmentally sensitive areas—including continued prohibition of leasing in national wildlife refuges and wilderness areas.

Mr. President, the nominee before us today brings with him significant experience with energy and natural resource related policies. This nomination presents us a clear and unmistakeable opportunity to serve notice to Mr. Hodel that many of us in the Senate and our constituents throughout the country remain dedicated to the balanced stewardship of our vast natural wealth.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Donald Hodel to be Secretary of the Department of Interior.

AN OUTSTANDING CHOICE

Don Hodel's qualifications for the job of Interior Secretary are nothing short of excellent. A graduate of Harvard University and the University of Oregon School of Law, Don Hodel has been involved in issues related to energy and natural resources for over 15 years. He has been an administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, president of his own energy consulting firm, Under Secretary of the Department of Interior, and, for the past 2 years, Secretary of the Department of Energy. He will bring a wide range of experience and knowledge to his new position in the Cabinet. Under his management, the Nation's natural resources will be in good hands.

Another important qualification possessed by Don Hodel is his willingness and ability to build consensus. Though there will always be controversy over specific issues that fall within the province of the Department of Interior, I believe Don Hodel will make every effort to work with the Congress and the public in building widespread support on matters of broad, national policy.

POLICY OBJECTIVES

As he indicated during his confirmation hearings, his chief policy goals include preserving the Nation's park, wilderness and wildlife resources. As a westerner from Oregon, Don Hodel has a special appreciation for these national treasures. He will also work toward developing multiple uses of our lands and waters—while protecting the environment—to enhance our Nation's economic self-sufficiency and national security.

He has further expressed great sensitivity to the Secretary of the Interior's responsibilities toward Native Americans and will continue to work toward the goal of self-determination for Indian tribes. Finally, he can be expected to continue the course set by his predecessor toward more efficient management of the Department and improved relations with State and local authorities.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, efforts to cut the Federal deficit will place a great burden on the new Secretary of Interior. It will require great expertise and ability to find savings, while preserving the Department's ability to carry out its responsibilities: There is no doubt in my mind Don Hodel can do the job. I look forward to working with him on this and other issues.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise to support the nomination of Donald P. Hodel to be Secretary of the Interior.

My experience in working with Mr. Hodel dates back to his days at the Interior Department as Under Secretary. I found him to be very helpful and responsive then, and also as the Secretary of Energy. I am sure he will be equally so in his new position.

My principal involvement with the Department of the Interior has been on Indian matters. I've been told that Minnesota has the most complex Indian land claim problems in the country. I can certainly believe it. The Interior Department has always been very helpful on these issues and I look forward to more of the same under Mr. Hodel's leadership.

Mr. Hodel is a proven manager and very knowledgeable about the programs he will be administering. His choice as Secretary of the Interior is an excellent one.

I look forward to working with him in his new post.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, Mr. Hodel, nominee for Interior Secretary, has performed ably as Secretary of the Department of Energy and Natural Resources. I do believe he is one of the most qualified and competent persons ever to have held the Energy post. Some of my colleagues may not be aware of the fact that Mr. Hodel has had experience in the No. 2 position in the Interior and I have every reason to believe he will serve the Nation well at this juncture as head of that key Department of our Government. I believe he, too, should be confirmed by this body, and I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in voting for his confirmation.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to express my strong support for the nomination of Donald P. Hodel to be the Secretary of the Department of the Interior. Don is a remarkable individual who is uniquely qualified to be in this challenging position.

I have worked closely with this able man while he served as an Under Secretary in the Department of the Interior and during his fine tenure as Energy Secretary. He always performed his duties with alacrity and took the time to do his homework in order to assure that he was always adequately prepared.

This man has achieved his current success because of hard work and dedication. He is well respected among his professional peers as well as the Members of Congress who he has so closely and cheerfully worked with. The respect that he has attained from my congressional colleagues was manifested in the unanimous vote he received from the Energy and Natural Resources Committee earlier this week.

Seldom has a Secretary-designate come before this deliberative body better qualified for a Cabinet-level position than does Secretary Hodel. As an Under Secretary in the Interior Department, Mr. Hodel learned and mastered an understanding of the important issues that are related to the management of public lands. He studied, evaluated, and led with assurance and fairness. These are qualities that will continue to serve him in his role as caretaker of our Nation's public lands.

Because of his remarkable administrative abilities, Don was tapped to head the Energy Department. While there, he saw the need to sensibly develop critical energy reserves—and yet doing it in a manner sensitive to the needs of our people as well as the fragile environment in which many of these reserves are located.

His tenure at Energy will be remembered because of his organizational skills and his ability to communicate—both in listening and eloquently presenting this administration's point of view.

Don will need and will use all of his fine abilities and talents in this new position. This is a very difficult job, as the recent rapid turnover in the chair indicates. As Secretary, he will be in charge of preserving as well as developing the Nation's natural resources—certainly a conflicting and awesome task.

Don is also a westerner and is thus very sensitive to the needs of those who share this public domain with the Federal Government. Nearly half of my home State of Wyoming is owned by the Federal Government and it is managed directly under the Interior Department. This situation is nearly identical to most of the Western States. This unusual situation calls for a landlord that is cognizant of the needs of his neighbors and knows that through open communication and cooperation, the quality of the public lands can be improved and preserved with assistance from the taxpayers that live within the area.

He is also coming in at a very difficult time. Tough decisions lie ahead regarding the future of coal leasing, competitive oil and gas leasing, a revamping of the Federal Oil and Gas Royalty Management Act regulations that are unfairly penalizing many small producers and developers, and the proper and careful management of the grizzly bear.

Yes, these will require tough and gut-wrenching decisions that will directly affect the future of our Nation. We could not ask for a better person to be making those decisions. I wish him the very best. I do so look forward to working with him on these issues as well as others that arise in the next few years. He has the courage to do it well. I know he will. And, my kind regards go out to his lovely wife, Barbara—his helpmate at his side for many years. She is a remarkable lady. God bless them both.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I understand I have time allotted to me on Mr. Herrington. I have already spoken on Mr. Herrington.

So I yield back the remainder of my time on that particular part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Now, I will use my time on Mr. Hodel.

Mr. President, unlike many recent Reagan agency nominees, Donald Hodel is qualified for his appointed job. Unfortunately, however, the very experience which recommends him also disqualifies him, in my view.

You ask, Is the President not entitled to have the people he wants in his Cabinet, especially if they are honest and know their stuff?

No; not if in a Senator's judgment the appointment is not in the national interest.

In this case, it is not.

The policies we know Hodel will pursue as Secretary of the Interior are so dangerous and the consequences of these policies so long lasting that I am convinced the Hodel tenure at Interior will be a disaster for our country.

Donald Hodel spent several years as Secretary Watt's chief hatchet man, executing Watt's misguided policies, while keeping a low profile himself. Although he lacked his boss' ability to offend, his heart seemed to be in the same place, and it was not the right place. So if you liked Watt, you will love Hodel. I did not like Watt so I cannot go for this son of Watt.

Once Hodel became Secretary of Energy, he emerged as a new, conciliatory figure, a good administrator who did not alienate the public. But were his policies any better? Were they? No way.

He injected politics into the search for a national nuclear wastesite, making campaign promises to States with important Senate races to eliminate them from consideration.

He unsuccessfully promoted an 11th hour plan to save the Clinch River breeder reactor and stick the taxpayers with a several billion-dollar bill.

He presided over energy budgets dramatically skewed toward nuclear energy and away from conservation and renewable energy.

He ignored the clear mandate of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act to cooperate and consult with the States, choosing instead to conduct a form of guerrilla warfare where States were forced to sue to get DOE to honor its promises.

During his tenure, DOE tried repeatedly to weaken its own and other agencies' standards for radioactive and hazardous wastes which applied to Agency facilities. For example, DOE employees tried to prevent EPA from issuing airborne radiation standards, and fought regulation of hazardous and toxic wastes at departmental facilities in South Carolina and Tennessee.

Mr. Hodel downplayed the role of energy conservation within the Department by failing for over 1 year to replace the Assistant Secretary in charge of conservation and renewable energy and proposing to eliminate his office.

Mr. Hodel supported the Hoover Dam scam, a 30-year giveaway to hydroelectricity customers in the West which will cost taxpayers $6 billion in the next 10 years alone. Hodel pushed the legislation through even though current power contracts were not due to expire for another 2 years.

Mr. Hodel sat back and allowed the Bonneville Power Administration, his old haunt, to continue repayment policies which have landed it $8 billion in debt to the Federal Government.

In fact, Bonneville and its sister power marketing agencies owe the Treasury $14 billion, yet Hodel did nothing to force them to ante up despite the advice of the Grace Commission, GAO, and Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. While the President's 1986 budget does seek to correct these policies, relief should have come years earlier.

With this kind of record on hydropower development and miserable return on Federal investment, how can Hodel clamp down on Interior's Bureau of Reclamation? As Secretary, he will have to implement the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982 and require farmers to pay slightly more realistic amounts for Federal irrigation water.

Yet if Hodel cannot get Bonneville to pay up, will he do any better with the hundreds of water districts severely affected by the new law? Or will he seek like his predecessors, to enfeeble the law by eliminating the hammer clause, the single most important reform in the act? He was silent on this point during his confirmation hearings.

At the Department of the Interior he went along with the administration's disastrous policy of gutting Federal strip mining laws—a policy overturned in the courts—and initiated a so-called reorganization of this program, forcing out over 50 percent of its most experienced personnel. He participated with Watt in the scandal-plagued accelerated Federal coal lease sales that lost millions of dollars in revenue for the Federal Treasury.

Hodel was closely associated with Watt's massive offshore oil and gas leasing schemes which flooded the market, dramatically lowering both returns to the Government and the number of companies bidding on each tract. Even worse, less than half of the tracts to be leased received much environmental review causing many States and environmentalists to sue and block the program.

If we vote to confirm Mr. Hodel, we put him right back in charge of the same programs he made a mess of under Watt.

Has he changed his ways since he left Interior? Obviously the evidence points in the opposite direction.

I voted against Watt when President Reagan proposed him for this job—only 12 of us did—and I'm glad I did. Unfortunately, it is no fun being right when the price is seeing all my worst fears realized.

Do we really want to repeat this agony? Do we really need to worry if Mr. Hodel is giving away the store to every developer who wants to despoil our resources—and at bargain basement prices?

Can we spare the time to second-guess every personnel decision, every regulation, every policy to ensure that there is something to leave future generations?

The Interior Secretary's job is too important for all this guesswork. Secretary Watt was an intelligent, competent, experienced appointee when he became Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Don Hodel will be the same. But Watt was a walking catastrophe as Secretary of the Interior. Does anyone doubt that Secretary Hodel will carry on those same destructive Watt policies? Sure, that is what the President wants and the Senate is about to give him his wish. But not with this Senator's vote.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I know of no other Senators who wish to speak on this issue, but while attempting to ascertain that question, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I know of no request on this side of the aisle for time to speak on these nominations. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I know of no other speakers who wish to be heard at this time. I would ask the Senator from Louisiana if he knows of any others.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, we need about 2 minutes to check on one Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

VOTE ON NOMINATION OF JOHN S. HERRINGTON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is: Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of John S. Herrington of California to be Secretary of Energy. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST], the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN] would each vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] is necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] would each vote "aye."

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. BOSCHWITZ]. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 93, nays 1, as follows:

ABRAHAM KAHIKINA AKAKA: APOSTLE OF ALOHA TO THE WORLD

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, from the wellspring of human regard, custom compels us to salute Members of this Chamber who leave our ranks by their own volition, the dictates of their electorate, or fate. We do so by paying verbal tribute to them on this floor. Similarly, editorialists appraise the careers, and honor the achievements, of these and other political leaders on their passing from the scene.

No less should be accorded those whose leadership is in the spiritual realm. Indeed, we recently observed a day honoring the memory of one such leader whose inspiring words and example propelled a historic movement in our country, that of the Reverend Martin Luther King of the civil rights crusade.

A beneficent Providence, in its bounty, has blessed my native State through the ministry of a similar great shepherd of the cloth. In the same mold, he too, has infused the people of his race with a vision of their dignity and heritage, while at the same time reaching out to everyone drawn to the Pacific paradise. Hawaii's foremost spiritual leader and America's leading Hawaiian preacher, he recently retired as pastor of the Aloha State's "mother church," Kawaiahao of Honolulu. I am referring, Mr. President, to the Reverend Abraham Kahikina Akaka, apostle of aloha to the world.

It is not an easy task to do justice to Reverend Akaka's achievements in a discussion in this forum. They are so compelling in their variety, so relevant to our times, so timeless in their example, and so bountiful in their generosity that they have instilled an unusual commitment in his flock and inspired countless people from far beyond our small island State. For an appreciation of his ministry, Mr. President, let me place his story in the setting in which it took shape.

Those who have read James Michener's historical novel, "Hawaii," or seen its film rendition, may recall how New England missionaries brought the gospel to what was at one time known as the Sandwich Isles, after the untimely death of one of their divinity students, a Hawaiian youth named Henry Opukahaia, whose ambition had been to convert the people of his Pacific homeland to Christianity. These missionaries first arrived in 1820 and began a settlement on the Honolulu plain at Kawaiahao; hence their mission became the mother church of the Christian faith in Hawaii. So many members of the Hawaiian monarchy worshipped there it came to be regarded as the Westminster Abbey of the kingdom.

From Michener's fictional work also, one may gain some appreciation of how shattering it was to Hawaiian civilization to be drawn into the orbit of an outer world—a tide of change with a profound undertow that nearly decimated both the native population and the institutions of its society. The alien concept of private, individual ownership was introduced to people who viewed land tenure as something fluid, a stewardship of political leadership for the good of all. Only the uses of land had been subject to rigid controls up till then, "kapus" or legal restrictions premised on sound ecology and enhanced by the religious reverence accorded the Earth and its works.

This was the heritage bequeathed to Abraham Akaka, born in 1917 in Honolulu, where he attended Pauoa and Kawananakoa neighborhood schools before experiencing the multiethnic society of McKinley High School in the early 1930's. In common with so many native Hawaiian youth, he was a proficient surfer and musician, especially accomplished as an ukulele player. He attended the University of Hawaii and then Illinois Wesleyan University in Bloomington, IL, where he graduated with a double major in sociology and music. From there he traveled to Amsterdam, Holland, as a delegate to the World Conference of Christian Youth in 1939, and having experienced the wider world beyond his native shores, he returned home to become a youth-worker apprentice at Kawaiahao Church.

Later he returned to the mainland to attend the Chicago Theological Seminary, where, in Opukahaia's footsteps, he became, in 1943, the first Hawaiian to complete such training and gain a divinity degree. He was ordained the following year at Waimea Church on my own native island of Kauai.

There he served in various parishes and later moved to the island of Maui and then to Hilo on the big island of Hawaii, where he served as pastor of Haili Church, whose choir he led to world renown. In 1957, he was selected to become the eighth pastor of Kawaiahao Church, then in its 137th year. By then he had gained great standing among Hawaii's clergy and his fame as a preacher had begun attracting countless tourists to his Sunday sermons.

As the last chaplain of Hawaii's Territorial Senate and the first chaplain of Hawaii's State Senate during 1959, Reverend Akaka was asked to give a statehood address at formal services of dedication of the State of Hawaii, held at his church, where Christian missionaries had preached their first sermon in Hawaii, where the royalty and governors had repaired after assuming the responsibilities of state, and where so many island people had prayed and sought encouragement in times of emergency and strife. His memorable address, "Aloha Ke Akua"—"God is Love"—struck such a responsive cord in expressing the emotions and thoughts passing though the hearts and minds of Hawaii's people that he was besieged by thousands for written copies of his remarks; more than 30,000 copies have been printed since then to fulfill continual requests from all over the world.

Reverend Akaka continued to gain increasing national recognition: He was selected as a Danfath Deminar scholar at Harvard University's Graduate School of Business in 1959, received a doctorate of humane letters from West Virginia's Salem College the same year, and in 1960 was chosen to give the Auburn Theological Seminary lectures at the synod of New York, United Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, at Hamilton College. Also in 1960, he was chosen to officiate at a special service of recognition by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to honor Henry Opukahaia at his gravesite in Cornwall, CT, at the board's sesquecentennial celebration. In 1962, he received the David Malo Award, named in honor of one of Hawaii's most distinguished citizens of the last century, was named Citizen of the year by the Civitan Clubs of Hawaii, and became the subject of a Saturday Evening Post feature story. In his ministry Reverend Akaka had reached out to the community at large through dedications at commencement events for commercial and industrial enterprises, where he spoke eloquently on the spiritual aspects of vocational and business endeavors, displacing reliance on the "kahuna"—Native Hawaiian priest—practices of the past.

Reverend Akaka's special ministry, however, remained the Hawaiian people. In 1962, he was instrumental in forming the Council of Hawaiian Organizations, a coalition to combat perceived threats to the native Hawaiians, and their resources, and to plan for their future. In this capacity, he gained a reputation for political action by leading a night march around Iolani Palace protesting land reform legislation considered detrimental to the estate of Bernice Pauahi Bishop, which supports the Kamehameha Schools for Hawaiian children. One of his initiatives was Operation Hawaiian Uplift, a goal setting project for the Hawaiian people, which triggered what has come to be called the Hawaiian renaissance, a Hawaiian cultural resurgence comparable to the national black pride movement.

Other achievements followed; among them: Service as a University of Hawaii regent, an honorary doctor of laws and letters from his Illinois Wesleyan alma mater, and invitations to give the 1964 Easter sunrise service at Hollywood Bowl and keynote the 1967 Kiwanis International Conference at Houston, TX. In 1968, he organized the Friends of Kamehameha Schools organization.

In 1970, he preached a sermon of thanksgiving for the safe return of the Apollo 13 astronauts at a service at his church attended by President and Mrs. Nixon, who invited him to preach at the White House the following year. On September 15, 1977, Reverend Akaka was accorded the historic distinction of being the first and only member of the clergy to offer the opening prayer on the same day in both Chambers of the U.S. Congress. It was my great privilege to introduce him to my colleagues in the Senate. In 1976, he presented the invocation at the convening of the Republican National Convention. He has served on the executive council of the United Church of Christ in America and has been named a living treasure of Hawaii by the Honpa Hongwanji Mission of Hawaii. He is the recipient of honorary doctorates in the humanities from the University of the Pacific at Stockton, CA, and the University of Hawaii at Manoa. He was even chosen Honolulu's father of the year in religion in 1958, for he and his charming wife, Mary Louise, a native of Denver, CO, have reared five wonderful children, and enjoy the company of three grandchildren.

Mr. President, Reverend Akaka's has been a distinguished ministry, a ministry especially for the people of Hawaii, healing the wounded spirit of native Hawaiians, and conveying Hawaii's message of aloha to visitors from the mainland United States and throughout the world.

So that my colleagues and readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may appreciate the qualities of this remarkable man of the cloth in articulating the feelings, hopes, and aspirations of all the people of Hawaii on the attainment of our full partnership in the Union of States 26 years ago, I will ask unanimous consent to enter into the RECORD Reverend Akaka's famous statehood address.

Personally, I feel most fortunate to be able to say that he has been a dear and guiding friend to me for the major part of my life, for Rev. Abraham Kahikina Akaka has truly established himself as the apostle of aloha to the world. I take this means to congratulate him on his retirement as pastor of Kawaihao, Hawaii's Mother Church, and wish him and Mrs. Akaka many deserved years of health and happiness together.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement made by Rev. Abraham Kahikina Akaka, entitled "Aloha Ke Akua," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALOHA KE AKUA

(Rev. Abraham Kahikina Akaka)

"One nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all"—these words have a fuller meaning for us this morning in Hawaii. And we have gathered here at Kawaiahao Church to give thanks to God, and to pray for his guidance and protection in the years ahead.

Our newspapers lately have been full of much valuable historical data concerning Hawaii's development, growth, and aspirations. I will keep these stories as long as I live, for my children and their children, for they call to mind the long train of those whose sacrifices were accepted, whose prayers and hopes through the years were fulfilled yesterday. There yet remains the formal expression of our people for statehood, and the entrance of our Islands into the Union as a full-fledged member.

I would like today to speak the message of self-affirmation: that we take courage to be what we truly are, the Aloha State.

On April 25, 1820, one hundred and thirty-nine years ago, the first Christian service conducted in Honolulu was held on this very ground. Like our Pilgrim Fathers who arrived at Plymouth, Massachusetts, in 1620, so did the fathers of a new era in Hawaii kneel in prayer after a long and trying voyage to give thanks to God who had seen them safely on their way.

Gathered around the Reverend Hiram Bingham on that day were a few of our "kupunas" who had come out of curiosity. The text of the sermon that day, though it was April and near Easter time, was from the Christmas Story. And there our people heard these words for the first time: "Mai maka'u 'oukou, no ka mea, eia ho'i, ke ha'i aku nei au ia 'oukou i ka mea maika'i, e 'oli'oli nui ai e lilo ana no na kanaka apau. No ka mea, i keia la i hanau ai, ma ke kulanakauhale o Davida, he ola no 'oukou, aia ka Mesia ka Haku"—"Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord."

Although our grandfathers did not realize fully then, the hopes and fears of all their years through the next century and more were to be met in the meaning and power of those words, for, from that beginning, a new Hawaii was born. For through those words, our missionaries and people following them under God became the greatest single influence in Hawaii's whole development—politically, economically, educationally, socially, religiously. Hawaii's real preparation for statehood can be said to have truly begun on that day and on this spot one hundred and thirty-nine years ago.

Yesterday, when the first sound of firecrackers and sirens reached my ears, I was with the members of our Territorial Senate in the middle of the morning prayer for the day's session. How strange it was, and yet how fitting, that the news should burst forth while we were in prayer together. Things had moved so fast. Our mayor, a few minutes before, had asked if the church could be kept open, because he and others wanted to walk across the street for prayer when the news came. By the time I got back from the Senate, this sanctuary was well filled with people who happened to be around, people from our government buildings nearby. And as we sang the great hymns of Hawaii and our nation, it seemed that the very walls of this church spoke of God's dealing with Hawaii in the past, of great events both spontaneous and planned.

There are some of us to whom statehood brings great hopes, and there are some to whom statehood brings silent fears. One might say that the hopes and fears of Hawaii are met in statehood today. There are fears that Hawaii as a state will be motivated by economic greed; that statehood will turn Hawaii (as someone has said) into a great big spiritual junkyard filled with smashed dreams, worn-out illusions; that it will make the Hawaiian people lonely, confused, insecure, empty, anxious, restless, disillusioned—a wistful people.

There is an old "mele" that reminds me of such fears as these, and of the way God leads us out of our fears. "Haku'i i ka wahi o ka lua, pa i ka lani, ha'aha'a Hawai'i moku o Keawe i hanau'ia . . . po Puna, po Hilo, po i ka wahi o ku'u'aian . . . ola ia kina, ke 'a mai la ke ahi"—"There is a fire underground, but the firepit gives forth only smoke, smoke that burst upward, touching the skies, and Hawaii is humbled beneath its darkness . . . it is night over Hawaii, night from the smoke of my land . . . but there is salvation for the people, for now the land is being lit by a great flame."

We need to see statehood as the lifting of the clouds of smoke, as the opportunity to affirm positively the basic Gospel of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. We need to see that Hawaii has potential moral and spiritual contributions to make to our nation and to our world. The fears Hawaii may have are to be met by men and women who are living witnesses of what we really are in Hawaii, of the spirit of Aloha, men and women who can help unlock the doors to the future by the guidance and grace of God.

This kind of self-affirmation is the need of the hour. And we can affirm our being, as the Aloha State, by full participation in our nation and the world. For any collective anxiety, the answer is collective courage. And the ground of that courage is God.

We do not understand the meaning of Aloha until we realize its foundation in the power of God at work in the world. Since the coming of our missionaries in 1820, the name for God to our people has been Aloha. One of the first sentences I learned from my mother in my childhood was this from Holy Scripture: "Aloha ke Akua"—in other words, "God is Aloha." Aloha is the power God seeking to unite what is separated in the world—the power that unites heart with heart, soul with soul, life with life, culture with culture, race with race, nation with nation. Aloha is the power that can reunite when a quarrel has brought separation; aloha is the power that reunites a man with himself when he has become separated from the image of God within.

Thus, when a person or a people live in the spirit of Aloha they live in the spirit of God. And among such people, whose lives so affirm their inner being, we see the working of the Scripture: "All things work together for good to them who love God . . . from the Aloha of God came his Son that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly."

Aloha consists of this new attitude of heart, above negativism, above legalism. It is the unconditional desire to promote the true good of other people in a friendly spirit, out of a sense of kinship. Aloha seeks to do good, with no conditions attached. We do not do good only to those who do good to us. One of the sweetest things about the love of God, about Aloha, is that it welcomes the stranger and seeks his good. A person who has the spirit of Aloha loves even when the love is not returned. And such is the love of God.

This is the meaning of Aloha. I feel especially grateful that the discovery and development of our Islands long ago was not couched in the context of an imperialistic and exploitive national power, but in this context of Aloha. There is a correlation between the charter under which the missionaries came—namely, "to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to cover these islands with productive green fields, and to lift the people to a high state of civilization"—a correlation between this and the fact that Hawaii is not one of the trouble spots in the world today but one of the spots of great hope. Aloha does not exploit a people or keep them in ignorance and subservience. Rather, it shares the sorrows and joys of people; it seeks to promote the true good of others.

Today, one of the deepest needs of mankind is the need to feel a sense of kinship one with another. Truly all mankind belongs together; from the beginning all mankind has been called into being, nourished, watched over by the love of God. So that the real Golden Rule is Aloha. This is the way of life we shall affirm.

Let us affirm ever what we really are—for Aloha is the spirit of God at work in you and in me and in the world, uniting what is separated, overcoming darkness and death, bringing new light and life to all who sit in the darkness of fear, guiding the feet of mankind into the way of peace.

Thus, may our becoming a State mean to our nation and the world, and may it reaffirm that which was planted in us one hundred and thirty-nine years ago: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

RECOGNITION OF AN AMERICAN SERVICEMAN

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I stand today to pay tribute to one of the many men who served his country in Vietnam. On November 8, 1984, Clyde A. Soule passed away at the age of 37 in the Veterans' Hospital in South Orange, NJ. Clyde, a lance corporal in the Marine Corps, was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. Clyde's family knew little of his ordeal or of the role he played in the lives of the men who served with him until after his death. In Clyde's personal belongings, a letter from one of Clyde's comrades was found which expressed the heroic role he played in Vietnam and the positive influence he had on those he served with. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD so that we can honor and remember not just Clyde, but all those servicemen and women who served our country so well.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIR: I am writing to you in the hopes of getting in contact with one of your former students. His name is Clyde A. Soule, Class of 1966. I had the honor of serving with him in the Marine Corps over in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968. I have written to his family address in Cliffside Park, and to his old friend in South Jersey, but have doubts if he received the message. See, he gave me three names to write to if he ever got killed, and the third is a teacher in your school by the name of Ralph Maresca (if he's no longer in your school, please send this letter to him). Clyde used to talk alot about him, so they must have been close.

Sir, if I tell you a little about Clyde, then maybe you'll understand how much he means to me and all the rest of the men he served with. The way he took care of his men, and time after time, risked his life to save others. He was always there when you needed him. He could tell when someone was near the breaking point; he would just talk to the guy and bring him back around. He always had an ear to listen, a shoulder to cry on, and even a big foot to kick your ass if you didn't follow orders. He had the respect of everyone, and even of many officers (many were jealous).

When I met him, we were running a three-man recon team, which is the most dangerous job. Later on, they made him a squad leader, and then Plt. Sgt. In September 1967, our company was hit so bad in the D.M.Z. we didn't know which way was up. Clyde was running around giving orders and trying to save the pieces when he was hit, and was seen being carried off by the N.V.A. When the word spread, it was like he became our battle cry. We held because we were so mad thinking that they would kill him slow. One or two days later, he came back to our lines with four other Marines, three of them alive. He did the impossible! If you saw what they did to him, he was cut up like a steak, pulled out some of his fingernails, burned him, he was just a mess. The Colonel was going to put him in for the Congressional Medal of Honor. When Clyde was told this, he told the Colonel, no, and would never accept it. In fact, he told the Colonel that he would go off to jail first before taking the medal. He was like that, he never wanted any medals. Only Clyde knows why.

Just before the battle for Khe Sahn, he was made the personal bodyguard of the Battalion Commander and did many special assignments. Clyde was seen a lot with men in civilian clothes. He still never forgot his friends even with all his power. He always came around when he could to see if he could help us in any way.

Sir, there is so much that I could write about him. I'm not trying to make him look like a John Wayne, but just show how special he was and is, that maybe you would take a little time and find him. He never once asked for anything. He always set the example, always steady and sure of himself. He never could show his emotions because he knew we all looked to him for strength. We could go to him with our problems and hurts, but he had no one. God, when I think of how alone he must have felt besides his physical pains. He gave so much of himself. He even left his bag of personal belongings behind so he could help carry wounded out of the Khe Sahn when his time was up.

When we said goodbye in Nam, he was like the walking dead, that's how sick and hurt he was. Last November, I was staying at the Salvation Army in Washington, D.C. I saw a car park nearby with New Jersey license plates and saw Clyde get out. At first, I couldn't believe it. I followed him to the city hall which is about a block away. I wanted to stop him so bad, but was ashamed of what I had become and the way I looked. Since that day I have not touched one drug or one drop of alcohol. That's seven months and I owe it to Clyde. Just seeing him brought back everything he ever tried to get in my head. He still has that walk of a man that's in charge.

So you see, sir, this person is still helping his men and he doesn't even know it. How can you ever begin to say thank you?

My address is ————. No, on second thought, I don't want him to help me. If you can find him, please tell him that with God's grace, I'll meet him on the Marine Corps' birthday by the Vietnam Memorial. There is so much I want to say to him, and to thank him. By November, it will be one year that I will be clean and my legal problems will be over. Then I will be on the right road.

I know that I can never repay him for everything that he has done, but the least I can do is say thank you and most of all, God bless you. You will never be forgotten.

Thank you, sir, for all of your help. Please help find him. Of all things, don't let his school forget him.

Sincerely,

—— ——.

THE ALABAMA MUSIC HALL OF FAME

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on January 17, 1985, I had the privilege of attending an outstanding first for my home State, the First Annual Alabama Music Hall of Fame Induction Banquet and Awards Show.

It has long been a point of pride for Alabamians to be able to claim a seemingly disproportionate share of America's outstanding musical performers. Our State can claim famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera, as well as famous artists ranging from jazz and blues to gospel and bluegrass. In addition, Muscle Shoals, just a stone's throw from my own home town of Tuscumbia, is known as the "Hit Recording Capitol of the World" and ranks at the very top of America's recording centers.

In recognition of the important role Alabama has played in the development of America's musical tradition, my State has founded the Alabama Music Hall of Fame. The Hall of Fame itself will be accompanied by the Alabama Music Library, a major educational resource center, an innovative 350-seat audiovisual auditorium for music events and lectures, a bookstore, record store, and a gift shop.

The programs of the Alabama Music Hall of Fame will not be restricted to recognition and reward of those who have come before, but will also be directed toward young people and the future of music throughout the State. Schoolchildren will tour the facility, and representatives of the museum will tour the State's schools presenting programs about Alabama's musical heritage. In addition, summer music camps for young people will feature musicians and industry professionals teaching about music and the commercial music business.

The recent banquet I attended was held to benefit the Alabama Music Hall of Fame Building Fund and the prestigious College Music Scholarship Program of the Junior Board/Birmingham Music Club. Of course, it also provided a showcase for the talents of such participants as Alabama, Hank Williams Jr., and the Commodores, I can personally testify that the evening, filled with these performances, along with awards to talented Alabamians of the past and present, was a tremendous success and totally enjoyable.

Mr. President, for a moment I would like to give my colleagues an idea of the broad base of talent coming from my home State by sharing the names of those who were presented with awards.

The "Lifework Award" in the performing division was presented to Hank Williams and Nat King Cole. In the performing division, this award went to the record producer and musician Buddy Killen.

The "Governor's Sustaining Achievement Awards for Popular Music" went to the Commodores and Tammy Wynette. The "John Herbert Orr Pioneer Award" went to Rick Hall of Muscle Shoals Fame Recording Studio.

The "Classical Performance Award" went to critically acclaimed classical flutist Ransom Wilson. The "America's Music Award," for achievement in jazz, blues, bluegrass, and gospel, was presented to Sun Ra. The "Musical Creator's Award" was presented to record producer and songwriter Billy Sherrill.

Mr. President, in my mind the outstanding calibre of these recipients is even more clearly illustrated when you look at the nominees who were not chosen to receive these awards. In this group, you find W.C. Handy, Tammy Wynette, Hank Williams, Jr., Dinah Washington, Jimmy Buffett, the Temptations, and countless others.

Like all Alabamians, I am very proud of the talented people produced by our home State. It was a great pleasure for me to attend the recent induction banquet and awards ceremony. I would like to congratulate all the winners, and, just as importantly, all the numerous people who have contributed to making the Alabama Music Hall of Fame a reality.

NARCO-TERRORISM

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise today to address an issue of extreme national and international concern. A situation exists where nations, their leaders, and their enforcement agents are being threatened. I want to state clearly and loudly that we will not be bullied by drug traffickers and international criminals. Narco-terrorism has once again reared its ugly countenance. We can no longer deny that these so-called Siamese twins of death and destruction are interrelated. Once again we have documented evidence.

In the testimony at a hearing I conducted as chairman of the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, a former Nicaraguan diplomat told the subcommittee of a pact, code named "Morality of Death," This blood pact, was drawn up between Umberto Ortega, the Defense Minister of Nicaragua and Raul Castro, the Defense Minister of Cuba. This pact was designed to trade the dirty money gained from aiding drug traffickers to buy guns for terrorists.

Some denied the link we proved. Others responded by calling the evidence "right-wing paranoia."

Now we have further, irrefutable proof. This past Friday night, NBC television aired footage taken by a Colombian TV crew. The film showed Carlos Leder, the most notorious cocaine trafficker in Colombia.

He was once a respected citizen. He was once elected to a position in the Colombian Government. Today, he is a fugitive. That is all thanks to the courageous crackdown of President Belisario Betancur.

This brazen fugitive, Carlos Leder, stated on TV film, that he is working with the FARC and the M-19, leftists rebels bent on overthrowing the legitimate Government of Colombia. These criminals shot in cold blood Colombia's brave, tough Minister of Justice, Lara Bonilla last year and now threaten to destroy the nation itself. President Betancur will not be destroyed. He has instituted a strict crackdown on drug traffickers. And in a surprisingly short time Colombia's drug enforcement agents have seized more than 34,000 kilos of cocaine. They have destroyed 156 processing labs. They have wiped out 41 million acres of coca fields.

They have also seized 6 million kilos of marijuana and destroyed 29 million acres of marijuana in the fields of Colombia. We in the Senate must let President Betancur know that we recognize his valiant stand against these monstrous criminals and that we have the utmost admiration and support for his work. We must pledge our full support and ask for the President's continued vigilance against this menace fueled by Carlos Leder's snow-white blood money.

It comes as no surprise that terrorists and drug dealers would join in this type of vicious marriage of convenience. Both drugs and terror are tools of disorder—mass murder and mass confusion.

We are making strides against both. Secretary of State Shultz has told us of the administration's new policy to strike back against terrorism. And the outcome of the Western Hemisphere Conference on Narcotics Control, which I conducted last week in this Capitol shows a new determination on the part of justice officials throughout the Americas and the Caribbean to move swiftly and surely against this insidious drug traffic which threatens to strangle us all.

But every action has an equal and opposite reaction. Our strength and resolve on these two vital fronts has also strengthened the resolve of the narco-terrorists. We see more and more brutal evidence every day.

Now we have reports that the narco-terrorists are looking to come to the source, just as we have done. Latest news reports tell us that a South American hit-squad has entered the United States and is bent on capturing and torturing agents of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and their supporters. The narco-terrorists have done this before. But always in Colombia. Never here in the United States.

A wounded animal will always strike back. Apparently, these horrors indicate that the narco-terrorists are on the run. Striking in last-minute desperation. These actions only tell us not to let up one iota in our resolve to crush these parasites.

I stand before the U.S. Senate today to proclaim that we will not be intimidated. We will not give up one inch of ground gained from the narco-terrorist. We will not take one step backward, nor will we break cadence in our efforts to stop these international drug murderers.

I once again commend the courageous work of the U.S. law enforcement family, our Ambassadors, and Colombia's President Belesario Betancur. As well as the Presidents of other countries who are working to eradicate this evil crop from the Earth. If we continue to be a partner in this work, refuse to knuckle under to these common criminals, if we refuse to bend, if we continue to fight, to eradicate, to educate and to enforce laws, this menace will begin to fade.

JACK ANDERSON'S ASTRONAUT-COSMONAUT PLAN DESERVES FULL SUPPORT

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a truly inspirational and futuristic column by Jack Anderson appearing in today's Washington Post. The column is on a theme that has been of particular interest to many Members of the Congress—U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation. Last session, both Houses of Congress passed unanimously, and the President signed into law, a resolution I introduced calling for renewal of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation agreement that was allowed to lapse in 1982. This session, with hopes for a similar favorable outcome, I have introduced a resolution calling for greater international cooperation in exploration of the planet Mars, beginning with the coordination of scientific missions scheduled by the U.S.S.R. for 1988 and United States for 1990.

Mr. Anderson has added a new dimension to the East-West space cooperation theme—a generational dimension, as it were. Mr. Anderson has been a leading supporter for the excellently-conceived Young Astronauts Program, along with many other distinguished public figures, including President Reagan. Now, with President Reagan's approval, he has taken the concept, a most imaginative step, further by proposing that our young astronauts establish ties with young people in the Soviet Union who share their aspirations—young cosmonauts, as Mr. Anderson calls them. In an ingenious, and successful, initiative in personal diplomacy, Mr. Anderson's daughter Tanya personally carried such a proposal to Moscow last month, and obtained a positive response. It appears that Young Cosmonauts may soon be touring our space facilities, under a reciprocal arrangement. "From this small beginning," Mr. Anderson wrote Chairman Chernenko, "I look forward to the day that our astronauts and your cosmonauts will explore the vast cosmos together."

Mr. President, Jack Anderson's initiative deserves the applause and support of all those who recognize the extraordinary potential space holds for guiding human civilization into a new, transcendent age of exploration, discovery and harmony in peaceful pursuit of common goals. It won't happen overnight. But it will not ever happen unless we begin to try. Mr. Anderson's "small beginning" is a product of a very large vision. As a citizen, as well as a Senator, I commend him for his inspiring efforts.

Mr. President, for the benefit of my colleagues who may have missed reading Mr. Anderson's column, I ask unanimous consent to have the column printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S.-SOVIET SPACE COOPERATION PUSHED

In a move that could lead to better Soviet-American relations, President Reagan and Chairman Konstantin U. Chernenko have approved the idea of establishing ties between America's Young Astronauts and Russia's Young Cosmonauts.

This raises new hope that by exchanging visits and sharing dreams, Young Astronauts and Young Cosmonauts might lead the way to peaceful cooperation in space.

In behalf of the Young Astronaut Council, I wrote a letter to Chernenko proposing the affiliation. I pleaded that we are passengers together on a great spaceship called Earth, which cannot be broken into pieces, with the Soviet Union and the United States assigned separate orbits. The letter was hand-carried to Moscow last month by my daughter Tanya.

Two weeks later, the Soviet Embassy called to report that Chernenko had read the letter and that his response was "positive." Then the Soviet diplomat inquired cordially, "Did Tanya enjoy her visit to the Soviet Union?"

I said she had a glorious time and had come home favorably impressed. "Too bad she doesn't write the column," retorted the Russian, with a chuckle.

What are the next steps?

First, I have invited the Young Cosmonauts, with White House approval, to send a delegation to watch a space launching and tour our space facilities. "From this small beginning," I wrote, "I look forward to the day that our astronauts and your cosmonauts will explore the vast cosmos together. We are merely scratching the surface of knowledge so profound, so illimitable, so beyond our present understanding that we should waste no time nor energy on petty disputes."

Second, each Young Astronaut will be encouraged to write a letter to a Young Cosmonaut, explaining why they should become friends and what they might hope to accomplish together in space. Those who write the best letters will be selected for future exchanges, all expenses paid. Other exciting prizes will be offered.

Third, the International Aeronautical Federation has adopted the Young Astronaut program as the best way to achieve "peace through space." Under the federation's auspices, the Young Astronaut program will be offered to other nations and ties will be sought between Young Astronauts and Young Cosmonauts around the world.

Every generation, if it is to fulfill itself, needs a dream to inspire it, an adventure to ennoble it. Seldom have young people had the incentive that space now offers.

For half a millennium, the spirit of maximum adventure has awaited new Columbuses and Magellans. Now, for our children, it is at hand and on a scale far more vast.

Footnote: The Young Astronaut Council is recruiting 6-to-16-year-olds for future space exploration. All who sign up will be eligible to participate in the "Letter to a Young Cosmonaut" contest. For particulars, write to the Young Astronauts, 1015 16th Street NW., Suite 905, Washington, D.C. 20005.

CHILD ABUSE

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, the issue of child abuse has exploded into public view during the past several years. One needs only to read the newspapers or to watch television news to realize that child abuse is a problem of immense proportions. The Senate Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, which I chaired, held a hearing last year on child abuse, when the prevention and treatment of child abuse was discussed in depth. Witnesses at the hearing commented on the need for increased attention to the problem, and the Congress responded. On October 9, President Reagan signed into law H.R. 1904, the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984. I am proud to have introduced the Senate version of that bill, and to have worked with other Senators and Congressmen to push the bill through to enactment. The bill provides for increased resources for the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect to devote to the indentification, prevention and treatment of child abuse.

I am proud that my home State of Alabama has taken a leadership role in addressing the tragedy of child abuse. To summarize the approach being taken through the State legislature, judiciary, and executive branches, I ask unanimous consent that three articles which appeared in the January 1985 edition of the Alabama Lawyer be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

I commend the leadership of Alabama for moving the problem of child abuse to the forefront. I hope that the successes experienced by the State of Alabama can be reproduced in other areas of the country.

There being no objection, the articles was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREVENTION: A NEW LEGISLATIVE APPROACH

(By Senator Gary Aldridge)

Child abuse legislation has been commonplace in Alabama over the past two decades. The focus primarily has been on mandatory reporting legislation and defining appropriate criminal laws. Recently, however, the Alabama Legislature embarked on an innovative approach to the maltreatment of children—PREVENTION. Adoption of The Children's Trust Fund and the Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Act (together designated "The Martin-Aldridge Act") is a significant statement of public policy for the protection of Alabama's children. Alabama has distinguished itself as a leader in the search for solutions to the most alarming societal problem in America.

In the 1983 Regular Session, two companion pieces of legislation were enacted to provide a tandem vehicle for the development of preventive programs. Act No. 83-735 establishes the funding mechanism for the creation of preventive programs by establishing The Children's Trust Fund. This fund is administered by the Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Board, which is given broad implementation powers for establishing preventive programs by Act No. 83-736. The combined purposes the two acts are to provide for the planned establishment of local councils and prevention programs and to insure the necessary funding for these programs. This article will first discuss The Children's Trust Fund legislation and then purview the Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Act.

THE CHILDREN'S TRUST FUND

The Children's Trust Fund was created at a time when Alabama was in a grave financial posture. Revenue raising measures were being passed to allow the state to meet its most essential services. Clearly the revenues were not available to undertake a new program, irrespective of the need and merit of that program. Hence, the trust fund was established in a creative and innovative manner; it is funded from a voluntary check-off on the state income tax return. Beginning with the 1983 tax year, the Alabama taxpayer may designate $2 on an individual return and $4 on a joint return to be credited to The Children's Trust Fund. No state revenue will be used in the program.

The trust fund legislation targets ultimate accumulation of $10,000,000. Preventive programs will be funded from the earnings of the trust fund, with the principal remaining intact. However, until the $10,000,000 target is achieved, no more than 50 percent of the amount of the fund can be used for administrative expenses and funding of preventive programs.

The language of the trust fund act is sufficiently broad to allow the Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Board considerable leeway in developing programs in conjunction with the local councils. Essentially, the funds are to be used to provide education and information; to create public awareness regarding child abuse and neglect; to encourage professional persons and groups to recognize and deal with abuse and neglect; and to encourage the development of community preventive programs.

CHILD ABUSE AND PREVENTION ACT

Act No. 83-736 establishes the state Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Board as an autonomous agency of state government. The act provides that the commissioner of the state Department of Pensions and Security, the state mental health officer, the state health officer, the state superintendent of education and the director of public safety or their designees shall serve on the board. In addition, the governor is empowered to appoint one public member from each congressional district and two members from the state-at-large. From this group of public board members, the governor is entitled to appoint a chairperson.

The board is required to develop a state plan for the distribution of the funds in The Children's Trust Fund. The act provides that the plan shall assure equal opportunity for the establishment of preventive programs in all geographic areas of the state. The board is further required to coordinate the establishment of local councils and prevention programs.

The act contemplates that local councils shall have the primary purpose for the development and facilitation of a collaborative community prevention program. A local council seeking fund from the state board must demonstrate an ability "to provide prevention program models and consultation organizations and communities regarding prevention program development and maintenance." In addition, the local council must provide matching funds or in-kind services of 50 percent of the amount of the trust fund money received. The local councils are provided the incentive and guidance to develop and implement preventive programs suitable for their geographic areas.

Examples of the preventive programs envisoned by the legislation have been developed and implemented by Parents and Children Together, Inc. [PACT] of Decatur, Alabama. PACT was established in 1978 and now utilizes more than 200 volunteers in implementing a series of preventive and treatment programs. Its three-tier school program is recognized as a national model. Third grade students receive classes on the prevention of sexual abuse. Fifth grade students are instructed on problem solving and handling peer pressure. A seventh grade program focuses on adolescent pregnancy prevention along with classes designed to promote interfamily relationships.

In addition to the instructional programs at the elementary and middle school level, PACT provides parenting classes for parents who have been identified as high-risk parents. Prenatal classes instruct the mother-to-be on labor, delivery and child development. Every new mother in Morgan County receives a visit from a PACT volunteer and is given information on child development. Recently, PACT initiated a program for children who take care of themselves because of working parents, emphasizing safety and instruction on self care. Also, PACT serves as a clearinghouse on all types of information relating to abuse, neglect and sexual exploitation of children.

PACT serves as a model for the local councils to be established under the Martin-Aldridge Act. With the ever-increasing attention being given to child abuse and neglect, emphasis on preventive programs will increase. Alabama has made great strides by passage of legislation that encourages and funds preventive programs at the local level.

CONCLUSION

As a matter of policy, Alabama now recognizes the need for a preventive approach to child abuse and neglect. The Children's Trust Fund Act and the Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Act provide the funding and the structure to establish a network of local preventive programs, but much remains to be done. Public awareness of the check-off contribution is indispensable. Alabama has the opportunity to become a leader in effectively addressing a problem proving to be more widespread than previously imagined.

CHILD ABUSE AND THE JUVENILE COURTS

(By Judge Sandra H. Ross)

The news that Alabamians are abusing and neglecting their children in record numbers has become hard to ignore. In Alabama, during fiscal year 1984, the Alabama Department of Pensions and Security [DPS] received 28,407 child abuse reports, a number approximately twenty percent higher than that reported in 1983.

Society currently is addressing the child abuse issue from the four perspectives of prevention, treatment of families, protection of children and prosecution of abusers. Of the four, the protection of children and the prosecution of their abusers most concern the attorneys and judges of this state.

While the inherent problems of the successful prosecution of child abusers are drawing considerable public attention, it is nevertheless a fact that a relatively small number of reported child abuse cases are suitable for prosecution in the adult criminal justice system. In the meantime, the juvenile courts of Alabama are addressing the problems of the children and family members in every abuse case deemed appropriate for any degree of court intervention. The caseloads of the juvenile courts have become heavier with the increase in reported abuse. Many attorneys, often court-appointed and without experience in dealing with the juvenile system and families in general, are entering the field. There is a need for Alabama attorneys to become more familiar with the unique procedure and law of the juvenile court system.

Pursuant to § 12-15-30(1) Ala. Code 1975, the juvenile courts of Alabama have exclusive original jurisdiction over proceedings involving dependent children, those who are abused, neglected or in other ways dependent upon the state for their care or supervision.

Once an abuse report is made to DPS, through mandatory reporting as required by § 26-14-1 Ala. Code 1975, or by any other means, the agency is required to investigate to determine if court intervention is necessary. If it is determined the welfare of the child requires the court to be involved, then a complaint is filed with the court's juvenile intake officer who, in turn, may file a petition alleging the child in question is dependent and in need of the care or supervision of the court. This petition may be signed by anyone having knowledge of the facts, but is often signed by a representative of DPS, thereby making that agency a party to the case. After the petition is filed, the intake officer must issue a summons to the child to appear, if he or she is 12 or more years of age, and to the parents, guardian or custodian of the child. The summons must be served on a party at least 24 hours before a hearing, but the inability to serve does not deprive the court of the right to proceed. Rule 13, Alabama Rules of Juvenile Procedure.

At the time the petition is filed, the juvenile judge may issue a protective pick-up order for the child without notice to the parties, if it is determined from the available information the child should be immediately removed from his environment. This pick-up order may be endorsed on the summons or may be entered by separate order before service of the summons. If a child is removed from his residence and placed in the custody of DPS prior to a hearing, then the court must conduct a shelter care hearing within 72 hours of the child's removal, weekends and holidays included, to determine if continued care is required. § 12-15-60(a). Parents, guardians or custodians must be notified of the date, time and place of the hearing, as well as of their right to counsel. If parents are found to be indigent, the court then must appoint counsel to represent them at this and all stages of the proceedings. The court also must appoint an attorney to serve as guardian ad litem for the child. § 12-15-63(b). All relevant evidence is admissible at a shelter care hearing whether or not competent at a hearing on the merits of the petition. § 12-15-60(d).

The law strongly favors the release of children to their parents and directs courts to return them unless one of the following situations is proved by clear and convincing evidence at the shelter care hearing:

(1) The child has no suitable parent, guardian or other suitable person able and willing to provide supervision and care for the child, or

(2) The release of the child would present a serious threat of substantial harm to such child. § 12-15-59.

From the time of the first report to DPS of abuse or neglect until such time as they are relieved of supervision in a case, the agency is charged with investigation of the allegations before the court and with supervision of the parties to determine if court-ordered treatment is being followed. Attorneys representing parents and children should recognize the findings and recommendations of the DPS caseworkers are critical in many cases as they provide for the court an impartial picture of the child's circumstances. DPS predisposition reports are admissible at shelter care hearings and, pursuant to § 12-15-69(a), the court may direct such a study and report be made for use at a hearing on the merits of the petition.

Juvenile dependency hearings are conducted in two phases, the first being a hearing on the allegations of the petition and the second being dispositional in nature once the court has found a child to be dependent and in need of the care of the court. At the trial of the merits, the allegations must be proved by clear and convincing evidence, competent and material and relevant in nature. § 12-15-65(e). This burden seems to preclude admission of predispositional studies at the hearing on the merits of hearsay gounds unless one of the following exceptions applies:

(1) The reports were prepared at the direction of the trial court;

(2) The author of the report is available at the hearing for purposes of cross-examination; or

(3) There is testimony presented in court corroborating the information in the reports. Hamilton v. State, 410 So.2d 64 (Ala. Civ.App. 1982).

If a child is found to be dependent, a second hearing is held to determine disposition of the case. At the disposition hearing, all relevant and material evidence helpful in determining the question presented, including oral and written reports, may be received into evidence even though not competent at a hearing on the petition. In Kelly v. State Department of Pensions and Security, 366 So.2d 736 (Ala. Civ. App. 1979), the court stated hearsay in DPS reports is admissible at a disposition hearing, noting in that case all reports were furnished to opposing counsel in advance of the hearing and the author of the report was present in court.

After hearing all pertinent evidence at disposition, the court may order one of the following alternatives for the child as set out in § 12-15-71:

(1) The child remain with parents, guardian or custodian subject to certain terms such as a requirement that the family enter counseling or attend parent effectiveness classes;

(2) The child remain with parents, guardian or custodian under protective supervision of court probation staff or of DPS; or

(3) Legal custody of the child be transferred to DPS or other local public child-placing agency or private organization licensed by DPS, or to a relative or other person recommended by DPS as being fit and proper.

All of the above listed alternatives require court review, which means a dependency case may involve attorneys and parties for months or even years. For instance, if the court transfers temporary custody of a child to DPS, then that child generally is placed in foster care until he can be reunited with his family or until parental rights are terminated and the child placed for adoption. In Alabama, the average length of stay for a child in foster care is now 2.3 years, and administrative rules of DPS and recommended court policy require court review of children in placement at least every 6 months.

Appeals from juvenile court orders, whether entered by district or circuit court judges, are made to the court of civil appeals and written notice of appeal must be filed within fourteen days of the entry of the order, judgment or decree. Rule 28, Alabama Rules of Juvenile Procedure. Attorneys should note Rule 20 requires the court to keep a complete record of all testimony by stenographic reporting or by mechanical device, such as recorders, which may be used for purpose of appeal.

In conclusion, each child abuse case reported and brought to the juvenile court for intervention may require as many as three or more attorneys before final disposition. As the number of dependency cases grows, so does the need for attorneys who are familiar with the law and procedure applicable to juvenile courts and who have adequate skills in dealing with children, parents and mental health professionals in order to solve complex family problems. The greatest contribution the legal system can make in the area of child abuse is to provide competent legal representatives for the parties involved. The quality of representation in a dependency case may often be determinative of the quality of life of the child whose best interests the courts are dedicated to serve.

THE DA AS A MOBILIZER

(By District Attorney Robert E. Cramer, Jr.)

Our nation currently is experiencing an "epidemic" number of reports of child sexual abuse, studies (which vary) indicate one in ten men and one in five women have been sexually abused as children. It is accepted widely the reported cases reflect only a fraction of the actual number of cases.

Few communities have child sexual abuse "intervention" programs. Cases of child sexual abuse are reported to child protective service agencies, law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, therapists, physicians, ministers, and counselors. Physicians, ministers and counselors. Physicians, nurses, teachers and other professionals coming into contact with children who may have been abused are confused about the process for reporting and the follow-up on reported cases of child sexual abuse. Consistent agency action and interagency referral have been hampered by the fact agencies and professionals often do not communicate, much less cooperate, in their efforts to provide service for victims of child sexual abuse. Many agencies see themselves in role conflicts with other agencies. For example, a Department of Pensions and Security protective service worker may be interested in reuniting a female incest victim with her family, while a prosecutor may want to file criminal charges against her father. As a result, without effective coordinated help, many children continue to be abused, having the quality of their entire lives affected, suffering lasting emotional injury and sometimes becoming abusers themselves.

The following scenario for child sexual abuse investigation is probably enacted on a daily basis in every state in the United States.

A child confides to some trusted person outside the family (perhaps a teacher) he or she is being sexually abused by a parent. The teacher reports the case of the County Department of Pensions and Security protective service worker or to law enforcement. The child is interviewed by each agency. An intake worker from the local child protective service agency visits the home and confronts the parent with the child's complaint of sexual abuse. A law enforcement representative and/or protective service worker will interview the offender and any other witnesses. The child protective service workers normally will refer the child to a physician for a medical exam and will likely recommend a therapist for the child and family. This, of course, requires the child and family to endure additional interviews.

Police and child protective service investigators find it difficult or virtually impossible to obtain comprehensive medical and psychological evaluations for victims, perpetrators and their families. Treatment resources are limited. Often, the protective service worker will seek a court petition to change custody of the child-victim. This involves the child as a potential witness in this custody petition and will require an attorney to be appointed to represent the child (guardian ad litem). Again, the child and family have to interact with additional "strangers" to be interviewed concerning the reported child sexual abuse.

Needless to say, not many children and families can "survive" the process in the outlined scenario. Add to that the fact that members of the disciplines involved lack basic understanding about the phenomenon of child sexual abuse and refuse to accept responsibility to increase their knowledge or skills. Without a coordinated community agency approach to reported cases of child sexual abuse, many offenders will escape proper scrutiny because the victims are not able to survive the system. Consequently, the community must unite and react together in these cases.

In Madison County, Alabama, reports of child sexual abuse began to increase rapidly in 1981. When elected district attorney in 1981, I had established a system to review reported cases of child abuse for possible criminal prosecution. Between the years 1973 and 1975, I was an assistant district attorney and was assigned to Juvenile Court. As a consequence, I was required to work with representatives from the Madison County Department of Pensions and Security protective service workers who were involved in removing children from parents because of child abuse and neglect. Because of this experience, when elected district attorney, I set up review meetings with DPS protective service workers. Every month, representatives from my office met with the protective service workers to review specific cases of child abuse. At these sessions, we were able to advise the protective service workers about courtroom testimony, the elements of criminal offenses, proper documentation and when to refer to law enforcement.

During 1981, we began reviewing child sexual abuse cases. Suddenly, we were faced with an overwhelming increase of such cases. After a year, we found 25-40 percent of the abuse cases reviewed involved child sexual abuse. Alarmingly, over the next few years, most of the abuse reviewed was child sexual abuse. Law enforcement was added to this team review in 1983. Also in 1983, the team review sessions were increased and now are conducted twice monthly. Presently, during our review sessions, the team decides whether a case is to be referred for criminal prosecution, for therapy or for further development and follow-up review. Specialized forms are used for this review allowing each agency to detail all follow-up procedures.

As a parallel to the prosecution/DPS/law enforcement team review, our community formed a Child Sexual Abuse Task Force in 1983. Because of the alarming number of child sexual abuse cases reviewed at the team review meetings, we felt a need to alert and inform other professionals and agency representatives about what was occurring in their community. Representatives from DPS and my office appeared before our county child abuse prevention coalition called SCAN [Stop Child Abuse and Neglect] which had existed in the community for almost ten years. We informed the SCAN board of directors of the alarming number of child sexual abuse cases in the community. We cited the need for other professional involvement particularly from the treatment and medical communities. We also emphasized many others, such as teachers, nurses, daycare workers and private schools, will be exposed to more and more cases of child sexual abuse. This would require additional community education programs to teach them about the subject matter. Together, we formed the Child Sexual Abuse Task Force.

The task force included representatives from medical, treatment, nursing, education, prosecution, protective service and law enforcement facilities, and daycare and community agency representatives and volunteers. The task force met at least twice a month and initially was broken down into subcommittees that included: treatment, intervention, identification and prevention. Each subcommittee came up with different goals and recommendations. For instance, the Intervention Subcommittee developed as its goals a manual on child sexual abuse to be distributed to teachers, nurses and others, and a proposed symposium or workshop on child sexual abuse.

The primary importance of the task force was to bring agency representatives together to discuss a problem they had in common. Most agencies and representatives in the task force had "hands-on" involvement in reported cases of child sexual abuse. However, many did not know one another. The DPS protective service workers often were referring children and families to therapy without knowledge of the philosophy of the treatment therapist. Many agencies were unfamiliar with the process of criminal prosecution and were reluctant to report cases for criminal prosecution because of the effect such would have on the family. The task force meetings and projects allowed professionals to discuss their common problems with one another. It brought the professional community closer together and closed many loopholes previously existing. However, there were many awkward moments as the task force developed. At certain times, the task force ended up taking positions conflicting with agency policies. Some participants felt "threatened" by policy and goal development of the task force, but the agencies most affected by the processes involved in reported cases of child sexual abuse continued to work together in the task force.

In August 1984, the Intervention Committee of the task force proposed a program for the community called the Children's Advocacy Center. During the August meeting of the task force, I narrated a "reenactment" of an actual case of child sexual abuse. This case involved a 12-year-old girl who had disclosed to her grandmother she had been sexually abused by her stepfather and father for as long as she could remember. The grandmother sat up all night with the child and heard the "dreaded" story. The following day the grandmother went to the police department and thereafter was "bounced" from agency to agency. The child was interviewed by the police department, DPS protective service and emergency room hospital personnel. She was referred to therapy, and a guardian ad litem was appointed for her in the removal of custody from her mother. She was then referred to the district attorney's office for review for criminal prosecution.

This case illustrated the worst approach community agencies could take to child sexual abuse. The child told her story to the grandmother and to the DPS worker, but would not repeat her story to any other professionals. The stepfather confessed his guilt to others in the community, and the case was in a posture for criminal prosecution, but this could not be accomplished without the child's telling her story in court. This was a 15-month ordeal from start to finish, ending with successful prosecution of the stepfather. This case experience illustrated policies that could not continue if children are to be encouraged to come into the criminal justice system.

In early August 1984, two attorneys from my office and I went to Los Angeles, California, to interview two young boys who were sexual abuse victims. While in Los Angeles, we visited the Ventura County, California, district attorney's office to look at their Child Sexual Assault Unit. Also, we visited the Children's Institute in Los Angeles. The Children's Institute is a private foundation, 88 years old, which most recently has been involved with interviewing the children who were sexually abused at the Manhattan Beach Daycare Center. It was after this visit that we proposed to the community task force the formation of the Children's Advocacy Center.

The Children's Advocacy Center is a "program" with a focus on an advanced team approach to reported cases of child sexual abuse. The objective is to demonstrate a unique and successful community approach to interagency management of child sexual abuse reports. The overall goal of the project is to consolidate agency and professional involvement in addressing the problem of child sexual abuse. This will be accomplished by allowing relevant community agencies to work together through the program based in the Children's Advocacy Center.

A prosecution/protective service/law enforcement team will review all reports of child sexual abuse. The team will be based in a homelike "house" called the Children's Advocacy Center. From this base, the team will coordinate the handling of cases. The center's program will be the umbrella program under which community agencies will implement a model team approach.

The prosecution/law enforcement/protective service team will jointly investigate reports of child sexual abuse and will make referrals for therapy and medical exams. It is proposed that therapy sessions and medical exams will be initiated or take place at the center. Thereafter, all relevant agencies or other professionals involved with the child-victim and family can participate with them at the center to help make decisions in the best interest of the child, family and society. A victim-witness clerk from the district attorney's office will be available at the center to introduce the child and family to the criminal justice system.

The program staff will develop interview teams and will conduct the interviews of the child-victim. Child-victims will no longer be interviewed at police departments, DPS offices or prosecution offices. All participating agencies will refer child-victims to the center. Team interviewers will question the children in the home-like surroundings, and, where appropriate, the interview will be videotaped. The confidentiality of the video will be preserved by center policy. Review for criminal prosecution will be done at the center. This will be done by the prosecutor/law enforcement/protective service team. If the child needs to be reinterviewed, that will be performed by the initial interview team at the center. The center will keep statistics on the number of child sexual abuse victims served, agencies participating, services provided, victim and offender profile and the number of offenders prosecuted and case disposition.

When a case is not referred for criminal prosecution, the team will attempt to stabilize the child and family. They will make referrals appropriate to maintain the safety and well-being of the child-victim. The team may recommend criminal prosecution be suspended as long as the offender is kept out of the child-victim's home and presence. DPS protective service will monitor the child and family and preserve the child's safety and well-being. Periodic team reviews may be conducted, and additional agency personnel will be involved. Additional team review may involve the team with DPS protective service and possible removal of the child from the family and offender. Close coordination will occur between the team and the agency seeking a court petition and order to remove the child from the custody of the family. The team will monitor the court proceeding and will make recommendations in the best interest of the child and family.

Each team member will act as his agency liaison, and follow-up or additional personnel involvement through that agency will be coordinated through the team agency representative. In most cases, DPS will use existing personnel to supervise cases initially developed through its team member and other personnel at the center. This will allow additional personnel from each agency to participate in the program.

At the conclusion of 12 months, the staff involved in the program will recommend detailed interagency policy approaches in the handling of reported cases of child sexual abuse. The program will allow agencies to evaluate the benefit to the child-victim and family from a coordinated interagency approach.

Madison County professionals have recognized the interviewing process and techniques are critical in cases of child sexual abuse. Another primary benefit of the program will be the further development of such techniques, processes and follow-up. Proper interviewing of a child-victim can be therapeutic. The center's staff and other agency participants will become specialized in this process. The participants in the program will develop a videotape interview guide which will stress a community approach to child sexual abuse. This interview guide will be available at the conclusion of the program.

Local and national publicity about child sexual abuse has prompted more parents to bring suspected cases before our community professionals. Most often, the dilemma facing a district attorney's office is that the child-victims, some as young as three or four, are often the only witnesses to the crime. Preparing a child to testify in court is one of the most difficult things for any prosecutor. The criminal justice system was designed for adults. It is a system that expects victims to undergo numerous interviews and court appearances, that expects testimony to be articulate and detailed and in which cross-examination often confuses the coolest adult.

The child in the courtroom poses new problems. Because the offenders often threaten harm to the child and family, sexually abused children may not report incidents for months or years later. Chances for corroborating evidence or effective prosecution are therefore affected. These are the toughest cases in the criminal justice system. Very rarely do they find successful solution; many cases reported to police and protective service never make it far through the criminal justice system.

The first cases we took into the criminal justice system taught us many adults would like to believe children make up these things. Adults do not want to confront the awful fact many parents will sexually abuse their children. Also, we as a society, do not like to believe we would be willing to send an adult to prison on the testimony of a very young child. At heart, we really do not trust children.

However, experts in our community now believe children are more credible witnesses than adults, especially when it comes to sexual abuse. Young children do not lie about sexual abuse because it is not within their realm of experience. Children can be effective witnesses if they are adequately prepared. If law enforcement and community professionals show a little sensitivity, children can move through the criminal justice system with a minimum of stress.

We are developing model legislation calling for the abolition of competency hearings and allowing videotaping of a child's testimony, rules of evidence allowing for hearsay and expert witnesses and background checks for people who work near or with children.

How to being a community approach to child sexual abuse? Law enforcement, prosecution, protective service and other professional people in the community who have direct contact with cases have to be willing to stick out their necks. They need to begin to review their cases together on a regular basis, and invite other disciplines to join them. Agencies need to permit a small number of interested staff to concentrate their case experience. As cases are reviewed by these "hands-on" people, interagency cooperation will improve. It will not happen overnight, but it will happen. Critical review is essential to improving case management. Professionals also have the resonsibility to design and participate in education programs aimed at increasing their knowledge about the problem of child sexual abuse and improving their intervention skills.

Our children are our hidden assets; it is time we stood up for them.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

BUDGET RESCISSIONS AND DEFERRALS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM-15

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on the Budget, the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report sixteen new rescission proposals totaling $1,047,089,569, nine revised rescission proposals totaling $386,829,000, twenty-one new deferrals of budget authority totaling $1,249,016,539, and eight revised deferrals of budget authority totaling $443,179,221.

By Mr. DOLE:

S. Con. Res. 12. A concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the Senate from February 6, 7, or 8, 1985 to February 18, 1985 and an adjournment of the House from February 7, 1985 to February 19, 1985; considered and agreed to.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S. 392. A bill to make permanent the exclusion for certain service performed on fishing boats from coverage from unemployment compensation tax; to the Committee on Finance.

SHRIMP BOAT OWNERS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am reintroducing legislation today which will make permanent a provision in the Internal Revenue Code that corrects an inequity with respect to the shrimping industry.

In the Tax Reform Act of 1976 criteria were established under which certain crewmen would not be considered employees of the operator or owner of a fishing boat. The Internal Revenue Service has in effect declared shrimping boatcrews to be self-employed if the crewmen does not receive any cash remuneration and if the crewman receives a share of the catch or a share of the proceeds from the sale of the catch and if the amount of the crew share depends on the amount of the boat's catch. A fourth standard provides that the operating crew of the boat is normally made up of fewer than 10 individuals. These criteria were made applicable for the purpose of withholding Federal tax and Federal Insurance Contributions Act tax and consequently exempt the employer—in this case the boatowner or operator.

The inconsistency of which I am concerned appears in the Internal Revenue Code as it pertains to the Federal Unemployment Tax Act. Although this tax is applicable to employers only still under this act fishermen employers are exempt from the payment of Federal contributions for unemployment purposes only if the services performed are related to catching halibut or salmon for commercial purposes or the services are performed on a vessel of more than 10 net tons.

Shrimp boat owners and operators find themselves paying unemployment taxes on those who under another law are classified as self-employed. Though these are different taxes, there is no reason for inconsistency in exemptions. If a person is considered self-employed under the criteria of one, there is no reason why an employer should be required to pay unemployment tax on that self-employed individual. Exclusion from coverage under FICA should be extended to mean an exclusion from coverage under FUTA in this instance. Either a man is self-employed or he is not. It is inconsistent to declare a man self-employed under one act and claim that the same man is an employee under another act.

The legislation I have introduced today would simply amend section 3306(c) of the Code by using the same criteria to determine self-employment of the crewman for unemployment tax purposes as is used to determine self-employment of the crewman under the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Specifically: First, the crewman does not receive any cash remuneration; second, the crewman receives a share of the boat's catch of fish or a share of the proceeds from the sale of the catch; third, the amount of the crewman's share depends on the amount of the boat's catch; and fourth, the operating crew of the boat is normally made up of fewer than 10 individuals.

For the past 4 years, Congress has recognized the need to correct this inequity by approving legislation identical to the bill I am introducing today. Unfortunately, the prior legislation only amended the code temporarily and expired on January 1, 1985. My bill would simply make this change permanent.

Mr. President, this legislation would relieve these boatowners and operators from excessive burden of paying unemployment tax on those crewmen defined as being self-employed under the Tax Reform Act of 1976 and bring some consistency to the enforcement of and compliance with these two laws. Employers need some relief from excessive Government intervention and regulations. Enactment of my proposal would be tax reform in its finest sense. Tax consistency and equity and fairness would be a welcome reform and a welcome relief.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 392

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (b) of section 822 of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (26 U.S.C. 3006 note) is amended by striking out ", and before January 1, 1985".

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S. 393. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exclude from gross income subsistence payments to certain law enforcement officers; to the Committee on Finance.

SUBSISTENCE PAYMENTS TO CERTAIN LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation to allow State troopers, and other State law enforcement officers, to exclude from their gross income subsistence allowances paid to them by the State.

For many years now, in Alabama, our State troopers and other State law enforcement officers have been given a subsistence allowance provided by statute of $5 per day. This cash allowance, which is generally used for meals, is not viewed by the State as compensation. It is considered a reimbursement for work-related expenses which are vital to the performance of the troopers' duties.

Section 119 of the Internal Revenue Code, which was enacted in 1954, excludes from an employee's gross income the value of employer-furnished meals if they are provided for the employer's convenience, on its business premises, and for substantially noncompensatory reasons. For several years, this provision was interpreted to include subsistence allowances paid to State troopers.

In 1972, the Internal Revenue Service ruled that subsistence allowances provided to State troopers do not fall within this statute and, therefore, may not be excluded from gross income for taxable purposes. The U.S. Tax Court reviewed the Service's decision and, with six members dissenting, also held against the troopers. While the Tax Court conceded that the meal allowances were furnished because it was more convenient to provide a meal allowance than to provide meals for the troopers, the court interpreted section 119 as excluding from tax meals received in kind, and not meal allowances. The case was then taken before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. The appeals court agreed with the troopers' contention that such meal allowances are not taxable income. However, the Supreme Court, in Commissioner against Kowalski, reversed the appeals court ruling and declared that meal allowances paid to State troopers are taxable income and do not fall within section 119 of the code.

The Internal Revenue Service applied the Kowalski decision retroactively and held State troopers liable for taxes on their meal allowances back through 1971. The retroactive enforcement of that decision would have resulted in severe financial hardships for State troopers had it not been for the efforts of the late Senator Jim Allen of Alabama. Senator Allen sought to alleviate this financial burden, which would have proved disastrous to most troopers, by introducing legislation to exclude from taxable income the statutory subsistence allowance paid to State law enforcement officers. Through his efforts, legislation was passed amending section 119 of the Internal Revenue Code stating that Kowalski could not be applied retroactively by the Internal Revenue Service. However, the provisions of Senator Allen's bill which dealt with the prospective application of Kowalski were not adopted.

Mr. President, I do not believe it was the intent of Congress to exclude subsistence allowances to State troopers when it passed section 119. The purpose of this section is to allow an employer to provide meals to employees for substantially noncompensatory employment related reasons. The regulations for this section state that a noncompensatory purpose exists where employees must be present to deal with emergencies during work hours. It is unfair and unjust to exclude a State trooper's subsistence allowance from the benefits of this important provision of the Tax Code simply because meals are not provided on official premises and are in the form of an allowance.

Alabama, and many other States, instituted the cash allowance system in order to permit troopers to remain on call in their assigned patrol areas during their break. Often, the troopers' law enforcement duties carry them far from home. Since these officers are assigned on a county wide basis, many cannot return to their offices or homes for meals because of their responsibilities. An officer cannot call for relief at mealtime if his duties demand his presence. In fact, it is not uncommon for a trooper to order a meal and then be called away for an emergency before the meal is even set before him. He must remain at accident scenes, at scenes of disorder, at traffic congestion, at crime scenes, often eating a sandwich as he runs to an emergency call.

There can be little question that our State troopers perform one of the most difficult and demanding jobs imaginable. Our citizens' safety and well-being depend on their swift action in enforcing the law. State troopers take their meals only when and where the time allows because of the nature of their jobs. In essence, these officers must serve their State's needs before they can serve their own. I see no reason why this allowance for meals should not be excluded from their taxable income.

The bill I am introducing today would simply amend section 119 to specifically provide that subsistence allowances to State troopers are not taxable. I feel strongly that there is every need for this legislation, which will aid the State law enforcement officers of our Nation. Let me stress that this bill will benefit not only the State troopers in Alabama, but also those law enforcement officers of every State who receive subsistence allowances.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I urge the support of my colleagues for this legislation, and ask for its timely consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 393

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (b) of section 119 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to special rules with respect to meals and lodging furnished for the convenience of the employer) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) Subsistence payments to certain law enforcement officers.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—There shall be excluded from the gross income of a law enforcement officer an amount equal to the amount paid to such officer by his employer for meals if such payment is—

"(i) required or authorized by the laws governing the employment of such officer, or

"(ii) required by a contract negotiated in accordance with such laws.

"(B) $5 PER DAY LIMITATION.—The amount excludable from gross income under subparagraph (A) shall not exceed five dollars per day.

"(C) LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICER.—The term 'law enforcement officer' means an individual who—

"(i) is an elected or appointed, full-time employee of a State, a political subdivision of a State, or a territory or possession of the United States.

"(ii) has the power of arrest, and

"(iii) is required by the terms of his employment to investigate, apprehend, or detain individuals suspected or convicted of criminal offenses.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1981.

By Mr. GORTON (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 394. A bill to amend the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 to provide housing assistance to the homeless through renovation and conversion of facilities for use as temporary housing, provision of emergency housing and food, and provision of residential housing assistance on the transition to independent living; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

HOMELESS HOUSING ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, homelessness remains an emergency problem in our Nation, particularly in our urban areas. In my home State of Washington, the problem continues to rise, both in numbers and intensity. In Seattle, homeless individuals are seeking refuge from the cold in underground garages on the University of Washington campus, and underneath bridges and viaducts near the downtown area. Across the State in Spokane, missions serving the needy are laying down more mattresses on the floors than ever, yet still must turn people away, back into the cold wintry weather. These and similar scenes are repeated each night in large and small communities throughout the State of Washington and the Nation.

All of us should be aware of the continuing plight of these most unfortunate members of our society. Although projections of the exact number of the homeless vary widely, there is general agreement that the numbers remain intolerably high and that emergency services are still insufficient to meet the need.

In the past, Congress has appropriated emergency funds to assist the homeless on an ad hoc, year-to-year basis, outside the normal legislative process. This pattern has inhibited long-range planning by local service providers. The problem of homelessness is not going to disappear this year or next year. It is time to establish a Federal program properly authorized to assist the homeless over a 3-year period.

Accordingly, Senator MOYNIHAN and I are jointly sponsoring a bill entitled the "Homeless Housing Assistance Act of 1985." We are joined by Senators SARBANES, LEVIN, SIMON, and MATSUNAGA as original cosponsors.

This legislation would establish three separate programs, providing emergency food and shelter for the homeless, assisting in the renovation or conversion of buildings for use as emergency shelters, and supporting transitional housing to assist homeless individuals in the transition to independent living.

1. EMERGENCY FOOD AND SHELTER PROGRAM

In 1983, Congress first established an Emergency Food and Shelter Program, adminstered under the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA], operated through a national network of private voluntary organizations. This program essentially supports the operating expenses of mass shelters, soup kitchens, and food banks. The program has been funded through most of fiscal year 1985 by an appropriation of $70 million.

This bill would retain the Emergency Food and Shelter Program in its present format, although shifting its agency administration to the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The impetus for originally placing this program under FEMA was the emergency nature of the high unemployment in 1982 and early 1983 and the need to provide assistance swiftly. Yet this program simply does not fit the primary mission of FEMA—that of managing flood control and providing disaster relief. In establishing the program on a permanent 3-year basis, it is appropriate to provide for transition of administrative responsibilities to HUD, which has proper jurisdiction for public housing activities.

The program would continue to operate through a national board of private voluntary organizations distributing grants to individual localities with the greatest need for emergency food and shelter assistance. Each locality would constitute a local board of nonprofit organizations, chaired by the representative of the local head of government, to determine the actual distribution of funds to serve providers.

This proposal thereby preserves the emphasis on private nonprofit organizations in managing the program and serving those in need. The focus continues to be on encouraging private initiatives through churches, neighborhood groups, and other organizations moved by compassion to devote time, energy, and resources to those who have fallen off even the bottom rung of the ladder.

In addition, local boards, in cooperations with the local government, would be required to develop a local plan describing programs, goals and objectives for providing assistance to the homeless in that community. Hopefully, this requirement would spur those communities that have not already done so to examine the problem of homelessness, to coordinate public and private resources for meeting the need, and to work to provide shelter and preserve low-income housing.

The bill would authorize appropriations for the Emergency Food and Shelter Program of $50 million in fiscal year 1986, $52 million in 1987, and $54 million in 1988.

2. SHELTER RENOVATION AND CONVERSION ADVANCES

The bill creates a program within HUD to make competitive noninterest bearing advances to States, local governments, and nonprofit organizations for the renovation or conversion of buildings to use as emergency shelters. There does not presently exist any Federal program providing support for the capital expenses associated with providing shelter for the homeless. In 1983, the housing authorization amendment to the supplemental appropriations bill authorized $60 million to support rehabilitation of structures for use as emergency shelters, but funds to implement this were never appropriated.

This bill would address that need. It builds on the proposal introduced by Senator MOYNIHAN as S. 698 and Representative RANGEL as H.R. 1950 in early 1983, particularly with respect to the language on application and distribution of funds and the provision insuring the widest possible geographic distribution of emergency shelters, so as to prevent undue burden on any particular neighborhood or group.

Rather than outright grants, the funds would be distributed as noninterest bearing advances, repayment of which would be waived if the facility is used as a shelter for 10 years or more. This "advance" concept was adopted from H.R. 5752 introduced by Representative OAKAR last year to provide second-stage housing for the homeless. The provision thus ensures long-term use of the buildings upon which funds are expended. The State, local government, or nonprofit organization applying for the advance would also be required to make a matching grant of 25 percent of renovation or conversion costs and to agree to use the building as a shelter for at least 3 years. This would reduce the level of Federal expenditures necessary while ensuring a substantial stake of the grant recipient itself in the shelter program. Finally, no more than $200,000 could be spent to renovate or convert any single facility to use as an emergency shelter.

The bill also directs HUD to work with Federal interagency task force on food and shelter, chaired by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, to identify vacant and surplus Federal facilities which could be converted to use as a shelter.

The bill would authorize appropriations for this program of $35 million in fiscal year 1986, $36 million in 1987, and $37 million in 1988.

3. TRANSITION TO INDEPENDENCE DEMONSTRATION PROJECT

The bill establishes a demonstration project under HUD providing competitive grants to States, local governments, and nonprofit organizations to develop and apply innovative approaches to assisting homeless individuals in the transition from living on the streets or in shelters to independent life.

The proposal is for "second-stage" housing in a small-group residential setting, similar in concept to that proposed by Representative OAKAR in H.R. 5752 last year, although her program was targeted toward the deinstitutionalized mentally ill. The program established by this bill would pay up to 75 percent of the operating costs of transitional housing providing a residential environment for up to 15 homeless individuals, with a full-time supervisor and supportive services.

The program would serve homeless persons who cannot presently live independently without supervision and supportive services but who are capable of eventual transition to independent living. The transitional housing would provide homeless individuals with a stable address, counseling, the opportunity to seek employment, and information on other available resources, including referral to job training programs.

In this transitional program, the residents would be expected to assume greater responsibility for their own care. Residents would be required to pay 30 percent of their income or public assistance as rent, as do public housing tenants and tenants receiving rental subsidies.

At the end of each fiscal year, HUD would provide a report to Congress evaluating the wisdom of this approach to assisting the homeless and the success of the transitional project, objectively measured in terms of placement of homeless individuals in permanent housing and employment.

The bill would authorize appropriations for this demonstration project of $15 million for each of the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

CONCLUSION

I have no illusions that this legislation would be a panacea for all of the problems of homelessness in this country. I, myself, expect to introduce job training legislation that can help address the employment needs of the poor and homeless, and I will continue to investigate ways to address the special needs of the chronically mentally ill who make up such a large share of the homeless population.

Still, I believe this proposal represents a step forward in our awareness of the problem of homelessness and the resolve of Congress to address it. The programs established in this bill will strengthen the Federal Government's supportive role, in cooperation with local, State, and private efforts, in feeding the hungry and providing shelter to the homeless.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, Senator GORTON, in introducing the Homeless Housing Assistance Act of 1985.

The measure we introduce today would authorize three separate programs to provide emergency food and shelter to the growing number of homeless Americans. First, this measure would maintain the current Emergency Food and Shelter Program, shifting its administration from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Second, the legislation would provide advances to State and local governments and private nonprofit agencies, on a competitive basis, to support the renovation or conversion of buildings for use as emergency shelters. These advances would not have to be repaid if the building is used as a shelter for 10 years. Finally, our legislation would authorize a demonstration project of small-group housing to help homeless individuals make the transition to independent living.

The tragedy of homeless Americans is nowhere more vivid, or more painful, than in New York City. Last winter, New York City housed nearly 6,500 homeless men and women every night; a 130-percent increase over the numbers sheltered nightly just 2 years earlier. The numbers of homeless families in New York City have grown even more rapidly. Today, some 3,900 homeless families—10,500 men, women, and children—are being housed in hotels and family centers in New York. This represents a 150-percent increase since July 1982, and a 50-percent increase since January 1983.

The tragic situation of the homeless in New York City is repeated in many other cities throughout our Nation. In Philadelphia, 15,000 men, women, and children received emergency family housing in 1983—five times the numbers in 1981. In Connecticut, 54 emergency food operations were operating in 1981; today, there are more than 200. In California, the number of food banks has doubled. Emergency food operations in Colorado have grown by more than one-third, from 221, to 300; 900 such facilities are operating in Michigan, 2,000 in Texas, and 358 in Kansas.

State and local governments bear most, if not all, of the costs to provide the homeless food and shelter. Both New York City and Washington, DC have committed themselves to shelter any homeless person who asks for assistance. To meet the growing demand, New York City spent some $123 million last year. Since 1979, New York City's costs to house homeless men and women in public shelters alone have increased more than seven times from $8 million to $58 million in 1984, and the city expects to spend $75 million on such this year.

New York City, as every other city in this Nation, receives little Federal support to help meet its obligations and responsibilities to shelter and feed its homeless residents. In recent years, Congress has provided funds for emergency food and shelter services only on an ad-hoc basis. The time has come for the Congress to assume its responsibility for the homeless, by permanently authorizing funds for emergency food and shelter.

The sums in measure are not great ones; they represent the beginning of a Federal commitment to provide basic assistance to the estimated 2 to 3 million homeless Americans. Under this legislation, the Department of Housing and Urban Development would administer the Emergency Food and Shelter Program, the appropriate Federal agency to be so charged with the duty of providing shelter assistance. Administration of this program by HUD will help foster the redevelopment of a national housing policy for low-income families and individuals.

To be sure, this legislation would address but one aspect of a most complex social problem. Though it is important to provide Federal assistance for emergency food and shelter services, the Federal Government must assume its obligation to provide services, assistance, and permanent housing for the growing number of families and individuals in need.

Moreover, the Federal Government must begin to recognize its responsibilities to specific groups within the homeless population—the mentally ill who become homeless for lack of sheltered living arrangements, and homeless families, who ride the subways at night rather than enter a large public shelter.

During the recent cold spell, Grand Central Train Station in New York permitted those without shelter to spend the nights in the train station. Hundreds of individuals, including entire families, found shelter in this one train station alone.

The problems of the homeless are becoming even more complex and desperate. We must respond to this crisis.

I urge my colleagues to join me and Senator GORTON in offering the Homeless Housing Assistance Act. It represents an essential first step in providing urgently needed assistance to the growing number of homeless Americans.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the homelessness rate in our Nation has reached unacceptable heights. No humane man or woman can walk past a streetperson without feeling a rush of compassion. Empathy, however, must serve as the catalyst to action. Today, my distinguished colleagues, Mr. GORTON and Mr. MOYNIHAN are introducing legislation which would alleviate the suffering of America's homeless. I am pleased to join them in the effort. The Homeless Housing Assistance Act deserves swift consideration and passage.

In Chicago, alone, an estimated 12,000 to 25,000 people sleep in makeshift shelters or on the streets and alleyways. Until recently only 1,000 shelter beds existed to meet the need. Nationwide, estimates range from 2 to 3 million homeless people. Due to the deinstitutionalization movement of recent years, many mentally ill patients have made their homes in the streets. Two-thirds of the suffer from some type of mental disorder.

The National League of Cities printed a chilling front page story in their January 28, 1985, newsletter entitled, "The Desperate Battle to Save the Homeless." The need for a Federal governmental response is all too clear. The bill provides for the continuation of the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Emergency Food and Shelter Program under HUD authority. Another aspect of the bill establishes a program of competitive advances to local and State governments and nonprofit organizations to renovate existing buildings to use as emergency shelters. The final thrust of the bill is crucial to the elimination of what is known in the prison system as the revolving door principle. Small group housing will be established to assist in the transition from homeless despair to independent living. This program includes mental health counseling and vocational counseling services.

The success of the bill depends on the compassion and activism of my colleagues. I feel confident that we not only recognize the problem, but that we are also responsible and caring enough to act.●

S. 395. A bill to provide an additional 10 weeks of unemployment compensation for individuals participating in a job training program for dislocated workers under title III of the Job Training Partnership Act; to the Committee on Finance.

(The remarks of Mr. SPECTER and the text of the legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. BUMPERS:

S. 396. A bill to amend various sections of the United States Code to provide greater safeguards for small businesses with respect to agency and court proceedings; to the Committee on Finance.

SMALL BUSINESS FAIRNESS ACT

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which I hope history will note as one of the major legislative accomplishments of the 99th Congress, the Small Business Fairness Act of 1985. As the ranking Democrat on the Senate Small Business Committee at a time when I have felt the administration has been less than interested in the problems and in the accomplishments of small businesses, I have felt a special responsibility to speak on behalf of this most important sector of our economy. In my judgment, the President's proposal to eliminate the only agency dedicated to the needs of small business is one of the most serious threats to small business we have seen in many years. The SBA is certainly not a perfect agency, but we need to be making it more effective rather than abolishing it. In any event, the House and Senate Small Business Committees have been the primary advocates for small businesses in the Government for the last 4 years, and I am glad to say that we have a bipartisan committee in the Senate which works together to address the problems which face us.

The bill I am introducing today has four major titles. Title I is an important amendment to the Administrative Procedure Act which I have sponsored for several years and which passed the Senate in both the 96th and 97th Congresses. It has come to be known as the Bumpers amendment regulatory reform proposal, and it would give courts more authority to overturn the unfair and burdensome regulations which affect small business. In the 98th Congress, it was part of S. 1080, the Regulatory Reform Act. Unfortunately, this bill was not enacted into law.

Title I of my bill is an amendment to section 706 of title 5, United States Code. It would restore vitality and balance to the judicial review provisions of the APA by putting individuals and businesses on an equal footing with Federal regulators when they enter the courthouse door. For too long the courts have accorded all too much deference to agencies' opinions on questions of law, including the scope of each agency's own jurisdiction. It is fundamentally unfair for an agency like OSHA or the Federal Trade Commission, which are often in an adversary relationship with business, to be the judge of the scope of its own power.

Under our system of justice, questions of law are to be decided by an impartial court, and all are supposed to be equal in the eyes of the law. But the courts have accorded an undue presumption of regularity to the agency's proceedings. Under my amendment, the agency should have to show, based on the record, that it was legally and factually justified in taking the actions which it took. My amendment will ensure that judicial review is not a rubber stamp process, as it too often is under the current vague standards of judicial review.

My amendment will admonish the Federal judiciary to decide all administrative matters independently. In informal rulemakings, it will require that there by substantial support in the rulemaking file for the factual predicate of a rule. If questions are raised about an agency's power to act as it did, the agency will be required to prove that its authorizing legislation specifically gave it the jurisdiction or authority to take the action it took. On all other questions of law, the court is to accord on presumption either in favor of or against the agency's action.

I am absolutely convinced that this is a legislative idea that is critically important to small business, and it is a proposal for which the time has come.

This amendment to the Administrative Procedure Act is supported by the American Bar Association, by the Chamber of Commerce, and the Business Roundtable. Rarely has such a consensus existed about the need for such legislation which has gone unmet for so long.

Second, as title II, I am including the reauthorization of the Equal Access to Justice Act, which was vetoed by the President last year. The reasoning for this bill, which merely extends a policy which Congress wisely established 4 years ago, is simple. We believe that if a small business successfully challenges the Federal bureaucracy in court, or if an agency unfairly accuses a small business of violating the law and the businessman vindicates himself, he should be able to recover his costs. Every Member of Congress knows on a personal level that there are genuine cases of bureaucratic abuse.

These cases of injustice are the very reason why many Members are motivated to seek public office in the first place. And there is not a Member of this body who has not found on his or her doorstep citizens who have been wronged by their own Government. At worst, a career or a life may be ruined; at best, the individual has been wrongly accused and has had to incur great expense to clear his name. I do not say this to take a cheap shot at the Federal bureaucracy, but there are certainly those in Government who, from time to time, exercise very poor judgment.

Until the Equal Access to Justice Act, there was little that Members of Congress could really do for people who had suffered such a wrong. As a general rule, the Government is not subject to suit save when Congress says so, and the remedy of a private relief bill is cumbersome and impractical. Equal Access to Justice made the promise of justice to these people who had gone to great expense to challenge agency wrongs, or who had successfully defended themselves against wrongful agency action.

As everyone here knows, Congress renewed this promise last year by extending the Equal Access to Justice Act. The President, much to my dismay, vetoed this important legislation after the 98th Congress adjourned. Of course, small businesses owe great thanks to Senators DECONCINI and DOMENICI, and several others, who have worked long and hard to make a reauthorization of equal access a reality. They are primarily responsible for this bill, and I want them to know that I will use my influence on the Small Business Committee and do all I can to make it a reality this Congress.

Next, as title III, I have included in the Small Business Fairness Act a paperwork reduction provision for small businesses. Every business, large and small, has too much Government paperwork. But, in my judgment, the Federal paper blizzard hits small businesses especially hard because they have fewer employees and less resources to deal with the demands of the Federal bureaucracy, by comparison, than do larger businesses. Small businesses are less likely to have sophisticated computers to keep track of correspondence and financial transactions, and less likely to have employees who can devote full time to answering the endless demands of Government. As one who once made a go of it in a hardware store in Charleston, AR, I know full well what small business people are talking about when they complain about Government paperwork, and I believe their complaints are fully justified.

A great obstacle to small business participation in the Federal procurement process is paperwork. Potential small business contractors must frequently respond to solicitations which exceed 100 pages. The average Department of Defense solicitation for 1984 was 84 pages, plus exhibits. OMB estimates the procurement paperwork burden of only four Federal agencies is 1.25 billion hours. The IRS is also a major culprit. The IRS accounted for more than half of the nonprocurement paperwork burden imposed by the Federal Government in 1983.

I have concluded that the only way to deal effectively with this problem is for Congress and the President, by law, simply to order the bureaucracy to cut the paper, as we did in the Paperwork Reduction Act which Senator CHILES originally authored. We certainly need better oversight of the Federal agencies, but we can't write their forms and tailor their paperwork for them. So I propose simply to order the Office of Management and Budget to reduce the Federal paperwork load for small businesses by 5 percent for each of the next 3 years. This is a fairly modest goal that I am confident can be met, but it would be of great help to small business men and women who are literally swamped with Federal paperwork requirements. I want to take this opportunity to commend Senator CHILES for his very diligent work in this area. Small businesses can thank him for the countless hours he spent hammering out the original Paperwork Reduction Act. I look forward to working with him to see that act reauthorized this Congress.

Finally, as title IV, I have included in the Small Business Fairness Act a number of tax proposals which will encourage capital formation for small businesses, and one measure which is simple commonsense and fairness and which could be brought up for third reading and passed right now, so strong is the sentiment in favor of it. I will describe these tax proposals only briefly, for they are easily understood and widely supported in the small business community.

Before I describe my capital formation proposals, however, I want to say a few things about the effect they will have on our economy. There is a distinct connection between these proposals and stimulating the economy and creating jobs. They are true pump priming, not tax giveaways disguised as supply side economics. First, small businesses account for three quarters of all employment and about 80 percent of all new jobs, according to a study by MIT. Testimony presented to the Small Business Committee indicated that firms with 50 employees or less accounted for virtually all of the new jobs in the Northeast between 1972 and 1976. Similarly, between 1978 and 1980, small firms were responsible for 78 percent of all new jobs in the Middle Atlantic States. And, as a southerner, I can personally attest that small businesses are responsible for creating virtually all of the new jobs in the South. Small businesses grow faster, as a survey by Inc magazine showed. It listed the 500 fastest growing privately owned businesses, which grew 571 percent between 1977 and 1981, while the Fortune 500 grew 70 percent. The workforce of those privately owned companies grew by 315 percent, compared to 2 percent for the Fortune 500 companies.

In order to grow like that, however, the companies need access to capital. They frequently have obtained all that they can of bank loans as well as loans from friends and relatives, and when they do obtain bank loans, they generally pay an interest rate that is about 3 percentage points higher than their big business competitors. Consequently, they need access to venture capital. Testimony before the Finance Committee in January 1983 indicated that there is a $7 billion shortfall in venture capital available to small businesses, so it is necessary to lure it with some well-designed tax incentives.

A reduction in capital gains for small business investments held for 3 years is a proven incentive. For example, between 1973 and 1977, the average new private capital committed to venture capital firms was $43.6 million per year. In 1978 the maximum capital gains rate was reduced to 28 percent, and investment increased to $596.3 million per year. In 1981 the maximum rate was again reduced, and the money committed to venture capital firms increased to $1.5 billion per year. Similarly, new capital in public offerings increased as the maximum capital gains rate went down. Between 1975 and 1977, that figure averaged $217.3 million per year. Between 1978 and 1980, it increased to $717.3 million per year, and in 1981-82, it averaged $2.33 billion per year. These are astounding increases, and they cannot simply be explained as responses to general economic conditions.

These incentives should be channeled toward small businesses, because, as I have pointed out, that is where the greatest response in growth and new jobs is greatest. A study by GAO in August 1982 showed that $209 million in venture capital was invested in 72 specific companies in the 1970's, and in 1979 these 72 companies had combined sales of $6 billion. They had an average annual growth rate of 33 percent, and they created 130,000 jobs, while producing $100 million in new corporate tax revenues and $350 million in employee tax revenues. They also produced $900 million in export sales. Just think what would happen if we enticed the entire $7 billion of the venture capital that is needed by small businesses.

Having said all this, let me briefly explain the tax provisions of my bill. First, in the area of capital gains, I proposed to lengthen the capital gains holding period from 6 months to 1 year. I think it was a very serious mistake to shorten the holding period from 1 year to 6 months, and I strongly opposed this idea last year when this change was made last year. We might as well not have a capital gains tax at all as to have the present policy. Such a short holding period only encourages speculation in the stock market, in gold and silver and other commodities, and, in my judgment, it does immeasurable harm to small businesses in this country which depend on stability in the capital markets for their very survival. These businesses, Mr. President, generally can't go to the stock exchange and make a public offering to raise capital. They are, for the most part, single proprietorships, partnerships and closely held small corporations. When they need capital they go to the bank or other lending institutions. Let me say again, the 6-month holding period for capital gains discourages investment in small business, the backbone of our economy, and it discourages the availability of capital for these businesses by making more speculative investments more attractive.

Second, I propose a capital gains rollover provision which would parallel the rollover provision now available for homeowners, if the taxpayer reinvests his gain in a second qualified small business. The gain, up to $100,000, would simply not be recognized if the second investment is made within the required period. In tandem with this provision, I also am proposing in this bill a capital gains deduction of 80 percent for small business investments which are held for 3 years. The rationale for these changes in the tax law is the same as that with respect to the holding period for capital gains. We should recognize the invaluable role of small businesses as a source of stability and job creation in our economy, and we should do everything reasonably possible to encourage the growth of small business. The rollover provision and the 80 percent deduction for small business investments held for 3 years are sound and direct means to encourage the availability of capital for this sector of the economy.

Third, I propose to clarify what should be the law already, but what the Justice Department has decided is not the law, despite what I think was a very clear message from the Congress. A few years ago Congress enacted the Regulatory Flexibility Act, which essentially requires Federal agencies to consider whether rules which they are proposing will have a significant impact on small businesses. The Justice Department concluded that Congress did not intend to impose this terrible burden on that favorite of Federal agencies, the Internal Revenue Service. I simply want to make clear by this bill that the Regulatory Flexibility Act does indeed apply to the IRS, and the IRS should consider the impact of its rules on small businesses just like all other Federal agencies.

Finally, the part of the bill which I said could be brought up for third reading and passed today. It is an understatement to say that there has been some dissatisfaction among the public with some regulations which were recently put into effect by the IRS pursuant to the Deficit Reduction Act of last year; namely, the contemporaneous recording travel regulations. I am encouraged that the IRS has, in recent days, seen fit to simplify these regulations, but I'm not convinced that these changes go far enough. The mail and the calls I have received on these regulations certainly prove the old maxim that you can only give people as much government as they are willing to take. These regulations have been a ridiculous burden on individuals and businesses which use cars and trucks—and that's just about everybody—and they must be repealed. Just before Christmas, I wrote a strong letter to the IRS complaining vigorously about these regulations, and they politely informed me that they were only doing exactly what Congress has told them to. Well, I've read that law and I am convinced that the IRS was interpreting the law as broadly as possible, and I think they initially went beyond the intent of Congress. I am pleased that the IRS is now interpreting this law more fairly, but I have yet to be convinced that absolute repeal is not the best alternative. My bill does just that.

In summary, it seemed to me appropriate to try and identify as many of the significant and meritorious proposals for small business legislation as we could and to package those proposals into one omnibus bill, just as the Judiciary Committee did with the Criminal Code revision last year. A number of these ideas have been supported by the administration and by large majorities on both sides of the aisle in this body, such as the amendment to the Administrative Procedure Act which I have been vigorously pressing for several years. Other parts of this bill, such as the Equal Access to Justice Act, have been given lipservice by the President, but this measure was vetoed after Congress adjourned last year. It is my hope that by including several good proposals in one bill, the President will see the merits of those about which he has had misgivings.

Every one of these proposals, Mr. President, is in the interest of American small businesses, and to paraphrase the president of General Motors from a few years ago, "what's good for small business is good for America." I invite cosponsors for this bill. I also ask that a legal analysis of my amendment to the Administrative Procedure Act, which I prepared with the assistance of counsel last year, be included in the RECORD at the end of my statement. And I further ask unanimous consent that the Small Business Fairness Act of 1985 be printed in full in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 396

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Small Fairness Business Act of 1985".

TITLE I—ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

JUDICIAL REVIEW STRENGTHENED

SEC. 101. Section 706 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 706. Scope of review

"(a) To the extent necessary to decision and when presented, the reviewing court shall independently decide all relevant questions of law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action. The reviewing court shall—

"(1) compel agency action unlawfully withheld or unreasonably delayed; and

"(2) hold unlawful and set aside agency action, findings, and conclusions found to be—

"(A) arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law;

"(B) contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity;

"(C) in excess of statutory jurisdiction, authority or limitations, or short of statutory right;

"(D) without observance of procedure required by law;

"(E) unsupported by substantial evidence in a proceeding subject to sections 556 and 557 of this title or otherwise reviewed on the record of an agency hearing provided by statute;

"(F) without substantial support in the rulemaking file, viewed, as a whole, for the asserted or necessary factual basis, as distinguished from the policy or legal basis, of a rule adopted in a proceeding subject to section 553 of this title; or

"(G) unwarranted by the facts to the extent that the facts are subject to trial de novo by the reviewing court.

"(b) In making the foregoing determinations, the court shall review the whole record or those parts of it cited by a party, and due account shall be taken of the rule of prejudicial error.

"(c) In making determinations concerning statutory jurisdiction or authority under clause (2)(C) of subsection (a) of this section, the court shall require that the action by the agency is within the scope of the agency jurisdiction or authority on the basis of the language of the statute or, in the event of ambiguity, other evidence of ascertainable legislative intent. In making determinations on other questions of law, the court shall not accord any presumption in favor of or against agency action.".

TITLE II—EQUAL ACCESS TO JUSTICE ACT

AWARD OF FEES AND OTHER EXPENSES IN CERTAIN AGENCY ACTIONS

SEC. 201. Subchapter I of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section 504:

"§ 504. Costs and fees of parties

"(a)(1) An agency that conducts an adversary adjudication shall award, to a prevailing party other than the United States, fees and other expenses incurred by that party in connection with that proceeding, unless the adjudicative officer of the agency finds that the position of the agency was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust. The decision of the adjudicative officer on the application for fees and other expenses shall be the final administrative decision under this section.

"(2) A party seeking an award of fees and other expenses shall, within thirty days of a final disposition in the adversary adjudication, submit to the agency an application which shows that the party is a prevailing party and is eligible to receive an award under this section, and the amount sought, including an itemized statement from any attorney, agent, or expert witness representing or appearing in behalf of the party stating the actual time expended and the rate at which fees and other expenses were computed. The party shall also allege that the position of the agency was not substantially justified. When the United States appeals the underlying merits of an adversary adjudication, no decision on an application for fees and other expenses in connection with that adversary adjudication shall be made under this section until a final and unreviewable decision is rendered by the court on the appeal or until the underlying merits of the case have been finally determined pursuant to the appeal.

"(3) The adjudicative officer of the agency may reduce the amount to be awarded, or deny an award, to the extent that the party during the course of the proceedings engaged in conduct which unduly and unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the matter in controversy. The decision of the adjudicative officer of the agency under this section shall be made a part of the record containing the final decision of the agency and shall include written findings and conclusions and the reason or basis therefor.

"(b)(1) For the purposes of this section—

"(A) 'fees and other expenses' includes the reasonable expenses of expert witnesses, the reasonable cost of any study, analysis, engineering report, test, or project which is found by the agency to be necessary for the preparation of the party's case, and reasonable attorney or agency fees; the amount of fees awarded under this section shall be based upon prevailing market rates for the kind and quality of the services furnished, except that (i) no expert witness shall be compensated at a rate in excess of the highest rate of compensation for expert witnesses paid by the agency involved, and (ii) attorney or agent fees shall not be awarded in excess of $75 per hour unless the agency determines by regulation that an increase in the cost of living or a special factor, such as the limited availability of qualified attorneys or agents for the proceedings involved, justifies a higher fee;

"(B) 'party' means a party, as defined in section 551(3) of this title, who is (i) an individual whose net worth did not exceed $2,000,000 at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated, or (ii) any owner of an unincorporated business, or any partnership, corporation, association, unit of local government, or organization, the net worth of which did not exceed $7,000,000 at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated, and which had not more than 500 employees at the time the adversary adjudiction was initiated; except that an organization described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3)) exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code, or a cooperative association as defined in section 15(a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act (12 U.S.C. 1141j(a)), may be a party regardless of the net worth of such organization or cooperative association;

"(C) 'adversary adjudication' means (i) an adjudication under section 554 of this title in which the position of the United States is represented by counsel or otherwise, but excludes an adjudication for the purpose of establishing or fixing a rate or for the purpose of granting or renewing a license, and (ii) any appeal of a decision made pursuant to section 6 of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 605) before an agency board of contract appeals as provided in section 8 of that Act (41 U.S.C. 607);

"(D) 'adjudicative officer' means the deciding official, without regard to whether the official is designated as an administrative law judge, a hearing officer of examiner, or otherwise, who presided at the adversary adjudication; and

"(E) 'position of the agency' includes the underlying action which led to the adversary adjudication; except that fees and expenses may not be awarded to a party for any portion of the adversary adjudication in which the party has unreasonably protracted the proceedings.

"(2) Except as otherwise provided in paragraph (1), the definitions provided in section 551 of this title apply to this section.

"(c)(1) After consultation with the Chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States, each agency shall by rule establish uniform procedures for the submission and consideration of applications for an award of fees and other expenses. If a court reviews the underlying decision of the adversary adjudication, an award for fees and other expenses may be made only pursuant to section 2412(d)(3) of title 28, United States Code.

"(2) If a party or the United States is dissatisfied with a determination of fees and other expenses made under subsection (a), that party or the United States (as the case may be) may, within 30 days after the determination is made, appeal the determination to the court of the United States having jurisdiction to review the merits of the underlying decision of the agency adversary adjudication. The court's determination on all appeals heard under this paragraph shall be based solely on the factual record made before the agency. The court may modify the determination of fees and other expenses only if the court finds that the failure to make an award of fees and other expenses, or the calculation of the amount of the award, was unsupported by substantial evidence.

"(d) Fees and other expenses awarded under this subsection shall be paid by any agency over which the party prevails from any funds made available to the agency by appropriation or otherwise.

"(e) The Chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States, after consultation with the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, shall report annually to the Congress on the amount of fees and other expenses awarded during the preceding fiscal year pursuant to this section. The report shall describe the number, nature, and amount of the awards, the claims involved in the controversy, and any other relevant information which may aid the Congress in evaluating the scope and impact of such awards. Each agency shall provide the Chairman with such information as is necessary for the Chairman to comply with the requirements of this subsection.

"(f) If complete payment of the fees and other expenses awarded under this section is not made within 60 days after the final agency action making an award of such fees and other expenses, interest shall be paid on the amount remaining due. Such interest shall be computed at the rate the Secretary of the Treasury establishes for interest payments under section 12 of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 611), and shall run from the date which is 61 days after the date of such award up to and including the date such payment is posted by certified or registered mail.".

AWARD OF FEES AND OTHER EXPENSES IN CERTAIN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 202. (a) Subsections (a) and (b) of section 2412 of title 28, United States Code, are amended by striking out "or any agency and any official of the United States" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "or any agency or any official of the United States".

(b) Section 2412 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection (d):

"(d)(1)(A) Except as otherwise specifically provided by statute, a court shall award to a prevailing party other than the United States fees and other expenses, in addition to any costs awarded pursuant to subsection (a), incurred by that party in any civil action (other than cases sounding in tort), including proceedings for judicial review of agency action, brought by or against the United States in any court having jurisdiction of that action, unless the court finds that the position of the United States was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

"(B) A party seeking an award of fees and other expenses shall, within thirty days of final judgment in the action, submit to the court an application for fees and other expenses which shows that the party is a prevailing party and is eligible to receive an award under this subsection, and the amount sought, including an itemized statement from any attorney or expert witness representing or appearing in behalf of the party stating the actual time expended and the rate at which fees and other expenses are computed. The party shall also allege that the position of the United States was not substantially justified.

"(C) The court, in its discretion, may reduce the amount to be awarded pursuant to this subsection, or deny an award, to the extent that the prevailing party during the course of the proceedings engaged in conduct which unduly and unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the matter in controversy.

"(2) For the purposes of this subsection—

"(A) 'fees and other expenses' includes the reasonable expenses of expert witnesses, the reasonable cost of any study, analysis, engineering report, test, or project which is found by the court to be necessary for the preparation of the party's case, and reasonable attorney fees; the amount of fees awarded under this subsection shall be based upon prevailing market rates for the kind and quality of the services furnished, except that (i) no expert witness shall be compensated at a rate in excess of the highest rate of compensation for expert witnesses paid by the United States, and (ii) attorney fees shall not be awarded in excess of $75 per hour unless the court determines that an increase in the cost of living or a special factor, such as the limited availability of qualified attorneys for the proceedings involved, justifies a higher fee;

"(B) 'party' means (i) an individual whose net worth did not exceed $2,000,000 at the time the civil action was filed, or (ii) any owner of an unincorporated business, or any partnership, corporation, association, unit of local government, or organization, the net worth of which did not exceed $7,000,000 at the time the civil action was filed, and which had not more than 500 employees at the time the civil action was filed; except that an organization described in section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3)) exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of such Code, or a cooperative association as defined in section 15(a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act (12 U.S.C. 1141j(a)), may be a party regardless of the net worth of such organization or cooperative association;

"(C) 'United States' includes any agency and any official of the United States acting in his or her official capacity;

"(D) 'position of the United States' includes the underlying agency action which led to the litigation; except that fees and expenses may not be awarded to a party for any portion of the litigation in which the party has unreasonably protracted the proceedings;

"(E) 'civil action brought by or against the United States' includes an appeal by a party, other than the United States, from a decision of a contracting officer rendered pursuant to a disputes clause in a contract with the Government or pursuant to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978;

"(F) 'court' includes the United States Claims Court;

"(G) 'final judgment' means a judgment that is final and not appealable; and

"(H) 'prevailing party', in the case of eminent domain proceedings, means a party who obtains a final judgment (other than by settlement), exclusive of interest, the amount of which is at least as close to the highest valuation of the property involved that is attested to at trial on behalf of the property owner as it is to the highest valuation of the property involved that is attested to at trial on behalf of the Government.

"(3) In awarding fees and other expenses under this subsection to a prevailing party in any action for judicial review of an adversary adjudication, as defined in subsection (b)(1)(C) of section 504 of title 5, United States Code, or an adversary adjudication subject to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978, the court shall include in that award fees and other expenses to the same extent authorized in subsection (a) of such section, unless the court finds that during such adversary adjudication the position of the United States was substantially justified, or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

"(4) Fees and other expenses awarded under this subsection to a party shall be paid by any agency over which the party prevails from any funds made available to the agency, by appropriation or otherwise.

"(5) The Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall include in the annual report prepared pursuant to section 604 of this title, the amount of fees and other expenses awarded during the preceding fiscal year pursuant to this subsection. The report shall describe the number, nature, and amount of the awards, the claims involved in the controversy, and any other relevant information which may aid the Congress in evaluating the scope and impact of such awards.".

(c) Section 2412 of title 28, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) If complete payment of the costs or fees and other expenses awarded under this section is not made within 60 days after the award of such costs or fees and other expenses, interest shall be paid thereafter on the amount remaining due. Such interest shall be computed at the rate the Secretary of the Treasury establishes for interest payments under section 12 of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (41 U.S.C. 611), and shall run from the date which is 61 days after the date of such award up to and including the date such payment is posted by certified or registered mail.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS

SEC. 203. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), nothing in section 2412(d) of title 28, United States Code, as added by section 202(b) of this title, alters, modifies, repeals, invalidates, or supersedes any other provision of Federal law which authorizes an award of such fees and other expenses to any party other than the United States that prevails in any civil action brought by or against the United States.

(b) Section 206(b) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 406(b)(1)) shall not prevent an award of fees and other expenses under section 2412(d) of title 28, United states Code. Section 206(b)(2) of the Social Security Act shall not apply with respect to any such award but only if any fees collected by the claimant's attorney or withheld for such attorney pursuant to such section 206(b) are refunded to the claimant insofar as the fees relate to the same work for which the claimant's attorney is awarded fees under section 2412(d) of title 28, United States Code.

LIMITATION REPEALED

SEC. 204. Section 207 of the Equal Access to Justice Act is repealed.

APPLICATION OF ACT MODIFIED

SEC. 205. Section 208 of the Equal Access to Justice Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Awards may be made for fees incurred before October 1, 1981, in any such adversary adjudication or civil action.".

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 206. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, the amendments made by this Act shall be effective as of October 1, 1984, and shall apply to cases pending on such date.

(b) Section 504(b)(1)(C)(ii) of title 5, United States Code, as added by section 201 of this Act, and section 2412(d)(2)(E) of title 28, United States Code, as added by section 202(b) of this Act shall apply to any adversary adjudication which was pending on or commenced on or after October 1, 1981, in which applications for fees and expenses were timely filed and were dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

TITLE III—PAPERWORK REDUCTION

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 301. This title may be cited as the "Small Business Paperwork Reduction Act of 1985".

AMENDMENT TO THE PAPERWORK REDUCTION ACT OF 1980

SEC. 302. Section 3505 of title 44, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2),

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) upon enactment of this paragraph—

"(A) set a goal to reduce the then existing burden of Federal collections of information on small businesses (as defined in section 3 of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 632)) by not less than 5 per centum by October 1, 1986; and

"(B) for each of the next two years following, set a goal to reduce the burden which existed on October 1 of the previous year by not less than an additional 5 per centum.".

TITLE IV—AMENDMENTS TO THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954

SEC. 401. SHORT TITLE

This title may be cited as the "Small Business Tax Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 402. SUBSTANTIATION REQUIREMENTS FOR BUSINESS TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 274(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to substantiation requirements) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the case of listed property described in clause (i) or (ii) of section 280F(d)(4)(A) which is designed primarily for use on the highways, the first sentence shall be applied by substituting 'adequate records or by sufficient evidence corroborating the taxpayer's own statements' for 'adequate contemporaneous records'.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

SEC. 403. INCREASE IN HOLDING PERIOD REQUIRED FOR LONG-TERM CAPITAL GAIN TREATMENT.

Subsection (a) of section 1001 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 is amended by striking out "January 1, 1988" and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1, 1985".

SEC. 404. 80 PERCENT CAPITAL GAINS DEDUCTION ATTRIBUTABLE TO SMALL BUSINESS EQUITY INVESTMENTS HELD AT LEAST 3 YEARS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1202 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to deduction for capital gains) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (a) to read as follows:

"(a) DEDUCTION ALLOWED.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If for any taxable year a taxpayer other than a corporation has a net capital gain, there shall be allowed as a deduction from gross income an amount equal to the sum of—

"(A) 80 percent of the lesser of—

"(i) the net capital gain, or

"(ii) the qualified net capital gain, plus

"(B) 60 percent of the excess (if any) of—

"(i) the net capital gain, over

"(ii) the amount of the qualified net capital gain taken into account under subparagraph (A).", and

(2) by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) QUALIFIED NET CAPITAL GAIN.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term 'qualified net capital gain' means the amount of net capital gain which would be computed for any taxable year if, in determining net long-term capital gain for such taxable year, only small business equity investments held by the taxpayer for at least 3 years at the time of the sale or exchange were taken into account.

"(2) SMALL BUSINESS EQUITY INVESTMENTS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'small business equity investment' means any common or preferred stock of a small business.

"(B) STOCK IN THE NATURE OF DEBT EXCLUDED.—Stock shall not be treated as a small business equity investment if—

"(i) the payment of money or other property is required with respect to such stock solely by reason of the passage of time, or

"(ii) the repurchase of such stock may be required of the issuer solely by reason of the passage of time.

"(C) SMALL BUSINESS.—For purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—The term 'small business' means any small business corporation (within the meaning of section 1244(c)(3)).

"(ii) TIME FOR DETERMINING STATUS.—The determination of whether an equity investment is in a small business concern shall be made at the time when such investment is made.

"(3) REQUIREMENT OF 3-YEAR HOLDING PERIOD DETERMINED WITHOUT REGARD TO SECTION 1223.—The determination of whether a small business equity investment has been held for 3 years for purposes of this subsection shall be determined without regard to section 1223.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales or exchanges after December 31, 1984.

SEC. 405. INCREASE IN DIRECT EXPENSING OF CERTAIN DEPRECIABLE BUSINESS ASSETS.

The first item in the table in paragraph (1) of section 179(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to dollar limitation with regard to election to expense certain depreciable business assets) is amended to read as follows:

"1983 or 1984	$5,000
1985, 1986, or 1987	6,000".

SEC. 406. NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN ON ANY PROPERTY SOLD WHERE QUALIFIED SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACQUIRED.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part III of subchapter O of chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to nontaxable exchanges) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 1043. SALES OF PROPERTY WHERE QUALIFIED SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACQUIRED.

"(a) NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If any property is sold by the taxpayer and, within the 1-year period beginning on the date of such sale, any qualified small business investment is purchased by the taxpayer, gain (if any) from such sale shall, at the election of the taxpayer, be recognized only to the extent that the amount realized on such sale exceeds the cost to the taxpayer of such investment.

"(2) ELECTION.—The election under paragraph (1) shall be made by filing, not later than the last day prescribed by law (including extensions thereof) for filing the return of tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year in which the sale occurs, with the Secretary a statement (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of such election.

"(b) QUALIFIED SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified small business investment' means any equity stock in a domestic corporation if, at the time such stock is issued, such corporation was a qualified small business corporation.

"(2) EQUITY STOCK.—The term 'equity stock' means any common or preferred stock—

"(A) with respect to which the payment of money or other property is not required solely by reason of the passage of time,

"(B) the repurchase of which may not be required of the issuer any sooner than 3 years after the date of its purchase by the taxpayer, and

"(C) which was issued by the corporation to the taxpayer for money or other property (other than stock or securities).

"(3) QUALIFIED SMALL BUSINESS CORPORATION.—The term 'qualified small business corporation' means—

"(A) any small business investment company operating under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958,

"(B) any business development company (as defined by section 2(a)(48) of the Investment Company Act of 1940), and

"(C) any small business corporation (as defined in section 1244(c)(3)).

"(c) SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) EXCHANGE TREATED AS SALE.—An exchange by the taxpayer of property for other property shall be treated as a sale of the first property, and the acquisition of any qualified small business investment on the exchange of property shall be treated as a purchase of such investment.

"(2) LIMITATION ON STOCK SALES.—In the case of any qualified small business investment (other than stock in an S corporation as defined in section 1361(a)), subsection (a) shall apply to the sale of such stock only if such sale would, if such stock had been purchased by the issuing corporation in such sale, be treated as a redemption within the meaning of paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of section 302(b), including the application of section 302(c).

"(d) REDUCTION OF BASIS.—Where the purchase of any qualified small business investment results under subsection (a) in the nonrecognition of gain on the sale of any property, the basis of such investment shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount of gain not so recognized on the sale of such property. Where the purchase of more than one qualified small business investment is taken into account in the nonrecognition under subsection (a) of gain on the sale of a property, the preceding sentence shall be applied to each such investment in the order in which each such investment is purchased.

"(e) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—If the taxpayer during any taxable year sells any property at a gain, then—

"(1) the statutory period for the assessment of any deficiency attributable to any part of such gain shall not expire before the expiration of the 3-year period beginning on the date the Secretary is notified by the taxpayer (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of—

"(A) the taxpayer's cost of purchasing any qualified small business investment which the taxpayer claims results in nonrecognition of any part of such gain,

"(B) the taxpayer's intention not to purchase any such investment within the 1-year period described in subsection (a), or

"(C) the failure by the taxpayer to purchase any such investment within such period; and

"(2) such deficiency may be assessed before the expiration of such 3-year period notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or rule of law which would otherwise prevent such assessment.".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Subsection (a) of section 1016 of such Code (relating to adjustments to basis) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (26), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (27) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(28) in the case of any qualified small business investment the acquisition of which resulted under section 1043 in the nonrecognition of gain on the sale or exchange of property, to the extent provided by section 1043(d).".

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections of part III of subchapter O of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 1043. Sales of property where qualified small business investment acquired.".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply only to sales and exchanges of property (the nonrecognition of gain on which is to be claimed under section 1043 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

SEC. 407. APPLICATION OF THE REGULATORY FLEXIBILITY ACT TO THE INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) Section 601(2) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out "pursuant to section 553(b) of this title, or any other law".

(2) Section 603(a) of such title is amended by striking out "is required by section 553 of this title, or any other law, to publish" and inserting in lieu thereof "publishes".

(3) Section 604(a) of such title is amended by striking out "under section 553 of this title, after being required by that section or any other law to publish" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and "after publishing".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall be effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 397. A bill to amend the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act to modify the application of such acts to international commerce; to the committee on the Judiciary.

FOREIGN TRADE ANTITRUST IMPROVEMENTS ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation dealing with the serious economic and political problems that arise in applying United States antitrust laws to international trade and commerce.

Since the Sherman Act was first passed into law in 1890, U.S. antitrust laws have applied not only to commerce contained within the boundaries of the United States, but also to commerce with foreign nations. In many cases this is as it should be, for often transactions involving foreign firms or goods have a critical impact on the interests of the United States. Indeed, the importance to the United States of such foreign commerce has increased dramatically in recent years. The United States can and must stand ready to exercise its legislative and judicial power to avoid the substantial harm to American interests that can result from attempts by U.S. companies or foreign companies to subvert the free marketplace of the United States.

As the developed world has become more economically interdependent and the United States has come increasingly to rely upon its trading partners, however, the full exercise of U.S. power in implementing its antitrust laws to their full letter in international cases has caused substantial frictions with our foreign friends and allies. Such frictions can be seen, for example, in the shipping cases of the 1960's and 1970's, the uranium cases of the 1970's, and the air transportation cases now pending in the Federal courts. Without commenting on the merits of any of these disputes, it is clear that, just as the United States had some legitimate interest it believed that it was protecting, so too did our foreign trading partners. Sometimes these interests of foreign nations may be in regulating international commerce of vital importance to them in ways that are inconsistent with our methods of regulation; sometimes the difference is not so much in the substance of the regulation as it is in the legitimate desire of foreign nations to have the primary right to specify the rules by which the conduct of their citizens, or the actions of others primarily affecting their citizens, are to be judged. In either case, the simple and undeniable truth is that legitimate governmental interests can and do collide in certain cases where U.S. authorities seek to enforce the full letter of the present U.S. antitrust laws.

It is in the best interests of the United States and of its citizens to minimize the extent of the conflicts that arise in international antitrust cases. Vital foreign policy, defense, and commercial interests of the U.S. Government depend on our maintaining good relations—on a fair basis—with our allies and major trading partners. The American corporation that must rely upon imports from abroad or on exports to foreign nations cannot afford the substantial disruption of commercial relations that can result from such conflicts. A good example is the result difficulties that arose concerning the antitrust proceedings involving the air transportation industry on the North Atlantic. At one point the conflict was so great that airlines—including U.S. airlines—were threatened with the prospect of the British Government's blocking new, low air fares from going into effect. Such actions can hardly be seen as benefiting American business or consumers.

The U.S. corporation doing business abroad must also have some reassurance that it will not become caught in between the sometimes inconsistent regulatory responsibilities of governments. Even if a foreign government does not affirmatively require a U.S. corporation to do business in a way that could pose antitrust problems, the foreign government may well condone and encourage cooperative practices among competitors that the U.S. corporation ignores at its own business peril in the foreign market.

The legislation I am introducing today takes a first step toward minimizing conflicts in international antitrust without giving up the United States' right and duty in appropriate cases to deter and punish anticompetitive conduct that substantially jeopardizes its interests. I have consulted with various representatives of government, industry, the academia, and the bar both here and abroad concerning my proposals. These individuals have included such eminent experts as Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, former U.S. Attorney General and present general counsel of IBM; Warren Christopher, former Deputy Secretary of State and present partner in the law firm of O'Melveny & Myers; Dr. Claus-Dieter Ehlermann head of legal service of the Commission of the European Communities; and Donald F. Turner, former Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust and present counsel to the law firm of Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering. All have concurred that some steps such as these are badly needed in order to take a first step toward more stable, coherent international trading relations.

Proposals such as these have been discussed for some time, both within the executive branch and in the Congress. I note, for example, that in the excellent report in the treble damage remedy prepared by Mr. RODINO's committee in the House last year there were recommendations made for reform of antitrust treble damages in three areas: One, liability of municipalities; two, research and development joint ventures; and three, international antitrust cases. Since that time, Congress has taken effective action on the first two topics; the time has come for effective action on the third.

In April 1983, Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam stated that the executive branch was considering proposals to address the problems arising in the international context from private damage actions. No such proposals have been forwarded to the Congress, however.

The legislation consists of four principal sections, all of them directed toward private antitrust lawsuits, not governmental enforcement actions. I believe that the Department of Justice has shown itself to be sensitive to the foreign policy implications of antitrust enforcement and has moderated its enforcement activity accordingly. Private antitrust plaintiffs, not surprisingly, have demonstrated no such restraint.

First, my legislation provides that the standard for a U.S. court's asserting subject matter jurisdiction over an international antitrust case would be applied at least as a preliminary matter at an early stage in the proceeding. In 1982 Congress revised the antitrust laws to provide that those laws would not apply to conduct in foreign commerce unless the challenged action had a "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect" on U.S. commerce. This is a necessary minimal protection against application of U.S. antitrust laws to transactions of no real interest or concern to the United States. Under the current law, however, it is as a practical matter often quite difficult for the defendant to an antitrust action to bring an effective challenge to subject matter jurisdiction until after discovery in the action, has been substantially completed. Much of the damage to international relations, however, is often done by this late stage in the proceeding. The legislation I propose, therefore, would require U.S. courts to consider challenges to subject matter jurisdiction early in the proceeding.

Second, the legislation would provide that U.S. courts must upon request weigh the U.S. interests involved in the antitrust proceeding against those of the foreign nations involved and dismiss the action if the latter interests are stronger. This is to a large degree a codification of the approach certain U.S. courts have taken to the problem of "comity among nations" in international antitrust cases. Recent decisions of other U.S. courts, however, have cast doubt upon this approach and Congress should resolve the ambiguity promptly in order to minimize the conflicts I have described above.

Third, the legislation would provide that the common law doctrine of forum non conveniens would apply in antitrust cases. This doctrine, which generally provides that one court will dismiss a case that should be tried in another, more convenient and appropriate forum, is universally applied in cases under a variety of Federal laws. Recent decisions of certain courts, however, have suggested that the doctrine is inappropriate in antitrust cases because of a special solicitude for antitrust principles in the United States. Although the importance of competition in the United States cannot be overstated, we must recognize that some of our trading partners are similarly concerned with free markets and have laws that—while not identical in all respects with our antitrust laws—promote more substantially the same interests. Where this is the case and where a particular dispute plainly has more connections with a foreign forum than with the United States, courts should be free to apply the doctrine of forum non conveniens to send the case to its proper location for decision.

Finally, the legislation would provide that, in those cases where there is subject matter jursidiction, where U.S. interests predominate, and where the United States is the most appropriate forum, the U.S. court can rule that the action should go forward as one for single, rather than treble, damages, where doing so will substantially ameliorate any conflict with the interests of a foreign nation. One of the aspects of U.S. antitrust law that our foreign partners find most objectionable is our imposition of treble damages. To our minds such multiple damages may be appropriate to encourage the bringing of actions or to punish wrongdoers; to other governments, however, it is an abhorrent delegation of criminal prosecutory authority to private litigants without any effective check on how it is exercised. We should recognize that in some circumstances the best way to minimize destructive conflicts while preserving our interests in vigorous competition laws may be to take the middle road between dismissing the action altogether and letting it go forward for treble damages: Courts should be free to proceed, but for the lesser, single damages.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with a legal analysis of the bill's provisions.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 397

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvement Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 7 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 6a) is amended by—

(1) inserting "(a)" before "This Act"; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(b) Whenever a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under this section shall be made in any action under the antitrust laws, it shall be the duty of the judge designated to hear and determine the case to hear and determine such motion, after such discovery or other proceedings directly related to the motion as the court deems appropriate, before conducting or permitting the parties to conduct any further proceedings in the action.".

SEC. 3. The Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. et seq.) is amended by adding after section 20 the following new section:

"INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE

"SEC. 21. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of the antitrust laws or any provision of any State laws similar to the antitrust laws, in any action brought by any person or State under the antitrust laws or similar State laws and involving trade or commerce with a foreign nation, the court shall enter a judgment dismissing such action whenever it determines that the interests of the United States served by the action are outweighed by the interests of one or more foreign nations adversely affected by the action. Upon a request by the court, the Attorney General shall appear to set forth the views of the United States as to the effects of the action on the interests of the United States and on any affected foreign nation.

"(b) Whenever a motion to dismiss for interference with foreign national interests is made under this section in any action under the antitrust laws, it shall be the duty of the court, after discovery or other proceedings directly related to the motion as the court deems appropriate, to hear and determine such motion before conducting or permitting the parties to conduct any further proceedings in the action.".

SEC. 4. Section 12 of the Clayton Act is amended by—

(1) inserting "(a)" before "That suit"; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b) The doctrine of forum non conveniens shall be applicable in any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws that involves trade or commerce with a foreign nation, and nothing contained in this section or any other venue provision applicable to such suits, actions, or proceedings shall be construed to prevent dismissal of such suits, actions, or proceedings on the ground of forum non conveniens.".

SEC. 5. The Clayton Act is amended by adding after section 4H the following:

"FOREIGN TRADE

"SEC. 4I. (a) Notwithstanding sections 4 and 4C, and in lieu of the relief specified in such sections, and notwithstanding any provision of any State law providing damages for conduct similar to that forbidden by the antitrust laws, any person or State entitled to recovery on a claim under such section or provision shall recover (1) the actual damages sustained by such person or, in the case of a claim under section 4C, the total damage as described in subsection (a)(1) of such section, (2) interest calculated at the rate specified in section 1961 of title 28, United States Code, on such actual damages or total damage as specified in subsection (d) of section 4 of the National Cooperative Research Act of 1984 (15 U.S.C. 4303(d)), and (3) the cost of suit attributable to such claim, including a reasonable attorney's fee, if—

"(A) such claim results from conduct occurring in the course of trade or commerce with a foreign nation,

"(B) such claim is determined by the court to affect adversely and substantially the interests of a foreign nation, and

"(C) the court determines that the adverse effect of the claim on the interests of a foreign nation would be substantially reduced if the claim were limited to actual damages or total damages as provided herein.

Upon a request by the court, the Attorney General shall appear to set forth the views of the United States as to the effects of the claim and of the possible limitation of damages authorized herein on the interests of foreign nations.

"(b) Whenever a motion to limit damages as provided in this section is made in any action under the antitrust laws, it shall be the duty of the court to hear and determine such motion, after such discovery or other proceedings directly related to the motion as the court deems appropriate, before conducting or permitting the parties to conduct any further proceedings in the action.".

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1

Section 1 sets out the short title of the legislation: The Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvement Act of 1985. The title reflects the purpose of the legislation to rationalize further the application of U.S. antitrust law to U.S. foreign trade by supplementing the provisions of the 1982 Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act (Pub. L. No. 97-290, §§ 401-03, 96 Stat. 1246).

Section 2 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvement Act of 1985 clarifies the procedure by which subject matter jurisdiction is to be tested in antitrust actions involving commerce with foreign nations. As originally enacted, the Sherman Act applied to actions affecting "trade or commerce among the several States." (Similarly, both the Clayton Act and the FTC Act define "commerce" to include "commerce . . . with foreign nations.") Consistent with this broad language, United States courts have interpreted the antitrust laws to apply to all conduct, wherever it occurs, that has an effect on trade or commerce either within the United States or between the United States and foreign nations. In 1982, the Sherman and FTC Acts were amended to specify that their substantive restrictions would apply only to conduct that has a "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on domestic United States commerce, on United States import commerce, or on the export commerce of a United States person." See Pub. L. No. 97-920, §§ 401-03, 96 Stat. 1246.

Section 2 works no substantive change in the 1982 Act's provisions concerning antitrust subject matter jurisdiction. Instead, it is directed to the procedural difficulties that arise in attempting to give this language its intended effect. Defendants to antitrust actions often find that the courts are reluctant to consider whether they have subject matter jurisdiction over a dispute until after the parties have largely completed their discovery of facts from one another and from third parties.

Such delay in the consideration of whether subject matter jurisdiction exists is particularly objectionable in antitrust cases involving foreign commerce. Several of the United States' most important trading partners object to any assertion of jurisdiction based merely on the effects of the challenged conduct (rather than on the location of such conduct or the nationality of the actors). Although the 1982 revisions to the subject matter jurisdiction provisions of the antitrust laws could serve to ameliorate tensions with these trading parties by at least eliminating those cases where the effects on the U.S. are attenuated, such amelioration is stifled by the practical inability of the parties to bring the matter before the court for early resolution. Moreover, even those trading partners who do not object to assertion of "effects" jurisdiction as such may nevertheless object to the intrusions of prolonged United States antitrust litigation, particularly those intrusions arising from our unparalleled provisions for wide-ranging pre-trial discovery. There is little point in permitting such frictions to develop when they could be avoided or reduced by an early determination of subject matter jurisdiction.

Section 3 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act is intended to codify, and improve the operation of, the "jurisdictional rule of reason" in private antitrust actions involving commerce with foreign nations. This rule provides, in essence, that U.S. courts will not exercise jurisdiction over antitrust actions where the governmental interests of foreign nations would be adversely affected and where the U.S. antitrust interest is not sufficient to justify the injury to the foreign national interest. The jurisdiction rule of reason was first adopted by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in 1976 in the leading case of Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of America, 549 F.2d 597.

Prior to the Timberlane decision, U.S. courts would exercise jurisdiction over antitrust claims involving foreign conduct whenever the conduct had substantial effects on U.S. commerce. In Timberlane, however, the court ruled that even though U.S. antitrust jurisdiction might be present based on effects, that jurisdiction should only be exercised "base[d] * * * on * * * a decision that the United States is the nation primarily interested in the activity causing the effect." 549 F.2d at 611. Under Timberlane, "[i]t is * * * the relative involvement and concern of each state with the suit at hand that is to be evaluated in determining whether extraterritorial jurisdiction should be exercised by American courts as a matter of comity and fairness." 549 F.2d at 615 n.35. The decision is based upon the realization that "at some point the interests of the United States are too weak and the foreign harmony incentive for restraint too strong to justify an extraterritorial assertion of jurisdiction." 549 F.2d at 609.

The Timberlane decision has been followed by several other U.S. courts and has been widely praised by scholars, jurists and government officials both in the United States and in the nations that are our principal trading partners. It has also met with some criticism, however, and most recently these criticisms were collected in a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit attacking the jurisdictional rule of reason and threatening its further development by the courts. Laker Airways v. Sabena, Belgian World Airlines, 731 F.2d 909 (D.C. Cir. March 6, 1984).

The criticisms of the Timberlane jurisdictional rule of reason are basically of three kinds: (1) it is said that the factors enumerated by the Timberlane court and other authorities for balancing U.S. and foreign interests are not all useful for that purpose (for example, the "nationality of the parties," which is one of the factors to be considered, may be difficult to determine in the case of corporations and in any event may not be helpful in determining which nation is most affected by the parties' business conduct). (2) It is said that balancing national interests is a task for which courts are not well suited, and the political branches should have the primary responsibility for accommodating U.S. antitrust enforcement with the national interests of our trading partners. (3) Finally, it is stated that the jurisdictional rule of reason is not a rule of international law and that, absent statutory direction from Congress and the President, U.S. courts should not try to follow the rule.

It is the purpose of this section of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act to respond to these criticisms and establish the jurisdictional rule of reason as the rule of decision in private U.S. antitrust cases involving trade or commerce with foreign nations. The criticisms are dealt with in the order stated above.

(1) The various factors that the courts should take into account in balancing U.S. and foreign governmental interests in an international antitrust case have been enumerated in differing ways by the courts and by other authorities such as the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States. Obviously some of the factors in the different lists will be more helpful or less helpful than others in arriving at the reasonable jurisdictional result in a particular case. What factors are to be considered and what weight is to be given to them are for the courts to decide on a case-by-case basis. In codifying the jurisdictional rule of reason, the legislation does not therefore codify any particular list of factors or assign priorities to particular factors. Instead, it simply rests on the finding that the kinds of factors enumerated in the leading decisions and the authoritative commentaries can properly and usefully be considered by antitrust courts in balancing U.S. and foreign interests.

(2) The most serious criticism of the jurisdictional rule of reason is the claim that the balancing of national interests is too "political" for the courts. There are two responses: (a) in most cases, "political" considerations will play little if any role in the balancing judgment (as is demonstrated in the recent decision of the district court in Timberlane applying the jurisdictional rule of reason to dismiss an antitrust suit involving an alleged conspiracy to monopolize the Honduran lumber industry and interfere with the export of certain kinds of lumber to the United States. Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of Americas National Trust, 1984-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 65,775 (N.D. Cal. 1983), aff'd 1985-1 Trade Cas. ¶ 66,332 (9th Cir., Dec. 27, 1984); and (b) where political considerations are important (or where other information is needed from sources other than the parties themselves), this Section provides that the court may ask the Executive Branch to express its views for the assistance of the court. The Executive Branch can be expected to have consulted with affected foreign nations before expressing its views on the relative importance of U.S. and foreign interests. Foreign nations would remain free, as at present, to submit their views directly to the court, although in practice U.S. courts would probably follow the guidance of the Executive Branch should there be any conflict between the U.S. and the foreign nation in their assessments of the relative importance of the U.S. and foreign governmental interests.

(3) The core concern of the jurisdictional rule of reason—that a nation should not interfere with the interests of its trading partners through application of its competition law unless its greater national interest justifies it in doing so—is a principle of international law that can be derived from a fair examination of state practice in recent years. A leading European scholar has recently published an analysis of international antitrust practice in the U.S. and Europe over the past four decades in which he concludes that an accepted principle of international law is that "a state is prohibited from taking measures of antitrust law if the regulatory interests it is pursuing are outweighed by the interests of one or more foreign states likely to be seriously injured by those measures." Messen, Antitrust Jurisdiction Under Customary International Law, 78 Am. J. Int'l L. 783, 804 (1984). This principle is simply a matter of comity and common sense among nations engaged in mutually beneficial trade, and the United States will benefit if we adhere to this principle by moderating the exercise of our antitrust jurisdiction pursuant to the jurisdictional rule of reason enacted in this Section.

As with the existence of antitrust subject matter jurisdiction based on effects on U.S. markets, discussed above, the possibility that an antitrust action will adversely affect other nations' important interests should normally be considered by the court at an early stage of the litigation, to avoid the damage to foreign interests and U.S. foreign relations that can be caused by the pendency of the suit itself. As Section 2 does with the issue of subject matter jurisdiction, subsection (b) of this section provides for prompt decision under the jurisdictional rule of reason.

This section does not provide for the application of the jurisdictional rule of reason to antitrust actions brought by the Department of Justice or the Federal Trade Commission. Most knowledgeable observers are satisfied that the usual practice of the enforcement authorities of both these agencies is to take foreign interests adequately into account in determining whether and whom to investigate or sue and what relief to request. Where prosecutorial zeal threatens foreign interests and damages U.S. foreign relations, the President can remedy the situation, as he recently did in the North Atlantic air transport investigation.

Section 4 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act is intended to remove any uncertainty that the well-established doctrine of forum non conveniens, as expounded and applied by the Supreme Court in Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, 454 U.S. 235 (1981), is applicable to antitrust suits involving trade or commerce with foreign nations. Under this doctrine, a court may decline jurisdiction over a lawsuit, and send the plaintiff to an alternative forum, including a foreign forum, where trial of the lawsuit in the other forum would better serve the overall convenience of the parties and the courts and would be in the interests of justice.

After the Supreme Court decided in 1948 that the doctrine of forum non conveniens was not applicable to antitrust suits brought in a judicial district in which venue was proper under Section 12 of the Clayton Act (United States v. National City Lines I, 334 U.S. 543 (1948)), Congress enacted 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) providing that "[f]or the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice, a district court may transfer any civil action to any other district or division where it might have been brought." In National City Lines II, 337 U.S. 78 (1949), the Supreme Court held that this enactment made forum non conveniens principles applicable to antitrust actions, notwithstanding Section 12 of the Clayton Act.

Section 1404(a), however, applies the doctrine of forum non conveniens only where the more convenient alternative forum is another U.S. district court. Thus it was possible for a Court of Appeals to decide in 1982, notwithstanding Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, that National City Lines I is controlling, and forum non conveniens is not a ground for dismissing an antitrust suit, where the more convenient alternative forum is a foreign court. Industrial Investment Development Corp. v. Mitsui Co., 671 F.2d 876 (5th Cir. 1982) vacated on other grounds, 103 St. Ct. 1244 (1983). This decision has since been followed by at least one other lower court. Laker Airways Ltd. v. Pan American Airways, 568 F. Supp. 811 (D.D.C. 1983).

For fifty years, the doctrine of forum non conveniens has been fully applicable to the whole range of federal statutory actions (except antitrust), such as actions under the Lanham Act, Jones Act and Securities Exchange Act, as well as to admiralty, diversity and even constitutional claims. It is thus anomalous that in the field of foreign commerce only antitrust actions must be retained in U.S. courts even when convenience and justice would dictate that the plaintiff be remitted to the court of another nation. U.S. courts should not be prevented from closing their doors to forum-shopping foreign antitrust plaintiffs or, more generally, from requiring all antitrust plaintiffs, foreign and domestic, to litigate their claims in the forum that is, according to settled legal principles, the most appropriate one in which to try the case.

Because courts normally consider the question of forum non conveniens of any early stage of any lawsuit in which the issue is raised, Section 4 contains no provision parallel to Sections 2, 3(b), or 5(b) of the Act.

Section 5 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act limits the recovery of antitrust plaintiffs to actual damages, interest, and litigation costs in cases involving trade or commerce with a foreign nation where the claim asserted would, if upheld, have a substantial adverse effect on the interests of a foreign nation. In recent years various business transactions touching more than one nation's interests have given rise to challenges under the United States antitrust laws. These have included the notorious cases involving the shipping, airline and uranium industries, as well as a wide variety of other cases. Frequently these disputes have deeply troubled United States allies and trading partners because the strictly-applied U.S. antitrust laws are at odds with the form of business transactions encouraged by other nations. For example, while the United States was vigorously pursuing criminal and civil antitrust remedies against United States and European shipping companies in the late 1970s, several European countries were expressing their strong views that the shipping conferences being challenged had been determined by those nations to be in their best interests.

One of the aspects of United States antitrust enforcement that is most objectionable to our trading partners is what the British refer to as the "rogue elephant" of treble damages. Our allies view the treble damage provisions in the Clayton Act as making our laws promoting competition into criminal laws enforceable by private parties and their lawyers without prior review or approval by any court or government official. This is a practice largely unknown in other Western nations and makes the inevitable interference of United States competition laws with business transactions abroad particularly odious to other nations.

Until now, United States courts have had only two alternatives in dealing with conflicts between United States antitrust laws and the interests of foreign nations: Courts can either stop the action altogether (by imposing requirements such as the 1982 subject matter jurisdiction test or the jurisdictional rule of reason), or they can permit the action to go forward without limitation. Sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act enhance the courts' ability to use the tools of subject matter jurisdiction, the jurisdictional rule of reason, and forum non conveniens, respectively, to pursue the former course. Section 5 provides an additional, new alternative available in cases where the court determines that, despite the substantial adverse effect on the interests of a foreign nation, on balance the action should nevertheless go forward. In such cases the degree of conflict with the adversely affected foreign nation often can be substantially ameliorated by the court's limiting recovery in the action to single, compensatory damages alone. Section 5 provides the necessary authority.

Subsection (b) once again provides for prompt resolution of an issue that may reduce the injury to U.S. trading relations that would otherwise result from a private antitrust action.

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. GOLDWATER):

S. 399. A bill to designate the Phoenix Veterans' Administration Medical Center, located in Phoenix, AZ, as the "Carl T. Hayden Veterans' Administration Medical Center"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

CARL T. HAYDEN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MEDICAL CENTER

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which would designate the Phoenix Veterans' Administration Medical Center as the "Carl T. Hayden Veterans' Administration Medical Center." I am pleased that Senator GOLDWATER, a longtime friend and colleague of former Senator Hayden, is joining me in sponsoring this bill.

Carl T. Hayden was a native Arizonan, born at Hayden's Ferry (now Tempe) on October 2, 1877. He graduated from the Normal School of Arizona in 1896 and continued his education at Stanford University. After completing his education, Carl Hayden went into the flour milling business in Arizona where he immediately became involved in local political and community activities. He held local office as a member of the Tempe Town Council, as treasurer of Maricopa County and, later, as sheriff of that county.

Upon the admission of Arizona as the last State in the Union in 1912, Carl Hayden was elected as Arizona's first Representative to the U.S. Congress. He served in that capacity from 1912-27. In 1926, he was elected to the U.S. Senate where he served with honor and distinction until his retirement in 1969. During the last 11 years of service in the Senate, he was President pro tempore.

Carl Hayden's illustrious congressional career spanned almost 60 years. He was not only a witness to, but an active participant in the great political debates and decisions of the 20th century—World War I, the Great Depression, the New Deal, World War II, the New Frontier, the Great Society, the Korean and Vietnam wars. I can think of no individual whose life epitomized the very best in public service. He was a caring, compassionate and principled public servant. He represented the State of Arizona virtually all his adult life and all Arizonans take great pride in the job he performed both for the State and for the Nation.

During the First World War, Carl Hayden was a major in the infantry. He never forgot that experience and became a champion of the system of programs and benefits established to assist our veterans. As chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee for 14 years, Carl Hayden played a crucial role in funding these programs and in the establishment of the three Veterans' Administration hospitals in Arizona.

His lifelong career of service to these veterans merits recognition and it is a fitting tribute to rename the Phoenix Veterans' Administration Medical Center in his honor. In addition, it would provide that center with an identity in which all veterans, hospital personnel, and the community could take great pride.

I urge all my colleagues to join with Senator GOLDWATER and myself in support of this legislation.

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 400. A bill to provide health promotion and disease prevention services to Indians; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN HEALTH PROMOTION AND DISEASE PREVENTION ACT

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, in the last Congress I introduced or supported several legislative items designed to help Americans lead healthier life styles. The bill I am introducing today is in line with those efforts and, I hope, will complement broader Federal health promotion and disease prevention strategies. My legislation is the Indian Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Act of 1985. It focuses on an obvious but neglected aspect of Indian health care delivery—preventive services.

Recently, my distinguished colleague, Senator MARK ANDREWS, reintroduced the Indian Health Care Amendments of 1985, which emphasizes health promotion and disease prevention. I am gratified that the sponsors of that bill agreed to add three major provisions which I suggested, and which are identical to those in this bill.

The three provisions are: First, development of a health promotion and disease prevention Indian health policy; second, inclusion of health promotion and disease prevention services within the Indian Health Service, and; third, continuation and improvement of the Community Health Representative Program as the vehicle to carry out such health promotion activities.

Although these new sections were incorporated into the main bill, they do not go far enough unless a demonstration project is also established to develop and implement them. My bill authorizes a demonstration project to develop the most effective and cost efficient means of providing health promotion and disease prevention services. I believe the demonstration project authority is vitally needed to improve Indian health care and, in the long run, to reduce health care costs. As the report accompanying the Senate version, S. 2166, found:

Although significant gains have been realized in improving the health status of Indian and Alaska Native people since the passage of the act in 1976, health status parity with the general U.S. population has yet to be achieved.

If we are still trying to reach health status parity for American Indians, then primary health care delivery is the best way to do that. As a result, the IHS budget focuses on primary health care. And it is important that IHS continue providing such care. However, the leading causes of IHS hospital admissions are those in which health promotion and disease prevention can be the most effective. These include: Pregnancy complications, injuries and poisonings, and digestive and respiratory system diseases. Health promotion and disease preventive activities can help reduce such admissions.

Therefore, in the long term IHS needs to aggressively pursue a comprehensive health promotion strategy, including programs for nutrition and physical fitness, control of high blood pressure, reduced use of alcohol and drugs, and other behavioral changes that individuals can make to reduce the risk of disease.

The Surgeon General, in the landmark publication Healthy People, challenged the Federal Government to take the lead in setting priorities and goals for health prevention activities, and to assure that preventive services are made available to high risk groups on a priority basis. In Indian health care, the Federal responsibility to American Indians is even greater. We need to meet that challenge, and this bill is a first step.

I am persuaded that part of the solution to our rising health care costs, and one way to improve health care delivery, is to better educate people how to take care of themselves. We need this approach at all levels of society and throughout the Federal health care delivery system. The IHS can only advance its goals and services, and save money with this new health promotion and disease prevention focus.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this bill which will improve the health and well-being of Indian people nationwide.

By Mr. PELL (for himself and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 401. A bill to require the Secretary of Defense to establish an accounting procedure within the Department of Defense to identify and control expenditures for advisory and assistance services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

CONTROL OF EXPENDITURES FOR ADVISORY AND ASSISTANCE SERVICES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill for temporary relief of contractors providing support services for the Department of Defense who appear to be unduly and adversely affected by the so-called Mattingly cap on expenditures for contract services.

The cap was designed for an altogether worthy purpose, namely, to curb unwarranted, excessive, and sometimes uncontrolled expenditures for contract services by the Armed Forces. I support that objective wholeheartedly, particularly at this time of excessive military budgets. However, I must observe that this particular cap is being implemented in ways that may not have been foreseen or intended at the time the 1985 Defense authorization bill was enacted.

Specifically, and at least in the case of the Navy in my State, the cap has prompted an across-the-board slowdown in the funding of contracted services, irrespective of the merits or relative urgency of the programs involved. In Rhode Island and particularly on Aquidneck Island where the Newport Navy base is located, this has had a very adverse impact on a community of contracting firms employing up to 5,000 persons, which provide technical services supporting training, undersea research, and weapons systems, and which therefore contribute directly to the readiness of naval units. As funding has been interrupted and deferred, work has stopped and layoffs have been scheduled; a sense of uncertainty prevails and some firms are in danger of losing their skilled work force.

There appears to be concensus that the situation has arisen because the cap lacked sufficient specificity and that without clear definitions to guide them, the armed services, and particularly the Navy, applied stringent restraints across the board.

The bill I am submitting today would repeal the cap but would direct the Secretary of Defense to provide within 180 days a standardized auditing procedure for identifying and controlling expenditures in subsequent fiscal years. In this way we can assure that restraints can be imposed in an orderly and reasonable way, taking into account specified standards without disrupting work already contracted for and in progress. Similar legislation has been introduced in the House by Representative DYSON of Maryland and I commend him for his initiative in this troublesome matter.●

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 402. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to provide for specialized equipment for telephone service to certain disabled persons; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

TELEPHONE EQUIPMENT FOR SERVICE TO CERTAIN DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to strengthen and simplify the Telecommunications for the Disabled Act of 1982. Action on this measure will improve telephone communication service for the hearing-impaired.

Equal opportunities for the handicapped continue to be one of our highest priorities. We have made great strides in educational opportunities, accessibility standards, and employment opportunities. With the passage of the 1982 Telecommunications Act, we began to provide the handicapped with the access to the telephone that they need to carry on their jobs, communicate with their loved ones, and obtain emergency assistance.

With the 1951 production of a telephone receiver that is hearing-aid compatible, access became feasible. Many manufacturers voluntarily made their phones compatible. However, telephones continue to be manufactured which are not accessible to the hearing-impaired.

While many of us living in a fast-paced society may wish that the telephone didn't exist, we are all aware of its importance in our lives. Imagine the feeling we would experience if, given a deadline to complete information-finding tasks, we suddenly did not have the telephone. Furthermore, consider the problems faced by a senior citizen who has a hearing impairment. Our shut-ins depend on the telephone to obtain emergency medical assistance.

Passage of S. 402 will provide the incentive needed to make all new telephones hearing-aid compatible. This legislation does not ask for any retrofitting. No replacement cost is involved. All we would do is make the future brighter. We would remove the need for Federal Communications Commission enforcement of Public Law 97-410.

Under the legislation passed in the 97th Congress, regulations were approved requiring all coin telephones, emergency use telephones, and telephones needed to signal life-threatening or emergency situations to be hearing-aid compatible. Hospital rooms, residential health care facilities, convalescent homes, and prisons also were required to provide a compatible telephone. While the legislation passed by the 97th Congress also required at least 10 percent of the rooms in hotels and motels to contain hearing aid-compatible phones, the enforcement of this requirement is difficult.

If the hearing-impaired are to have the same right to access that we enjoy, all new telephones manufactured in this country should make use of the present technology. This would remove yet another barrier faced by the hearing-impaired. With nearly 13 percent of our population made up of senior citizens, many of whom have difficulty hearing, this change is one which could result in budget savings. Many of our elderly could remain in their own homes longer if their telephones could provide them access to community health care facilities.

With approval of S. 402, Congress also would provide State commissions with the authority to regulate the distribution of specialized customer-premises equipment needed by the disabled. This equipment includes the artificial larynx, telephone handsets with built-in amplifiers, and speaker phones and miscellaneous equipment. Under current law, a patchwork pattern of distribution has grown up throughout the country. Some State commissions have totally deregulated this equipment. Others require specialized customer-premises equipment to be provided under commission regulation, subject to approved tariffs. Some commissions retain regulatory authority over new orders for specialized customer-premises equipment while deregulating equipment on monthly rental to customers. Several State commissions have ordered the return to local phone companies of specialized customer-premises equipment which was transferred to AT&T on January 1, 1984. In these States, the local companies provide specialized customer-premises equipment under commission-approved tariffs.

This confusing situation has created a great deal of frustration among disabled telephone customers—many do not know where to turn to obtain needed equipment; prices vary from State to State; availability is uncertain; slow deliveries create hardship; and repair service is difficult to find. What was a smooth supply of specialized customer-premises equipment through 1983, under State commission-approved tariff rates with assured availability and repair service, has become a costly source of irritation and deprivation. This bill attempts to substitute order for today's chaos by making mandatory State commission regulation of specialized customer-premises equipment. A subsidy of specialized customer-premises equipment from the carrier's general revenues also is allowed.

With the passage of S. 402, we may at last bring to an end the discrimination that continues to exist for the hearing-impaired. Once enacted, this bill could mean that those with hearing difficulties may begin to share the precious freedom of communication. With this bill, we will gradually remove the nonhearing aid-compatible telephones in the communications network. Through attrition and through voluntary modifications, we will bring a new, fuller life to the hearing-impaired.

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 403. A bill to amend the Federal Power Act to establish policy and procedures to guide the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in the issuance of new licenses to operate existing hydroelectric facilities; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HYDROELECTRIC FACILITIES RELICENSING AMENDMENTS

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that addresses the issue of hydroelectric project relicensing. My bill is identical to a bill I introduced in the 98th Congress, S. 2711.

Before I describe my bill, let me provide some background. Private utilities are currently operating 168 hydroelectric projects under Federal licenses that will expire within the next 10 years. Public utilities would like to take over some of these projects when they are relicensed. As a result, private utilities and public utilities are in court to determine if existing law provides a preference for public utilities when hydroelectric projects currently licensed to private utilities are relicensed. At the same time, the private utilities want Congress to amend the law to make it clear that a preference for public utilities does not exist in such instances.

The projects at stake within the next 10 years have a total installed capacity of about 3 million kilowatts, the equivalent of three average nuclear powerplants. Although this is a small amount of capacity from a national perspective, these projects generate extremely low-cost electricity that is very important to certain utility systems, particularly in California.

The relevant law is part I of the Federal Power Act, originally enacted in 1920 as the Federal Water Power Act. That act established the Federal Power Commission, now the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and empowered it to issue licenses for the construction and operation of hydroelectric projects on the Nation's navigable rivers. These licenses may be issued for a maximum of 50 years.

The act clearly requires the Commission to give preference to States and municipalities over private utilities in the issuance of original licenses where the applications filed are equally well adapted, 16 U.S.C. 800(a). In other words, the preference provision acts as a tie breaker.

When an original license expires, the United States has the option of taking over the project and thereafter operating it. If the United States chooses not to take over the project, the Commission may issue a new license to either the original licensee or to another license applicant. If the new license is issued to an applicant other than the original licensee, the new licensee is required to pay to the original licensee an amount equal to the original licensee's net investment.

Many original licenses have now expired or are about to expire; consequently, the Commission is in the process of relicensing these facilities. The crucial legal issue is whether the preference for public bodies that applies in the issuance of original licenses also applies when projects are relicensed.

Because the act is not entirely clear on this issue, the Commission has vascillated in its interpretation of the relevant provisions. In 1968, the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission testified before Congress that the preference provision does not apply in relicensing proceedings where the competition is between a State or municipality and the original licensee.

Then, in June 1980, the Commission issued an opinion that the public preference does apply in such instances. That case, known as the Bountiful decision, arose in response to a request by the city of Bountiful, UT, for a legal interpretation of the act. The Commission unanimously declared that the statutory preference for States and municipalities applies to all competitive relicensing proceedings. In other words, a public utility would receive the new license if it submits a plan that is equally well adapted to the plan submitted by the private utility that held the original license. This interpretation was affirmed by the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals, and the Supreme Court declined review.

But then, on October 6, 1983, the Commission overruled the Bountiful decision. That decision involved the relicensing of the Merwin Dam in Washington State. The original license for Merwin Dam was held by a private utility. When the original license expired, the private utility applied for a new license and was challenged by a public utility. The majority of the Commission held that the public preference does not apply where the existing licensee is an applicant in the relicensing proceedings. The Merwin decision has been appealed by the public utility to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where a decision is expected soon.

Meanwhile, during the 98th Congress, two bills were introduced in the Senate, S. 2710 and S. 2711. S. 2710 was introduced by Senator WALLOP and others; it provided that a public preference does not exist with respect to relicensing and would have required that any successful challenger to an existing licensee pay the existing licensee just compensation. My bill, S. 2711, would have created a presumption in favor of the existing licensee but did not include a just compensation provision. No hearings were held.

In formulating my own views on this matter, I start from the premise that we should seek to avoid unnecessary economic disruptions and dislocations to electric consumers. I believe that a hydroelectric project should change hands only if the interests of electric consumers are thereby better served in some tangible way. I also believe that the utility industry needs to have this uncertain area of law resolved, and that Congress should decide the issue, not the courts.

To this end, my bill makes it clear that a preference for public bodies does not apply on relicensing. Instead, my bill provides a presumption in favor of the existing licensee. It provides that the existing licensee, whether public or private, will receive the new license upon relicensing unless another applicant comes forward with plans that are better adapted to serve the public interest. If the existing licensee does not apply for a new license, the new license would be issued to the applicant who submits the plans that are best adapted to serve the public interest.

My bill also sets out four criteria to be used by the Commission in making the public interest determination. The first criterion basically restates a requirement in existing law that the Commission consider the plans of each applicant to develop, conserve, and utilize in the public interest the water resources of the region. The second criterion is a new requirement that the Commission consider the relative economic impact upon customers served by each license applicant if such applicant were to fail to receive the license. I believe that this criterion should be in the law in order to insure that the Commission fully considers the economic consequences of issuing a license to one applicant over another. The third criterion places emphasis on the ability of the applicant to operate and maintain the project in a manner most likely to provide efficient, reliable electric service.

Finally, the fourth criterion requires the Commission to consider the need of each applicant for the electricity generated by the project to serve its existing customers. This is intended to deter those utilities who do not need additional electricity but who would nevertheless seek a license for the purpose of reselling the power at a profit.

I am not wedded to these particular criteria. I am entirely open to suggested improvements. But I do believe that Congress should carefully articulate the criteria that should be considered by the Commission in relicensing hydroelectric facilities. I also believe that those criteria should reflect today's needs, not those that existed when Congress enacted the Federal Water Power Act over 60 years ago.

Before closing, I want to note something that my bill does not do. My bill does not change existing law with respect to the measure of compensation to be paid when an existing licensee does not receive the new license in a relicensing proceeding. Under existing law, the new licensee must only pay an amount equal to the existing licensee's net investment in the project. Under S. 2710, in the 98th Congress, the new licensee would have been required to pay "just compensation in an amount that the Commission shall determine in accordance with due process of law."

I have several reasons for not including this provision in my bill. First, I think that such a provision would snarl the relicensing process in endless litigation unless Congress is prepared to spend a substantial amount of time nailing down every detail of its meaning. For example, what does just compensation mean in this context? If it means fair market value, what does this include? Would it include the fair market value of the physical facility only? If so, what is the value of the physical facility in the absence of the falling water? On the other hand, perhaps just compensation includes the fair market value of the electricity that will be generated at the site over the term of the new license. If so, how would such electricity be valued?

Besides the complex legal problems raised by a just compensation provision, I also have serious doubts about whether the provision is sound policy. The private utilities that currently hold licenses knew from the outset that they would be compensated only for their net investment if they did not receive the successor license. Presumably they have done their financial planning with this fact in mind. But now they would like to amend the law to provide a much higher level of compensation. Is that fair?

Finally, I don't think that a well-run electric utility needs a just compensation provision in the context of my bill. My bill creates a presumption in favor of the existing licensee. This means that the existing licensee will receive the new license unless another utility comes forward with a better plan. I'm confident that a well-run existing licensee will almost always prevail under this test. Only a inept existing licensee is likely to lose, and in such a case I don't think that the existing licensee deserves anything more than the compensation for "net investment" provided by existing law.

Mr. President, I look forward to early hearings on the issue of hydroelectric project relicensing.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 403

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Hydroelectric Facility Relicensing Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 7(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 800 (a)) is amended—

(a) by inserting "original" after "hereunder or"; and

(b) by striking "and in issuing licenses to new licensees under section 15 hereof".

SEC. 3. Section 15 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 808) is amended—

(a) by striking subsection (a) through "terms and conditions to a new licensee," and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 15. (a) If the United States does not, at the expiration of the existing license, exercise its right to take over any project or projects of the licensee, as provided in section 14, the Commission may issue a new license to the existing licensee or to a new licensee. If the existing licensee applies for a new license, the Commission shall issue a new license to such existing licensee unless the Commission determines that the plans of another applicant are better adapted to serve the public interest. If the existing licensee does not apply for a new license, the Commission shall issue a new license to the applicant the plans of which are best adapted to serve the public interest. The Commission shall not issue a license unless it is satisfied that the applicant is able to carry out such plans.

"(b) In making a determination of the public interest under subsection (a), the Commission shall consider:

"(1) the plans of each applicant to develop, conserve, and utilize in the public interest the water resources of the region;

"(2) the relative economic impact upon customers served by each applicant upon the failure of such applicant to receive the license;

"(3) the ability of each applicant to operate and maintain the project in a manner most likely to provide efficient, reliable electric service; and

"(4) the need of each applicant for the electricity generated by the project or projects to serve its existing customers.";

(b) by redesignating the remainder of subsection (a) as subsection (c);

(c) by striking "which license" and inserting in lieu thereof "A license issued under this section"; and

(d) by redesignating existing subsection (b) as subsection (d).●

By Mr. FORD:

S. 404. A bill to designate the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Ashland, KY, as the "Carl D. Perkins Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse"; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CARL D. PERKINS FEDERAL BUILDING AND U.S. COURTHOUSE

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation in honor of the late Carl D. Perkins, who represented Kentucky's Seventh Congressional District in the U.S. House of Representatives for nearly 36 years before his untimely death on August 3, 1984. This bill would designate the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Ashland, KY, as the "Carl D. Perkins Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse."

Identical legislation passed the House by unanimous consent last year and was reported from the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, only to die on the calendar in the last minutes of the session for reasons unrelated to its merits. My colleague from Kentucky, Congressman NATCHER, reintroduced the bill in the House at the beginning of the 99th Congress and I am following suit in my side of the Capitol.

I cannot stress how appropriate this gesture would be. Carl Perkins represented the mountain hollows, the towns and cities such as Ashland with a devotion and affection of near-legendary proportions. He loved his people, and never stopped fighting for them.

Those of us who had the privilege of serving with Congressman Perkins know of his unyielding dedication to improving the quality of life, both in Appalachia and around the Nation.

Children across America have been able to rise above the poverty and deprivation of their surroundings through some of the educational programs for which he fought long and hard, particularly vocational training.

As a member, and, later, chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, Representative Perkins was a key force behind the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, which created remedial help for disadvantaged children and provided aid for school libraries.

He was also one of the fathers of the Appalachian Regional Commission, which has helped some of the poorest sections of eastern Kentucky and other States obtain badly needed roads and hospitals.

Carl Perkins never forgot from where he came. He went home often, traveling the backroads of his district, chatting with and listening to his constituents.

Such commitment is not easily forgotten. And recognition of Carl Perkins, through passage of this bill, would be a fitting tribute to his strength and character.

I urge my colleagues on the Environment and Public Works Committee to take an early look at this legislation and to expedite its passage through the Senate.●

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 407. A bill to amend title 13, United States Code, to provide for grants to State and local governments to assist in eliminating census undercounts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CENSUS AWARENESS AND ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which addresses the problems associated with the undercounting of minorities by the Census Bureau. The bill calls for the creation of a census awareness program to increase citizen awareness on the importance of the census in order to reduce undercounts.

Over 100 billion dollars' worth of governmental funds are distributed based upon census information. However, there is a serious question as to the reliability of the population data which is used. According to authorities, a serious undercount of the actual numbers of minorities now exists. The Census Bureau estimates that as much as 1 to 2 percent of the entire population was missed in 1980, with the highest concentration among minorities. Approximately 4.5 percent of those not counted in 1980 are black and 3.5 to 4 percent Hispanic. This undercount acts to shortchange cities and States where there are large concentrations of minority citizens.

This legislation is designed to assist in correcting this problem. During the 98th Congress, hearings were held by the Subcommittee on Census and Population of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. The hearings focused primarily on the problems associated with the census undercount. According to the hearing record, nearly every State and many large cities spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in 1980 in an attempt to increase citizen awareness of the need to participate in the census. Efforts to reduce the undercount were also made by the Census Bureau. Yet despite these efforts, while the total number of persons uncounted in the 1980 decennial census decreased, the number of minorities uncounted in comparision to nonminorities remained approximately 4 to 1; no change since the 1970 census.

As more information is known about how our population is changing, even greater efforts must be made to improve the accuracy of population information. The proportion of minority groups, particularly foreign born, is growing at a rapid pace. Between 1970 and 1980 our foreign born population rose from slightly under 10 million to more than 14 million, 6 percent of the total population. Approximately 10 percent of our central city population were foreign born in 1980.

The Hispanic population is also growing at a rapid pace, representing about 6.4 percent of the total U.S. population in 1980. The Census Bureau reported 9 million Hispanics in 1970 and 14.6 million in 1980, a 61-percent increase since 1970. While this is considered the most accurate count ever, it is believed to be significantly lower than actual totals. Other minority groups are in a similar situation despite the efforts of the Census Bureau to reach these groups.

It is obvious, regardless of efforts by State and local governments and the Census Bureau, more needs to be done to get to the root of the problem of the undercount.

According to Arnoldo S. Torres, national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, there are several reasons for the undercount, including fear, hostility, and apathy among minority citizens. However, it is believed that steps can be taken to improve accuracy through greater promotional campaigns directed at the existing negative perceptions. Assurances of confidentiality also must be maintained and local, State, regional, and national efforts must be made to address the problems of undercounting. Of course, if possible current methodologies must continue to be improved.

The Census Awareness and Accountability Act of 1985 addresses these needs and is a necessary step toward the reduction of the census undercount which now exists. It authorizes the creation of a 5-year Census Bureau grant program to State and local governments to plan, develop, and operate State and local minority advisory committees intended to increase citizen awareness and cooperation for compiling population data necessary to complete the 1990 decennial census. Funding levels for the program would be set at $20 million for fiscal years 1986–89 and $50 million for fiscal year 1990, subject to annual review and appropriations. The bill further instructs the Director of the Bureau of the Census to issue rules and regulations to govern distribution of all appropriated funds. The Secretary of Commerce is also required to report to Congress prior to the 1990 census on intended procedures for correcting undercounting or overcounting.

I hope this legislation will receive thorough and prompt consideration by the Senate. The 1990 census is only 5 years away. As the importance of the census and population data increases steps must be taken to improve its accuracy. The undercount, while it cannot be eliminated, can be minimized and compensated for. I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 407

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Census Awareness and Accountability Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 141(f) of title 13, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2); and

(2) by striking out paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(3) not later than 18 months before the appropriate census date, a report containing the Secretary's determination concerning the procedures, if any, for estimating and adjusting for any overcount or undercount in any tabulation of total population by State or other geographic area which may occur in such census (including the estimated total cost and the projected timetable for carrying out any such procedures, and the characteristics of any population groups particularly affected by or involved in the overcount or undercount); and

"(4) after submission of a report under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this subsection and before the appropriate census date, if the Secretary finds new circumstances exist which necessitate that the subjects, types of information, questions, or procedures (or any cost estimate, timetable, or population description accompanying such procedures) contained in the report so submitted be modified, a report containing the Secretary's determination of the subjects, types of information, questions, or procedures (or accompanying matter) as proposed to be modified.".

SEC. 3. (a) Title 13, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 141 the following new section:

"§ 141a. Grants

"(a) The Secretary shall establish a program to provide grants to States and local units of general purpose government in order to promote activities designed to minimize the extent of any undercounts which may occur in the decennial census of population conducted under section 141(a) of this title in 1990.

"(b) Grants under this section may be made only if appropriate written application is submitted at such time, in such manner, and complete with such information, as the Secretary may by regulation require.

"(c) The Secretary shall consult with the Director of the Census in making a determination with respect to any application under this section and in otherwise carrying out the requirements of this section.

"(d) A grant under this section—

"(1) shall be paid from sums available under subsection (e) of this section; and

"(2) shall be made in such amount as may be approved by the Secretary, except that—

"(A) in each of fiscal years 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989, not more than $500,000 may be awarded with respect to any State (including any local units of general purpose government within such State) in such fiscal year; and

"(B) in fiscal year 1990, not more than $1,000,000 may be awarded with respect to any State (including any local units of general purpose government within such State) in such fiscal year.

"(e) There are authorized to be appropriated $20,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989, and $50,000,000 for fiscal year 1990, in order to carry out this section.

"(f) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'State' means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands; and

"(2) the term 'local unit of general purpose government' has the meaning given such term under section 184 of this title.".

(b) The analysis for chapter 5 of title 13, United States Code, is amended by adding after the item relating to section 141 the following new item:

"141a. Grants.".

By Mr. WEICKER (for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. SASSER, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. PRESSLER, and Mr. DIXON):

S. 408. A bill to amend the Small Business Act to provide program levels, salary and expense levels, and authorizations for the Small Business Administration's programs for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Small Business.

SMALL BUSINESS AUTHORIZATION LEGISLATION

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, today, I, along with the ranking member of the committee, Senator BUMPERS, Senator D'AMATO, Senator RUDMAN, Senator NUNN, Senator SASSER, and Senator KASTEN, are introducing legislation to provide program levels and authorizations for programs at the Small Business Administration [SBA] for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

The provisions set forth in this bill maintain effective financial and management assistance programs that have been responsive to the needs of the small business community. Yet, given the highest deficit this Nation has ever known, the bill reflects our strong desire to show fiscal responsibility with the funding of the SBA and its programs. Therefore, this legislation eliminates most of the direct lending programs at SBA including the General Business, Economic Opportunity, Energy, and 501 Company Loans. Thus, substantial savings are achieved by reducing SBA's direct lending program level from $257 million to $86 million in fiscal year 1986. This results in an approximate dollar for dollar savings in budget authority.

The funding for the guaranteed loan programs for fiscal year 1986 are frozen at the fiscal year 1985 level. In fiscal years 1987 and 1988 there is simply a modest increase in the SBA program levels consistent with the inflation factor used by CBO for all Government programs.

Mr. President, the following chart provides a detailed breakdown, by program, of SBA lending activities, their program level in this fiscal year, and the recommended levels in fiscal year 1986:

BUSINESS LOAN AND INVESTMENT FUND SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PROGRAM LEVELS

Mr. President, additional substantial savings are also achieved in our bill through eliminating SBA's Nonphysical Disaster Loan Program. This program, eliminated by Congress in 1981, was not only reauthorized by Congress last year, but two new Nonphysical Disaster Loan Programs were created, over my strenuous objection, at a cost of $100 million per year. In times of budget deficits soaring over $200 billion annually, programs such as this are simply not warranted.

Mr. President, the programs mentioned in our bill are those that the Senate Small Business Committee over the past few years has urged the SBA to emphasize. Specifically, the Bank Guaranteed Lending, Small Business Investment Company [SBIC], and 503 Development Company, are all fully funded at fiscal year 1985 levels. These are programs that effectively utilize private sector resources and expertise. This public-private partnership allows small firms to have access to capital, otherwise unavailable. By opening these capital pools to small business, we have witnessed economic growth, community revitalization and job creation.

SBIC'S AND MESBIC'S

The Committee has traditionally supported adequate funding for the SBA Small Business Investment Company [SBIC] and Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Company [MESBIC] Programs. SBIC's and MESBIC's are SBA-licensed companies which, through a private and public sector partnership, provide equity capital, long-term loans and management assistance to small business concerns and to small business concerns owned by socially or economically disadvantaged persons.

In return for a commitment to invest in small businesses, SBIC's are licensed by SBA and authorized to issue a debenture which is guaranteed by the Federal Government at the full cost of money to the Treasury, plus a premium; MESBIC's, which go through the same licensing procedure, obtain leverage capital from the Government through the purchases of preferred securities in the MESBIC itself and through debentures. To be currently licensed as an SBIC or MESBIC, the company must first have a minimum of $500,000 in private sector, paid-in capital. Before an SBIC can leverage any funds, it must have first committed at least 60 percent of its own capital to investments in small business concerns.

SBA Administrator James C. Sanders has testified before the Small Business Committee "that this innovative program has succeeded in providing unique and much needed assistance to small businesses." He called the benefits of the program "impressive," and said that since its inception, nearly $4.5 billion of financial assistance has been provided to more than 66,000 small concerns. These firms in turn have produced jobs, economic gains, and tax revenues far exceeding the Government's cost of operating the program, according to Sanders.

As part of their internal evaluation of the program, SBA tracked the growth of 100 small business recipients of SBIC financing through their participation in the SBIC portfolio. The agency found substantial improvements in the employment, sales, profits, and assets of these client firms. After tracking these portfolio companies for 6 years, SBA found that they had increased employment by a net 1,866 jobs at the end of that period. These 100 firms received initial SBIC disbursements of $12.2 million and benefited from an estimated $40 million of SBIC financing

SECTION 503 CERTIFIED DEVELOPMENT COMPANY LOAN PROGRAM

The Small Business Administration's section 503 Certified Development Company Program is one of the Federal Government's primary economic development programs. The section 503 Program enacted in 1980, was designed to make the SBA an active partner with State and local governments and the private sector in making long-term capital available for small business expansion and job creation. The 503 Program is already playing an important role in revitalizing local communities across the Nation. Under section 503, banks are encouraged to make, and are making long-term loans to small businesses under more favorable terms. Prior to the program's enactment, there was little long-term, fixed-asset lending available for many of these companies.

Section 503 authorizes the SBA to guarantee debentures issued by Certified Development Companies [CDC's] to finance the acquisition of land, plant, and equipment for small business expansion. The commitment of a substantial number of new jobs resulting from the expansion is a requirement before any such loan can be made. SBA guarantees up to 40 percent of the project costs; 10 percent comes from the small business itself; and the remaining 50 percent comes from a private sector, third party lender, such as a bank. Maturities on these loans can be for up to 25 years.

SBA began certifyng CDC's in late 1980. As of December 30, 1984, 541 CDC's had been certified, and over 2,300 projects had been financed.

The 40 percent of the project costs put up by the CDC's for these 2,300 loans totalled $438.3 million. By December 31, 1984, 58,600 documented jobs had been created as a result of financings made under this program, with an average SBA investment per job of only $7,600. The current SBA estimate of the number of jobs created approaches 100,000 and the average investment per job has been steadily dropping since the inception of the 503 Program. The vast majority of the jobs created have been permanent jobs in the manufacturing and whole/retail industries. In every quarter since the creation of the 503 Program, more and more jobs have been created and the Federal commitment per job has declined. Thus, the section 503 program is a classic example of a Federal jobs program that works, and works well.

BANK GUARANTEE LENDING PROGRAM

SBA's Loan Guarantee Programs have traditionally helped many small businesses sustain and expand operations. At times when banking regulations often constrain private lending institutions from meeting the long-term capital needs of any small businesses, the Loan Guarantee Program has helped entrepreneurs to compete and gain entry into the economic mainstream. In this way, it allows small businesses to create and sustain jobs.

An extensive study of the 7(a) Guaranteed Lending Program prepared by the General Accounting Office [GAO], and released in April 1983, supported the proposition that the 7(a) program helps small businesses overcome discrimination and imperfections in the capital market. GAO found that the absence of a 7(a) Loan Guarantee Program would result in many small businesses not getting long-term credit because of credit rationing in the capital market. Without the SBA guarantee, borrowers would simply not qualify for private market assistance or would likely only qualify with shorter maturities, higher interest rates, or smaller loan amounts, the study said.

Bankers surveyed by GAO said that 82 percent of the loans made under the General Business Guaranteed Lending Program would not have been on the same terms and conditions, if at all, without the guarantee.

The same GAO report documents the critical problems traditionally faced by most most small businesses in obtaining long-term credit. GAO's analysis demonstrates that the SBA guarantee goes a long way toward easing this financial strain; it determined that "approximately 30 to 40 percent of the dollar amount of banks' long-term financing—6 years or more—to small businesses may carry an SBA guarantee." This estimate applied to the 8,900 banks that participated in the SBA Program during fiscal years 1979-81. These loans to viable small businesses both provide financial resources not available elsewhere and returns to the communities in which they are located in the form of new jobs and economic revitalizaton.

Mr. President, the budget submitted by the administration has recommended the elimination of SBA based upon the proposal of OMB. As I have already advised the leadership, let me be very clear that I oppose this proposal. OMB's shortsighted effort to abolish SBA makes no sense because:

It would eliminate the only agency in the executive branch whose sole mission is to promote and assist the Nation's 14 million small businesses, which account for 97 percent of all businesses and annually create over 80 percent of all net, new jobs: In 1980, 1981 and 1982, 100 percent of all net, new jobs were created by small business according to the President's most recent report on the state of small business;

It does not take into account the significance of small businesses' impact on the economy as a whole, the stimulus that SBA programs provide to small business growth and stability and the essential advocacy role of SBA on behalf of the Nation's small businesses;

It fails to recognize all of the positive developments made at SBA during the past few years because of the committee's oversight and the administrative reforms instituted by SBA Administrator James C. Sanders;

It would abolish a solid core of programs carefully crafted and legislated by Congress specifically to assist small businesses in obtaining long-term financing and management and technical assistance; and

It would reverse a long established congressional policy of providing timely Federal assistance to communities trying to rebuild from a devastation caused by a natural disaster.

In 1981, the Small Business Committee, as part of a reconciliation bill, made substantial cuts in the SBA budget. The committee eliminated and revised various SBA programs, resulting in an overall budget reduction of 27 percent. Unfortunately, some of these savings were lost when OMB, over my strenuous objection, advocated the passage of a reconciliation bill, H.R. 4169—now Public Law 98-270—putting farmers back into the SBA Disaster Loan Program. The net result was a Disaster Lending Program duplicative of the efforts of the Farmers Home Administration, and a program costing the Government hundreds of millions of more dollars annually.

Although the bill we have introduced today does not reflect my desire to achieve additional savings by removing SBA from farm disaster assistance lending and making sure that farmers go to FmHA for farm disaster assistance, this is something I intend to actively pursue during committee hearings and markup of the bill.

In late February, I intend to hold hearings on an SBA multi-year authorization bill. At that time, the committee will carefully evaluate all SBA programs with an eye toward meaningful reforms and cost savings. No program will be sacred. However, I want to stress that the starting point for these deliberations will be that SBA will continue to provide small businesses with critically needed financial and management assistance. The bill we have introduced today contains a number of meaningful, cost-savings reforms. After hearing from the small business community during the committee's hearings, additional savings may be achieved based on their recommendations.

In summary, I believe that the Small Business Administration provides essential services to a vital sector of our economy and should be maintained. Since becoming chairman of the committee in 1981, I have made the oversight of the Small Business Administration a top legislative priority. As a result of our efforts the agency budget has been significantly reduced and the overall performance of the agency has improved remarkably.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 408

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PROGRAM LEVELS

SECTION 1. Section 20 of the Small Business Act is amended—

(1) by adding the following new subsections:

"(u) The following program levels are authorized for fiscal year 1986:

"(1) For the programs authorized by section 7(a) of this Act, the Administration is authorized to make $45,000,000 in direct and immediate participation loans; and of such sums, the Administration is authorized to make $20,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), and $25,000,000 in loans to be made only to disabled veterans, and veterans of the Vietnam era, as defined in section 1841, title 38, United States Code, under the general terms and conditions of title III of Public Law 97-72.

"(2) For the programs authorized by section 7(a) of this Act and section 503 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $3,180,000,000 in deferred participation loans and guarantees of debentures; and of such sum, the Administration is authorized to make $5,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), $60,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (11), $15,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (12), and $450,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (13) and guarantees of debentures as provided in section 503.

"(3) For the programs authorized by title III of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $41,000,000 in direct purchases of debentures and preferred securities and to make $250,000,000 in guarantees of debentures.

"(4) For the programs authorized by part B of title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $1,115,000,000.

"(5) For the programs authorized in sections 404 and 405 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $150,000,000.

"(6) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for the carrying out of the provisions and purposes, including administrative expenses, of sections 7(b)(1) and 7(b)(2) of this Act; and there are authorized to be transferred from the disaster loan revolving funds such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for such administrative expenses.

"(v) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Administration for fiscal year 1986, $555,000,000. Of such sum $333,000,000 shall be available for carrying out the programs referred to in subsection (u), paragraphs (1) through (3); $12,000,000 shall be available for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 412 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958; and $210,000,000 shall be available for salaries and expenses of the Administration.".

"(w) The following program levels are authorized for fiscal year 1987:

"(1) For the programs authorized by section 7(a) of this Act, the Administration is authorized to make $47,000,000 in direct and immediate participation loans; and of such sum, the Administration is authorized to make $21,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), and $26,000,000 in loans to be made only to disabled veterans, and veterans of the Vietnam era, as defined in section 1841, title 38, United States Code, under the general terms and conditions of title III of Public Law 97-72.

"(2) For the programs authorized by section 7(a) of this Act and section 503 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $3,320,000,000 in deferred participation loans and guarantees of debentures; and of such sum, the Administration is authorized to make $5,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), $63,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (11), $16,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (12), and $470,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (13) and guarantees of debentures as provided in section 503.

"(3) For the programs authorized by title III of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $43,000,000 in direct purchases of debentures and preferred securities and to make $261,000,000 in guarantees of debentures.

"(4) For the programs authorized by part B of title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $1,164,000,000.

"(5) For the programs authorized in sections 404 and 405 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $157,000,000.

"(6) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for the carrying out of the provisions and purposes, including administrative expenses, of sections 7(b)(1) and 7(b)(2) of this Act; and there are authorized to be transferred from the disaster loan revolving funds such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for such administrative expenses.

"(x) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Administration for fiscal year 1987, $597,300,000. Of such sum $368,000,000 shall be available for carrying out the programs referred to in subsection (w), paragraphs (1) through (3); $15,500,000 shall be available for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 412 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958; and $213,800,000 shall be available for salaries and expenses of the Administration.".

"(y) The following program levels are authorized for fiscal year 1988:

"(1) For the programs authorized in section 7(a) of this Act, the Administration is authorized to make $49,000,000 in direct and immediate participation loans; and of such sum, the Administration is authorized to make $22,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), and $27,000,000 in loans to be made only to disabled veterans, and veterans of the Vietnam era, as defined in section 1841, title 38, United States Code, under the general terms and conditions of title III of Public Law 97-92.

"(2) For the programs authorized by section 7(a) of this Act and section 503 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $3,458,000,000 in deferred participation loans and guarantees of debentures; and of such sum, the Administration is authorized to make $6,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (10), $65,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (11), $16,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (12), and $489,000,000 in loans as provided in paragraph (13) and guarantees of debentures as provided in section 503.

"(3) For the programs authorized by title III of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to make $45,000,000 in direct purchases of debentures and preferred securities and to make $272,000,000 in guarantees of debentures.

"(4) For the programs authorized by part B of title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $1,213,000,000.

"(5) For the programs authorized in sections 404 and 405 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, the Administration is authorized to enter into guarantees not to exceed $163,000,000.

"(6) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for the carrying out of the provisions and purposes, including administrative expenses, of section 7(b)(1) and 7(b)(2) of this Act; and there are authorized to be transferred from the disaster loan revolving funds such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for such administrative expenses.

"(z) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Administration for fiscal year 1988, $619,800,000. Of such sum $387,000,000 shall be available for carrying out the programs referred to in subsection (y), paragraphs (1) through (3); $14,500,000 shall be available for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 412 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958; and $218,300,000 shall be available for salaries and expenses of the Administration."; and

(2) by striking from (t) "and for each of such years" and inserting "for fiscal year 1985".

DISASTER LENDING REFORMS

SEC. 2. Section 7 of the Small Business Act is amended by striking paragraphs (3) and (4).

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join today with Senator WEICKER and Senators NUNN, SASSER, D'AMATO, and RUDMAN in introducing a new 3-year authorization bill for the Small Business Administration. I want to assure Members of the Senate that introduction of this bill is more than symbolic, although this bill is an important symbol of our commitment to small business.

The President has proposed abolition of the Small Business Administration, the only Federal agency created by Congress to serve the needs of the Nation's 15 million small businesses, and I think it is very important that we in the Senate send a clear message to the President and to the country that we support small business, we support SBA and its goals. Perhaps even more important, as Senator WEICKER has emphasized, any proposal from the administration to abolish an agency as important as SBA should be treated in a constitutionally prescribed manner. That is to say, the leadership in the Congress should not begin deliberations over the fate of major Federal agencies based on press leaks from the Office of Management and Budget.

It the President wants to get rid of this agency, he should have a bill drafted, send it up here, let the authorizing committee review it, and let Congress work its will. Until that happens, it is only proper that we should go forward with the normal authorization process.

Let me add here, Mr. President, that I hardly understand Mr. Stockman's estimates about savings which could come from abolition of SBA. While OMB has arrived at a figure of $1.5 billion, I've looked at the appropriation bill for SBA, since I also happen to sit on the Appropriations Subcommittee which funds the agency, and I saw that we appropriated about $700 million for the agency last year.

So we could eliminate that appropriation by abolishing SBA 100 times over, and the President's budget would still be out of balance by $100 billion. Even more troubling is the proposal to sell off the agency's loan portfolio, when the best estimates are that the portfolio would bring about 18 cents on the dollar, for a one-shot revenue gain of $1.7 billion.

On the other hand, if the agency merely sits back and services its present loans, the Government will recover at least $7.5 billion over 5 to 7 years, according to estimates by the National Federation of Independent Business. So the administration's proposal is nothing more than a quick fix which would, in fact, end up costing the taxpayers more than OMB says it would gain—to say nothing of the lost revenue from lost jobs in firms which SBA has helped create or has saved from certain failure.

As Members of this body know, last year the Senate passed an SBA authorization bill, but that bill was not enacted into law. Our new bill is based largely on last year's Senate bill.

I want to emphasize, however, that of equal importance with my belief that we should continue to have a Small Business Administration, is my belief that Congress must take serious action on the Federal deficit. Therefore, Senator WEICKER and I have drafted this bill with fiscal responsibility foremost in our minds. This bill is what is being popularly called around here a freeze minus bill. That is to say, it does more toward reducing Federal spending than a simple budget freeze. The decisions which we have had to make are not easy ones and they have not been painless. We have gone to great lengths to produce an authorization bill which will allow SBA to provide the absolutely necessary services to businesses with the absolutely minimum necessary funding.

We have had to make a number of hard choices in drafting this bill. Although I have supported direct loans for general business purposes in the past, I have now concluded—at least tentatively—that we just cannot afford the direct loan program any more. Eliminating general business direct loans saves the Treasury $92 million in outlays for fiscal year 1986 and $171 million in budget authority. SBA's direct lending is reduced from $257 million to $86 million in fiscal year 1986.

I have supported the nonphysical disaster program in the past, but again I have concluded that controlling spending must take priority. This change also saves approximately $100 million. This bill also provides for a freeze on salaries and expenses at the agency for fiscal year 1986, with no cost-of-living adjustment whatsoever until 1987.

We do, of course, intend that this policy can be changed in the event that the Governmental Affairs Committee and the Senate should adopt a uniform, overall pay policy for Federal civilian employees. Doing without a cost-of-living increase, I know full well, means that the employees must inevitably suffer a loss in pay due to inflation. I do not favor such an outcome.

But I want those who are listening to know that we on the Small Business Committee are adamant about two things. First, we are determined to do our fair share toward reducing the deficit. Second, we are equally determined that the SBA not be offered up as a sacrificial lamb in a meaningless gesture at reducing the deficit.

The only reasonable and fair way to approach the problem is through shared sacrifice, not through the selective meat-axe approach advocated by Mr. Stockman, chopping away at programs which have served our country well, while the Defense Department pours money endlessly down $600 hammers. It does the country no good to eliminate programs, like SBA, which have both a purpose and a record of encouraging economic development and job creation.

We have just finished spending, Mr. President, almost $1,000 billion on defense in the last 4 years. I have yet to see that we have gotten $1,000 billion worth of defense. And now we are being told that the $292 billion which we spent in fiscal 1985 is not nearly enough. At the same time, Mr. President, we are told that we cannot possibly afford student loans, we cannot afford the Economic Development Administration, we cannot afford the Job Corps, and we cannot afford the Small Business Administration.

Even if one believes the myth that we will grow our way out of the President's budget deficits, it is clear that we will not grow our way out of a paper bag if we do not have programs or policies that will encourage economic growth. Small businesses account for the great preponderance of economic growth and job creation in our economy. Now is hardly the time to turn our backs on America's small businesses.

Mr. President, our committee plans to hold hearings on this bill shortly after the upcoming recess. I invite Members of the Senate to study our bill, to tell us what they think about it at our hearings, and to join me in supporting small business.

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of legislation introduced by the chairman and ranking member of the Small Business Committee, Senators WEICKER and BUMPERS, to reauthorize the Small Business Administration [SBA] for fiscal year 1986.

The President has submitted his fiscal year 1986 budget to Congress which would eliminate the SBA and transfer all outstanding loans to the Treasury Department for management. It is no secret that the Federal budget is hemorrhaging and that the bleeding must be stopped. I feel strongly that all programs—except the Social Security COLA and allowing new participants into Medicare and Social Security—must be at least frozen as a first step to controlling the budget. In this respect the SBA should not be excluded.

SBA is not free from waste and, in fact, polls show that the majority of small firms do not use SBA programs or have had a negative experience with the agency. Nevertheless, I feel that the agency and its programs must not be eliminated. Certain of SBA's programs are not cost effective. However, some services are offered to small firms that work and infuse needed capital to make new ideas grow.

The legislation introduced today reflects the need for change at SBA, but allows useful programs to continue. The reauthorization would eliminate all SBA direct lending programs. The bill would also eliminate the nonphysical disaster programs at SBA.

SBA should not be eliminated. The reauthorization bill introduced today reflects the need to continue to help small firms raise money to make new ideas reach fruition.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am proud to join as an original cosponsor of this important legislation which will allow the Small Business Administration to continue to provide services to this Nation's small business community. While I know that many of my colleagues who have joined me in cosponsoring this measure will often disagree on the course the SBA should be following, our bipartisan backing of this bill underscores the importance we all attach to the basic role of the Small Business Administration.

Time and time again, many of us have taken to the floor of the Senate to extol the virtues of small business. We have impressive arrays of figures to bolster our arguments that small business is central to the American economy. This is certainly the case for my home State of Tennessee.

There are approximately 83,000 business establishments in Tennessee. About 79,000 of these employ fewer than 100 employees. These small businesses produced roughly half of Tennessee's $50 billion in goods and services last year. These small firms contributed about 45 percent of the State's payroll in 1982. Moreover, firms with less than 100 employees constitute 80 percent of Tennessee's manufacturing companies, 99 percent of our construction firms, 611 percent of our wholesale and retail operations, 98 percent of the State's service industries and 99 percent of the financial business in the State. As I have noted in the past, small business is big business in Tennessee.

Yet, what we often overlook in this litany of praise is the aid that many of these small firms have needed to get off the ground and to keep their heads above water. Often, this assistance has been provided by the Small Business Administration.

Through a variety of programs, the SBA offers valuable aid and assistance to a great many small firms which might otherwise go out of business or remain nothing more than the dream of a young entrepreneur. Yet, there are those who contend that the SBA serves no purpose and that it's programs are ineffective and wasteful.

I know that those of us who serve on the Small Business Committee can each point to programs operated by the SBA which we would like to reform or modify. However, there are several proven success stories which the agency can be proud of. A good case in point is the Certified Development Company Program. This relatively new program is producing nearly twice the number of jobs in Tennessee than was originally projected by SBA. This program is generating one job in Tennessee for every $8,000 of SBA involvement, far below the cost of other Federal job generation programs.

The procurement assistance programs provided by SBA are another example of the Agency's importance. It was partially through the work of the Small Business Committee in conjunction with SBA that many of the procurement horror stories of the past few years have been curbed. As a result, more of our Government contracts are going to smaller, less costly companies and hopefully the day of the $400 hammer and $7,000 coffee pot are behind us.

Finally, the Office of Advocacy provides the Nation's small business community invaluable services. This advocate for small business helps to ease the burdens often imposed by actions of the Federal Government on small business and helps small firms to maximize their ability to benefit from Federal programs.

This is but a partial listing of the significant services provided by the Small Business Administration. In the weeks ahead, I am sure we will be hearing many suggestions on what can be done to streamline the Agency's efforts. Recommendations will be made on which programs should be kept and which curtailed. But throughout this debate, I remain convinced that we will continue to hear from small business organizations and small business owners that the SBA is worth keeping. And it is worth keeping because of the positive impact the SBA can have on small business.

Perhaps nothing better crystallizes the impact that the SBA can have on a small business than a specific case. The Nashville Tennessean recently ran an article reporting just such a case. I believe it provides an excellent example of what the Agency can do for one small business. I ask unanimous consent that Tom Mulgrew's article on the SBA be included in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Nashville Tennessean, Tues., Jan. 29, 1985]

SBA HELPED COUPLE'S IDEA INTO REALITY

AGENCY LIFE IN JEOPARDY

(By Tom Mulgrew)

Don and Betty Nixon started making mops 20 years ago in a burnedout garage here, but in time parlayed hard work and three government loans into a successful manufacturing company.

The Small Business Administration guaranteed the loans for the Nixons, allowing the couple to turn Fluffo Mop of Goodlettsville into a business that today employs 30 people and produces 18,000 mops and brooms a week.

"The Small Business Administration enabled us to keep going and expand when we needed to," Betty Nixon said.

"The banks wouldn't lend us money unless the SBA guaranteed the loans, so I guess you could say they helped us get where we are today."

Fluffo Mop is just one example of the government having faith in American ingenuity, but that may change. The Reagan administration wants to do away with the Small Business Administration to reduce the federal deficit.

Reagan, claiming that SBA programs are expensive and a waste of taxpayers' money, has asked Congress to abolish the agency that has guaranteed $400 million in loans to 3,500 small businesses in Tennessee over the last 10 years.

The rap on small businesses, observers say, is that most of them fail or close down in their first five years of operation. Some borrowers are unable to repay the SBA loans, hence the President's posture, but most do, said SBA district director Bob Hartman.

"As far as our portfolio is concerned, the vast majority of small businesses in Tennessee have made it," Hartman said.

"Between 10% and 15% are in some kind of trouble, but in the last 10 years we've only lost slightly over 4% of the money that went out."

That means the SBA failed to collect about $17 million of the $400 million the agency guaranteed in loans since 1974. Tennessee's 4.3% rate compares to a 6.4% national average.

While many entrepreneurs successfully obtain conventional financing, Hartman said elimination of the SBA will have a significant impact on small businesses that need long-term loans to get rolling.

Simply put, Hartman said, it is going to be "much harder" for small businesses to start up or expand if the SBA falls to the wayside. Those who have benefited from the SBA agree with him.

"I really think it would be a huge mistake to abolish the SBA," said Cathy Sherman, co-owner of the Picky Palate in Green Hills.

"I know a lot of people, especially younger people, who have trouble getting conventional loans. The SBA had faith in us when no one else did."

Baltz Brothers Packing Co., Houston's Restaurant, Michael Corzine's, the Athlete's House and Porcelain Industries are some of the other Nashville businesses that have been helped by the SBA.

Since its inception 31 years ago, the agency has approved $35 billion in seed money for 460,000 small businesses. These enterprises pumped $468 billion into the economy and paid $67 billion in taxes.

"The SBA helped us through a critical transitional state," said Tim Markus, owner of Nautilus Total Fitness Centers here and in Brentwood.

"We weren't very well received by banks in the area, but with the help of the SBA we got our loan approved."

Tom Ruffin, co-owner of Sonny's Real Pit Bar-B-Q Restaurant, 1210 Murfreesboro Road, said he used an SBA-guaranteed loan to open a new restaurant.

"The SBA has been invaluable to us," Ruffin said.●

S. 409. A bill to broaden the base of the individual and corporate income taxes, to significantly reduce tax rates, to smooth out the rate schedules of the individual income tax, and to simplify the tax laws by eliminating most credits, deductions, and exclusions; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR TAX ACT OF 1985

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr President, today, along with Senators BIDEN, HART, KENNEDY, BINGAMAN, CRANSTON, PROXMIRE, GORE, INOUYE, LAUTENBERG, BUMPERS, and KERRY I am reintroducing the Fair Tax Act of 1985.

First introduced in 1982, this bill offers Democrats and Republicans alike an unprecedented opportunity to achieve the most important step forward in tax policy in decades.

Tax simplification is not an issue that lends itself to the traditional labels. It is not Republican or Democrat. It is not liberal or conservative. It is rather an issue that poses the fundamental question of how we in Congress construe our job: Are we here to deal among the special interests? Or is our purpose to articulate policies that promote the general interests?

The fair tax comes down squarely for putting the general interest in fairness and growth above the narrow special interests that too frequently seem to control our political lives.

The fair tax is about fairness and growth. It demonstrates that tax reform is not a code word for big government, "soaking the rich," or foreclosing on the middle-income homeowner. It can also give our economy the competitive edge it needs to continue America's international leadership.

The fair tax is a realistic, concrete plan to achieve a tax system that is much fairer and simpler than the crazy-quilt structure we all labor under today.

The fair tax shows that tax reform can: Raise as much, or a little more, revenue than the present system, but with much lower rates and far fewer loopholes; keep the same distribution of tax liabilities among different income groups, but ensure that people with equal incomes pay about equal tax; accomplish both these goals while retaining the most widely used and nonabusive deductions; eliminate abusive tax shelters that stifle incentive, squander scarce capital, distort investment, and enrich a few special interests, thereby boosting productivity and promoting growth.

The fair tax's fundamental proposition is that all Americans, not just those with privileged access to the political process, deserve a tax break and a better chance to prosper.

We started working on this issue 4 years ago and we came out with our first version of the fair tax in 1982. Since that time, I have become more and more convinced that our original analysis of the need for tax reform and the direction we have taken are correct. For the key to the American future is our willingness to embrace change. But the fact is we have a Tax Code that retards adjustment to change. We have a tax code that has given enormous subsidies to certain kinds of activities while putting major obstacles in the way of those with new ideas who want to move the country forward. I view this bill as a key to the renewal of our economy.

At the same time I believe that this bill will also help renew our confidence in Government. I believe we can restore faith and trust in Government when the people see that the rules—particularly the tax rules—are fair and reasonable. So I think you get a lot of benefits from tax reform.

A recent national poll found a startling 80 percent of the public felt that if you play by the rules you won't get ahead. I believe one set of rules they may have been referring to pertained to taxes. Indeed, another national poll recently found nearly one-quarter of the public saying they knew someone who cheated on their taxes.

But make no mistake—this is not going to be any easy job. As a Washington lobbyist said the other day, "The special interests are organized and the people don't care. Your bill isn't going to go anywhere." Well if he was right about the people, tax reform is going to be extremely difficult. But I think he was wrong about the people. I think the people do care and I think they are willing to express themselves.

The special interests are going to try to frighten the American people. You might already have seen it. They are going to be telling individuals what they are going to lose with tax simplification—without ever telling them that they are going to get lower rates of tax and a simpler, fairer system in exchange.

As the people's representatives, our job is to make sure that the electorate understands the choices and appreciates what they stand to gain. This also means making sure the taxpayers are not bamboosled into deferring tax reform on the ground that the deficit is our highest priority. Why should Americans go along with cuts in education, scientific research, and programs that give some hope of equal opportunity to the neediest Americans while the single biggest area of Government spending—tax subsidies—goes unchecked?

Tax subsidies have been proliferating at the same time direct spending has been shrinking. In the mid-sixties, tax expenditures were a mere $37 billion. In 1985, they will exceed $370 billion—a tenfold increase.

It is to protect these largely hidden subsidies that the foes of tax reform seek to focus public attention solely on the deficit. It is an outrageous commentary on Congress to think that we cannot accomplish two important goals in 1 year.

Of course we must reduce the deficit, lest we mortgage our future prosperity. But we must not ignore the need for fundamental fairness. We must also recognize that without tax reform, our attempts to lower interest rates by cutting spending will likely fail. The reason is that high interest rates have multiple causes, one of which is that the current tax system subsidizes borrowing. As long as we continue this perverse subsidy, interest rates are likely to remain high.

Finally, Mr. President, a word of caution. Those who would put tax reform on the back burner may have a hidden agenda: Tax increases without tax reform. I regard this as absolutely unacceptable. Raising taxes without reform guarantees only one thing: Those who are already paying through the nose will have to shoulder a still heavier burden. Those whom political favoritism has so far sheltered from paying taxes will continue to avoid paying their fair share.

As I see it, that outcome would be a travesty of the democratic ideal. And that is why I am confident that 1985 is the year for reform.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 409

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; ETC.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Fair Tax Act of 1985".

(b) AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate, not later than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, shall submit to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Finance of the Senate a draft of any technical and conforming amendments to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which are necessary to reflect the substantive amendments made by this Act.

TITLE I—REDUCTION OF INDIVIDUAL AND CORPORATE TAX RATES

Subtitle A—Reduction of Rates

SEC. 101. INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATES.

Section 1 (relating to tax imposed on individuals) is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. TAX IMPOSED.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—There is hereby imposed on the income of every individual for each taxable year a tax equal to the sum of—

"(1) a normal tax determined under subsection (b), and

"(2) a surtax determined under subsection (c).

"(b) NORMAL TAX.—For purposes of subsection (a), the normal tax for any taxable year is 14 percent of the taxable income for such taxable year.

"(c) SURTAX.—For purposes of subsection (a), the surtax for any taxable year is the sum of—

"(1) 12 percent of so much of the adjusted gross income as exceeds AGI level I but does not exceed AGI level II, and

"(2) 16 percent of so much of the adjusted gross income as exceeds AGI level II.

"(d) AGI LEVELS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of subsection (c), the AGI levels are as follows:

"In the case of:	AGI level I is:	AGI level II is:
An individual who is not married	$25,000	$37,500
A joint return	40,000	65,000
A separate return by a married individual	20,000	32,500

"(2) SPECIAL RULE FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES.—In the case of any individual who is a surviving spouse for the taxable year, the AGI levels applicable to a joint return shall apply to such individual for the taxable year.

"(3) MARITAL STATUS.—For purposes of this subsection, marital status shall be determined under section 143.

"(e) SPECIAL RULE FOR ESTATES AND TRUSTS.—In the case of every estate and trust taxable under this subsection—

"(1) the normal tax shall be 30 percent of the taxable income, and

"(2) the surtax shall not apply.".

SEC. 102. CORPORATE TAX RATES.

Section 11 is amended—

(1) by striking out subsections (a) and (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A 30 percent tax is hereby imposed for each taxable year on the taxable income of every corporation.", and

(2) by redesignating subsections (c) and (d) as subsections (b) and (c), respectively.

Subtitle B—Increase in Personal Exemption for Taxpayer and Standard Deduction

SEC. 111. INCREASE IN PERSONAL EXEMPTION FOR TAXPAYER.

Subsection (b) of section 151 (relating to allowance of deductions for personal exemptions) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) TAXPAYER AND SPOUSE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—An exemption of $1,600 for the taxpayer.

"(2) ADDITIONAL EXEMPTION FOR SPOUSE IN CERTAIN CASES.—An additional exemption of $1,600 for the spouse of the taxpayer if—

"(A) a joint return is not made by the taxpayer and his spouse, and

"(B) the spouse, for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins, has no gross income and is not the dependent of another taxpayer.

"(3) EXEMPTION FOR HEAD OF HOUSEHOLD.—In the case of an individual who is a head of a household (as defined in section 2(b)) for the taxable year, the exemption under paragraph (1) shall be $1,800 in lieu of $1,600.".

SEC. 112. INCREASE IN STANDARD DEDUCTION.

Section 63 (defining taxable income) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 63. TAXABLE INCOME DEFINED.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), for purposes of this subtitle, the term 'taxable income' means gross income minus the deductions allowed by this chapter (other than the standard deduction).

"(b) INDIVIDUALS WHO DO NOT ITEMIZE THEIR DEDUCTIONS.—In the case of an individual who does not elect to itemize his deductions for the taxable year, for purposes of this subtitle, the term 'taxable income' means adjusted gross income, minus—

"(1) the standard deduction,

"(2) the deduction for personal exemptions provided in section 151,

"(3) the direct charitable deduction, and

"(4) the deduction allowed by section 220 (relating to deduction for expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment).

"(c) STANDARD DEDUCTION.—For purposes of this subtitle—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, the term 'standard deduction' means—

"(A) $6,000 in the case of—

"(i) a joint return, or

"(ii) a surviving spouse (as defined in section 2(a)), or

"(B) $3,000 in the case of—

"(i) an individual who is not married and who is not a surviving spouse (as defined in section 2(a)), or

"(ii) a married individual filing a separate return.

"(2) LIMITATION ON STANDARD DEDUCTION IN THE CASE OF CERTAIN DEPENDENTS.—In the case of an individual with respect to whom a deduction under section 151 is allowable to another taxpayer for a taxable year beginning in the calendar year in which the individual's taxable year begins, the standard deduction applicable to such individual for such individual's taxable year shall not exceed such individual's earned income.

"(3) CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS NOT ELIGIBLE FOR STANDARD DEDUCTION.—In the case of—

"(A) a married individual filing a separate return where either spouse itemizes deductions,

"(B) a nonresident alien individual,

"(C) an individual making a return under section 443(a)(1) for a period of less than 12 months on account of a change in his annual accounting period, or

"(D) an estate or trust, common trust fund, or partnership, the standard deduction shall be zero.

"(d) ITEMIZED DEDUCTIONS.—For purposes of this subtitle, the term 'itemized deductions' means the deductions allowable by this chapter other than—

"(1) the deductions allowable in arriving at adjusted gross income,

"(2) the deductions for personal exceptions provided by section 151,

"(3) the direct charitable deduction, and

"(4) the deduction allowed by section 220 (relating to deduction for expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment).

"(e) ELECTION TO ITEMIZE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Unless an individual makes an election under this subsection for the taxable year, no itemized deduction shall be allowed for the taxable year. For purposes of this subtitle, the determination of whether a deduction is allowable under this chapter shall be made without regard to the preceding sentence.

"(2) TIME AND MANNER OF ELECTION.—Any election under this subsection shall be made on the taxpayer's return, and the Secretary shall prescribe the manner of signifying such election on the return.

"(3) CHANGE OF TREATMENT.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, a change of treatment with respect to the standard deduction and itemized deductions for any taxable year may be made after the filing of the return for such year. If the spouse of the taxpayer filed a separate return for any taxable year corresponding to the taxable year of the taxpayer, the change shall not be allowed unless, in accordance with such regulations—

"(A) the spouse makes a change of treatment with respect to the standard deduction and itemized deductions, for the taxable year covered in such separate return, consistent with the change of treatment sought by the taxpayer, and

"(B) the taxpayer and his spouse consent in writing to the assessment, within such period as may be agreed on with the Secretary, of any deficiency, to the extent attributable to such change of treatment, even though at the time of the filing of such consent the assessment of such deficiency would otherwise be prevented by the operation of any law or rule of law.

This paragraph shall not apply if the tax liability of the taxpayer's spouse, for the taxable year corresponding to the taxable year of the taxpayer, has been compromised under section 7122.

"(f) MARITAL STATUS.—For purposes of this section, marital status shall be determined under section 143.".

Subtitle C—Repeals Related to Reduction in Rates

SEC. 121. REPEALS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—The following provisions are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 3 (relating to tax tables for individuals).

(2) Part VI of subchapter A of chapter 1 (section 55 and following, relating to minimum tax for tax preferences).

(3) Section 269A (relating to personal service corporations formed or availed of to avoid or evade income tax).

(a) REPEAL OF TAX EXEMPTION FOR INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS.—Paragraphs (4), (5), (6), (8), (9), (10), (11), (12), (13), (14), (15), (16), (17), and (18) of section 103(b) (relating to industrial development bonds) are hereby repealed.

(b) REPEAL OF TAX EXEMPTION FOR MORTGAGE SUBSIDY BONDS.—Section 103A is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 103A. MORTGAGE SUBSIDY BONDS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Any mortgage subsidy bond shall be treated as an obligation not described in subsection (a) of section 103.

"(b) MORTGAGE SUBSIDY BOND DEFINED.—For purposes of this title, the term 'mortgage subsidy bond' means any obligation which is issued as part of an issue a significant part of the proceeds of which is to be used directly or indirectly for mortgages (or other owner financing) on owner-occupied residences.".

(c) REPEAL OF TAX EXEMPTION FOR CERTAIN PRIVATE PURPOSE BONDS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—

(A) Subsection (a) of section 103 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Gross income does not include interest on the obligations of a State, a Territory, or a possession of the United States, or any political subdivision of any of the foregoing, or of the District of Columbia.".

(B) Subsection (e) of section 103 is amended to read as follows:

"(e) CERTAIN PRIVATE PURPOSE BONDS.—Any obligation which is issued as part of an issue all or a major portion of the proceeds of which are to be used (directly or indirectly)—

"(1) to finance loans to individuals for educational expenses, or

"(2) by an organization described in section 501(c)(3) which is exempt from taxation under section 501(a), shall be treated as an obligation not described in subsection (a).".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(A) Subsections (b)(1) and (c)(1) of section 103 are each amended—

(i) by striking out "subsection (a)(1) or (2)" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)", and

(ii) by striking out "subsection (a)(1) or" each place it appears in the heading and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)".

(B) Paragraph (3) of section 103(b) (defining exempt person) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) EXEMPT PERSON.—For purposes of paragraph (2)(A), the term 'exempt person' means a governmental unit.".

(C) Subsections (d), (g), (h), (k), (l), and (n) of section 103 are hereby repealed.

SEC. 216. TAXATION OF EMPLOYER CONTRIBUTIONS TO ACCIDENT AND HEALTH PLANS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 106 (relating to contribution by employer to accident and health plans) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "This section shall apply only to contributions attributable to the providing of wages, or payments in lieu of wages, for periods during which the employee is absent from work on account of sickness or disability.".

(b) SELF-INSURED PLANS.—Subsections (b) and (h) of section 105 are hereby repealed.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS TO EMPLOYMENT TAXES.—

(1) Paragraph (2) of section 3121(a) (defining wages) is amended by striking out "on account of" and all that follows down through the end of such paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "on account of sickness or accident disability (but, in the case of payments made to an employee or any of his dependents, this paragraph shall exclude from the term 'wages' only payments which are received under a workmen's compensation law);".

(2) Paragraph (2) of section 3306(b) (defining wages) is amended by striking out "on account of" and all that follows down through the end of such paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "on account of sickness or accident disability (but, in the case of payments made to an employee or any of his dependents, this paragraph shall exclude from the term 'wages' only payments which are received under a workmen's compensation law);".

SEC. 217. SCHOLARSHIP AND FELLOWSHIP EXCLUSION LIMITED TO TUITION AND RELATED EXPENSES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsections (a) and (b) of section 117 (relating to scholarships and fellowships) are amended to read as follows:

"(a) IN GENERAL.—In the case of an individual who is a candidate for a degree at an educational organization described in section 170(b)(1)(A)(ii), gross income does not include any amount received as—

"(1) a scholarship, or

"(2) a fellowship grant, to the extent such amount is used for qualified tuition and related expenses (within the meaning of subsection (c)(2)).

"(b) PAYMENT FOR TEACHING, RESEARCH, ETC.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to that portion of any amount received which represents payment for teaching, research, or other services in the nature of part-time employment required as a condition to receiving the scholarship or the fellowship grant. If teaching, research, or other services are required of all candidates (whether or not recipients of scholarships or fellowship grants) for a particular degree as a condition to receiving such degree, such teaching, research, or other services shall not be regarded as part-time employment within the meaning of this subsection.".

(b) CLARIFICATION OF DEFINITION OF QUALIFIED TUITION AND RELATED EXPENSES.—

(1) Clause (i) of section 117(c)(2)(A) is amended by striking out "at an institution of higher education" and inserting in lieu thereof "at an educational organization described in section 170(b)(1)(A)(ii)".

(2) Subparagraph (B) of section 117(c)(1) is amended by inserting "at an institution of higher education" after "qualified tuition and related expenses".

SEC. 218. EXCLUSION OF GAIN FROM SALE OF PRINCIPAL RESIDENCE APPLIES ONLY FOR PURPOSES OF COMPUTING NORMAL TAX.

Section 121 (relating to one-time exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence by individual who has attained age 55) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) SECTION NOT TO APPLY FOR PURPOSES OF COMPUTING SURTAX.—This section shall not apply for purposes of computing the amount of the surtax imposed by section 1.".

SEC. 219. TERMINATION OF TAX EXEMPTION FOR DEPOSITS INTO, AND WITHDRAWALS FROM, THE CAPITAL CONSTRUCTION FUND UNDER SECTION 607 OF THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1936.

(a) TAXATION OF DEPOSITS.—Subsection (d) of section 607 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936 (relating to nontaxability for deposits) is hereby repealed.

(b) ALL WITHDRAWALS TREATED AS NONQUALIFIED.—Subsection (f) of such section 607 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) No withdrawal after December 31, 1986, shall be treated as a qualified withdrawal.".

Subtitle C—Deductions

PART I—REPEALS

SEC. 231. REPEALS.

The following provisions are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 221 (relating to deduction for two-earner married couples).

(2) Section 222 (relating to deduction for adoption expenses).

PART II—OTHER CHANGES

SEC. 232. LIMITATION ON INTEREST DEDUCTION.

Subsection (d) of section 163 (relating to limitation on interest on investment indebtedness) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) LIMITATION ON INTEREST DEDUCTIONS OF INDIVIDUALS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation, the amount allowed as a deduction under this chapter for nonbusiness interest shall not exceed the sum of—

"(A) any qualified housing interest, and

"(B) the amount otherwise allowable as a deduction for nonbusiness interest (other than qualified housing interest) to the extent such amount does not exceed the qualified net investment income of the taxpayer for the taxable year.

"(2) NONBUSINESS INTEREST NOT IN EXCESS OF QUALIFIED NET INVESTMENT INCOME ALLOWABLE IN COMPUTING ADJUSTED GROSS INCOME FOR SURTAX.—For purposes of determining the amount of the surtax imposed by section 1, any amount allowable as a deduction under this chapter for nonbusiness interest shall be treated as a deduction allowable in computing adjusted gross income to the extent that the amount of such interest does not exceed the qualified net investment income of the taxpayer for the taxable year.

"(3) NONBUSINESS INTEREST.—The term 'nonbusiness interest' means any interest allowable as a deduction under this chapter (determined without regard to paragraph (1)) other than interest allowable as a deduction in computing adjusted gross income (determined without regard to paragraph (2) but with regard to paragraph (5)).

"(4) OTHER DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) QUALIFIED HOUSING INTEREST.—The term 'qualified housing interest' means interest which is paid or accrued during the taxable year on indebtedness which is incurred in acquiring, constructing, or substantially rehabilitating any property which—

"(i) is the principal residence (within the meaning of section 1034) of the taxpayer at the time such interest accrues or is paid, or

"(ii) is a qualified dwelling used by the taxpayer (or any member of his family within the meaning of section 267(c)(4)) during the taxable year.

"(B) QUALIFIED DWELLING.—The term 'qualified dwelling' means any—

"(i) house,

"(ii) apartment,

"(iii) condominium, or

"(iv) mobile home not used on a transient basis, including all structures or other property appurtenant thereto.

"(C) QUALIFIED NET INVESTMENT INCOME.—The term 'qualified net investment income' means the excess of—

"(i) qualified investment income, over

"(ii) qualified investment expenses.

"(D) QUALIFIED INVESTMENT INCOME.—The term 'qualified investment income' means the sum of—

"(i) the gross income from interest, dividends, rents, and royalties, but only to the extent such income is not derived from the active conduct of a trade or business, and

"(ii) the net gain attributable to the disposition of property held for investment.

"(E) QUALIFIED INVESTMENT EXPENSES.—The term 'qualified investment expenses' means the deductions directly connected with the production of qualified investment income to the extent that such deductions are allowable in computing adjusted gross income.

"(5) TREATMENT OF INTERESTS IN LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS AND SUBCHAPTER S CORPORATIONS; PROPERTY SUBJECT TO NET LEASE.—

"(A) CERTAIN INTEREST NOT ALLOWABLE IN COMPUTING ADJUSTED GROSS INCOME.—Any amount allowable as a deduction for interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry a limited business interest shall not (except as provided in paragraph (2)) be allowable in computing adjusted gross income.

"(B) INCOME TREATED AS QUALIFIED INVESTMENT INCOME.—For purposes of this subsection, any income derived from a limited business interest shall be treated as qualified investment income.

"(C) LIMITED BUSINESS INTEREST.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'limited business interest' means an interest—

"(i) as a limited partner in a partnership, or

"(ii) as a shareholder in an S corporation if the taxpayer does not actively participate in the management of such corporation.

"(D) PROPERTY SUBJECT TO NET LEASE TREATED AS LIMITED BUSINESS INTEREST.—For purposes of this paragraph, the interest of the lessor in property subject to a lease shall be treated as a limited business interest if—

"(i) for the taxable year the sum of the deductions of the lessor with respect to such property which are allowable solely by reason of section 162 (other than rents and reimbursed amounts with respect to such property) is less than 15 percent of the rental income produced by such property, or

"(ii) the lessor is either guaranteed a specified return or is guaranteed in whole or in part against loss of income.".

SEC. 233. REPEAL OF DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL PERSONAL PROPERTY AND SALES TAXES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (a) of section 164 (relating to deduction for taxes) is amended—

(1) by striking out paragraphs (2) and (4) and by redesignating paragraphs (3) and (5) as paragraphs (2) and (3), respectively, and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, any tax (not described in the first sentence of this subsection) which is paid or accrued by the taxpayer in connection with an acquisition or disposition of property shall be treated as part of the cost of the acquired property or, in the case of a disposition, as a reduction in the amount realized on the disposition.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Subsection (b) of section 164 is amended by striking out paragraphs (1), (2), and (5) and by redesignating paragraphs (3) and (4) as paragraphs (1) and (2), respectively.

SEC. 234. LIMITATION ON CHARITABLE DEDUCTION IN THE CASE OF CORPORATIONS.

Paragraph (1) of section 170(a) (relating to charitable, etc., contributions and gifts) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—There shall be allowed as a deduction—

"(A) except as provided in subparagraph (B), an amount equal to the amount of the charitable contributions paid during the taxable year, or

"(B) in the case of a corporation (other than an S corporation), an amount equal to 50 percent of the charitable contributions paid during the taxable year.

A charitable contribution shall be taken into account under the preceding sentence only if verified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary.".

SEC. 235. INCREASE IN FLOOR ON MEDICAL DEDUCTION.

Subsection (a) of section 213 (relating to medical, dental, etc., expenses) is amended by striking out "5 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent".

Subtitle D—Repeal of Special Capital Gains Treatment

SEC. 241. REPEAL OF SPECIAL CAPITAL GAINS TREATMENT.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—The following sections are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 1201 (relating to alternative tax for corporations).

(2) Section 1202 (relating to deduction for individuals for capital gains).

(b) LIMITATION ON CAPITAL LOSSES APPLIED WITHOUT REGARD TO DISTINCTIONS BETWEEN SHORT TERM AND LONG TERM.—

(1) Subsection (b) of section 1211 (relating to limitation on capital losses in the case of taxpayers other than corporations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) OTHER TAXPAYERS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation, losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets shall be allowed only to the extent of gains from such sales or exchanges plus (if such losses exceed such gains) whichever is the smallest:

"(A) the taxable income for the taxable year,

"(B) $3,000 ($1,500 in the case of a separate return by a husband or wife), or

"(C) the net capital loss.

"(2) COMPUTATION OF TAXABLE INCOME.—For purposes of paragraph (1), taxable income shall be computed without regard to gains or losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets and without regard to the deductions provided in section 151 (relating to personal exemptions) or any deduction in lieu thereof.".

(2) Subsection (b) of section 1212 (relating to carryovers for taxpayers other than corporations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) OTHER TAXPAYERS.—If a taxpayer other than a corporation has a net capital loss for any taxable year, the excess (if any) of—

"(1) the amount of such loss, over

"(2) the amount allowed for the taxable year under subparagraph (A), (B), or (C) of section 1211(b)(1), shall be treated as a capital loss in the succeeding taxable year.".

(c) ELIMINATION OF DISTINCTIONS BETWEEN SHORT-TERM AND LONG-TERM GAINS AND LOSSES BASED ON HOLDING PERIOD.—Section 1222 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1222. OTHER TERMS RELATING TO CAPITAL GAINS AND LOSSES.

"For purposes of this subtitle—

"(1) CAPITAL GAIN.—The term 'capital gain' means gain from the sale or exchange of a capital asset if, and to the extent that, such gain is taken into account in computing gross income.

"(2) CAPITAL LOSS.—The term 'capital loss' means loss from the sale or exchange of a capital asset if, and to the extent that, such loss is taken into account in computing taxable income.

"(3) NET CAPITAL LOSS.—The term 'net capital loss' means the excess of the losses from the sales or exchanges of capital assets over the gains from such sales or exchanges.

"(4) NET CAPITAL GAIN.—The term 'net capital gain' means the excess of the gains from the sales or exchanges of capital assets over the losses from the sales or exchanges of capital assets.".

(d) REPEAL OF RELATED PROVISIONS.—The following provisions are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 268 (relating to sale of land with unharvested crop).

(2) Section 272 (relating to disposal of coal or domestic iron ore).

(3) Section 341 (relating to collapsible corporations).

(4) Section 631 (relating to gain or loss in the case of timber, coal, or domestic iron ore).

(5) Section 735 (relating to character of gain or loss on distribution of distributed property).

(6) Section 751 (relating to unrealized receivables and inventory items).

(7) Section 1231 (relating to property used in the trade or business and involuntary conversions).

(8) Section 1235 (relating to sale or exchange of patents).

(16) Section 1250 (relating to gain from dispositions of certain depreciable realty).

(17) Section 1252 (relating to gain from disposition of farm land).

(18) Section 1254 (relating to gain from disposition of interest in oil, gas, or geothermal property).

(19) Section 1255 (relating to gain from disposition of section 126 property).

(20) Section 1374 (relating to capital gain of subchapter S corporations).

TITLE III—CAPITAL COST RECOVERY

Subtitle A—Simplified Cost Recovery Systems

SEC. 301. SIMPLIFIED COST RECOVERY FOR DEPRECIABLE PROPERTY; REPEAL OF ACCELERATED COST RECOVERY SYSTEM AND SPECIAL LEASING RULES.

Section 168 (relating to accelerated cost recovery system) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 168. SIMPLIFIED COST RECOVERY FOR DEPRECIABLE PROPERTY.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of recovery property, there shall be allowed the recovery deduction provided by this section.

"(b) AMOUNT OF DEDUCTION.—The amount of the deduction allowable by subsection (a) for any taxable year shall be the aggregate amount determined by applying—

"(1) the recovery percentage for each class of property, to

"(2) the balance in the recovery account for such class at the end of such year.

"(c) CLASS AND CLASS LIFE.—

"(1) TABLE.—All recovery property—

"(A) shall be placed in 1 of the classes set forth in the following table, and

"(B) shall have the class life set forth for such class in the following table:

"CLASS AND CLASS LIFE TABLE

"Class	Class life (in years)

"(2) ASSIGNMENT TO CLASSES.—For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B) recovery property shall be assigned to classes in accordance with the following table:

"If the present class life of the property (in years):	The property shall be assigned to (class):
Is less than 5	1
Equals or exceeds 5.0 but is less than 8.5	2
Equals or exceeds 8.5 but is less than 14.5	3
Equals or exceeds 14.5 but is less than 24	4
Equals or exceeds 24 but is less than 35	5
Equals or exceeds 35	6

"(B) BUILDINGS AND STRUCTURES ASSIGNED TO CLASS 6.—All class 6 real property shall be assigned to class 6.

"(3) CLASS 6 REAL PROPERTY.—For purposes of paragraph (2), the term 'class 6 real property' means any recovery property which is real property except that such term shall not include—

"(A) property (not including a building or its structural components) for a period in which such property—

"(i) was used as an integral part of manufacturing, production, or extraction, or of furnishing transportation, communications, electrical energy, gas, water, or sewage disposal services,

"(ii) constituted a research facility used in connection with any of the activities referred to in clause (i), or

"(iii) constituted a facility used in connection with any of the activities referred to in clause (i) for the bulk storage of fungible commodities (including commodities in a liquid or gaseous state),

"(B) a storage facility (not including a building or its structural components) used in connection with the distribution of petroleum or any primary product of petroleum, or

"(C) any real property with a present class life of 12.5 years or less.

"(d) RECOVERY PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of this section, the term 'recovery percentage' means, with respect to any class of property for any taxable year—

"(1) 250 percent, divided by

"(2) the number of years in the class life.

"(e) RECOVERY PROPERTY DEFINED.—For purposes of this title, the term 'recovery property' means property of a character subject to the allowance for depreciation—

"(1) used in a trade or business, or

"(2) held for the production of income, which is placed in service by the taxpayer after December 31, 1986.

"(f) RECOVERY ACCOUNT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The taxpayer shall establish a recovery account for each class of recovery property.

"(2) ADDITIONS TO ACCOUNT.—The recovery account for any class of recovery property shall be increased by an amount equal to the sum of—

"(A) one-half of the basis of each recovery property in such class which is placed in service by the taxpayer during the taxable year, plus

"(B) one-half of the basis of each recovery property in such class which was placed in service by the taxpayer during the preceding taxable year.

"(3) REDUCTIONS IN ACCOUNT.—

"(A) PROPERTY DISPOSED OF DURING YEAR.—The recovery account for any class of recovery property shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount realized on each recovery property of such class disposed of by the taxpayer during the taxable year.

"(B) AMOUNT ALLOWED UNDER THIS SECTION.—The recovery account for any class of recovery property shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount of the deduction allowed under subsection (a) with respect to such class (but not less than the amount allowable).

"(4) TIME FOR MAKING ADJUSTMENTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Any adjustment under paragraph (2) or (3)(A) shall be made as of the close of the taxable year but before the determination of the amount allowable as a deduction under subsection (a) for such taxable year.

"(B) REDUCTION FOR DEDUCTION.—Any reduction under paragraph (3)(B) shall be made as of the beginning of the taxable year following the taxable year for which the amount was allowed (or allowable) as a deduction under subsection (a).

"(5) COORDINATION WITH OTHER PROVISIONS.—

"(A) DISPOSITIONS NOT TREATED AS DISPOSITIONS FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES.—For purposes of this title (other than this section), the disposition of any property in a recovery account shall be treated as if it were not a disposition.

"(B) NEGATIVE BALANCE.—If, as of the close of any taxable year (after the adjustments under paragraphs (2) and (3)(A)), there is a negative balance in any recovery account then, notwithstanding any other provision of this subtitle—

"(i) an amount equal to the amount by which—

"(I) such negative balance (expressed as a positive number), exceeds

"(II) one-half of the basis of all recovery property in the class of recovery property for which such account is established which was placed in service by the taxpayer during the taxable year shall be included in gross income for such taxable year as ordinary income, and

"(ii) the balance in the account shall be adjusted (as of the beginning of the following taxable year) by adding to the account an amount equal to the amount included in gross income under clause (i).

"(6) RATABLE RULE FOR CLASS 6 REAL PROPERTY.—In the case of any class 6 real property placed in service in the taxable year—

"(A) paragraph (2)(A) shall be applied by substituting for 'one-half' a fraction—

"(i) the numerator of which is the number of months in the taxable year beginning before the property was placed in service, and

"(ii) the denominator of which is 12, and

"(B) paragraphs (2)(B) and (5)(B)(i)(I) shall be applied by substituting for 'one-half' a fraction equal to 1 minus the fraction determined under subparagraph (A).

"(g) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) PRESENT CLASS LIFE.—The term 'present class life' means the class life (if any) which would be applicable with respect to any property under subsection (m) of section 167 (determined without regard to paragraph (4) thereof and as if the taxpayer had made an election under such subsection).

"(2) NO ADJUSTMENT WHERE PROPERTY DISPOSED OF BEFORE CLOSE OF TAXABLE YEAR IN WHICH PLACED IN SERVICE.—No adjustment shall be made under paragraphs (2) and (3)(A) of subsection (f) in respect of any property which is disposed of by the taxpayer before the close of the taxable year in which placed in service by the taxpayer.

"(3) TRANSFERS AT DEATH.—No reduction shall be made under paragraph (3)(A) of subsection (f) by reason of any transfer at death.

"(4) PROPERTY CEASING TO BE RECOVERY PROPERTY.—If any property taken into account under subsection (f) ceases to be recovery property during any taxable year—

"(A) such property shall be treated as disposed of by the taxpayer during such taxable year, and

"(B) the basis of such property in the hands of the taxpayer after such cessation shall be treated as equal to its fair market value.

"(5) DISPOSITIONS OTHER THAN SALE OR EXCHANGE.—If any recovery property is disposed of in a disposition which is not a sale, exchange, or involuntary conversion and which is not described in paragraph (6) or (7), the reduction under paragraph (3)(A) of subsection (f) for such disposition shall be the fair market value of the property. In the case of a disposition of property by abandonment, the fair market value thereof shall be treated as if it were zero.

"(6) TRANSFERS WHERE BASIS GOES OVER.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If any recovery property is transferred and the transferee's basis of such property is determined in whole or in part by reference to the adjusted basis of the transferor, then, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary—

"(i) the transferor's recovery account for the class of property in which the recovery property falls shall be reduced by the transferred amount, and

"(ii) for purposes of determining the transferee's basis in such property, the adjusted basis of such property in the hands of the transferor shall be treated as equal to the transferred amount.

"(B) TRANSFERRED AMOUNT.—For purpose of subparagraph (A), the transferred amount shall be the amount which bears the same relation to—

"(i) the total amount in the transferor's recovery account immediately before the transfer, as

"(ii) the fair market value of the transferred property bears to the fair market value of all property in such account immediately before the transfer.

"(C) AUTHORITY TO PRESCRIBE ALTERNATE METHODS OF ALLOCATION.—The Secretary may by regulations prescribe alternate methods for allocating the balance in any recovery account for purposes of determining the transferred amount of any property.

"(7) LIKE KIND EXCHANGES; INVOLUNTARY CONVERSIONS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, in the case of any exchange described in section 1031 or 1033—

"(A) if the properties fall in the same class, changes shall be made in the taxpayer's recovery account for such class only to the extent necessary to reflect the money of other property (within the meaning of section 1031) or property not similar or related in service or use (within the meaning of section 1033) paid, exchanged, or received, as the case may be, and

"(B) if the properties fall in different classes, proper adjustments in the recovery accounts for both classes shall be made to carry out the nonrecognition provided for in such sections.

"(8) SHORT TAXABLE YEARS.—The application of this section to taxable years of less than 12 months shall be in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

"(9) TRANSITIONAL RULE.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986, the taxpayer may elect to treat as recovery property any property which would be recovery property if it had been placed in service after December 31, 1986.

"(B) ELECTION MUST APPLY TO ALL CLASSES.—An election made under this paragraph for any taxable year shall apply with respect to all classes of property.

"(C) METHOD IN WHICH PROPERTY TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—Any property which is treated as recovery property by reason of an election under this paragraph for any taxable year—

"(i) shall be treated as placed in service during such taxable year, and

"(ii) shall be taken into account in an amount equal to the adjusted basis of such property as of the beginning of the taxable year.".

SEC. 302. SIMPLIFIED COST RECOVERY FOR DEPLETABLE PROPERTY.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Part I of subchapter I of chapter 1 (relating to deduction for depletion) is amended by inserting after section 611 the following new section:

"SEC. 611A. SIMPLIFIED COST RECOVERY FOR DEPLETABLE PROPERTY.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of qualified depletable property, there shall be allowed the depletion deduction provided by this section.

"(b) AMOUNT OF DEDUCTION.—The deduction allowed by subsection (a) shall be the aggregate amount determined by applying—

"(1) the recovery percentage for each class of property, to

"(2) the balance in the recovery account for such class at the end of such year.

"(c) CLASS AND CLASS LIFE.—

"(1) TABLE.—All qualified depletable property—

"(A) shall be placed in one of the classes set forth in the following table, and

"(B) shall have the class life set forth for such class in the following table:

"Class and Class Life Table

"Class:	Class life (in years)

"(2) ASSIGNMENT TO CLASSES.—For purposes of this section—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), all qualified depletable property shall be assigned to a class in accordance with the table set forth in section 168(c)(2)(A); except that the anticipated productive life of the property shall be taken into account in lieu of present class life.

"(B) 10-YEAR CLASS LIFE FOR OIL, GAS, AND GEOTHERMAL WELLS.—All qualified depletable property which is an oil or gas well or a well drilled for any geothermal deposit shall be placed in class 3.

"(d) QUALIFIED DEPLETABLE PROPERTY.—For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified depletable property' means any property—

"(1) which is of a character subject to the allowance for depletion provided in section 611, and

"(2) production from which first began after December 31, 1986.

"(e) CERTAIN RULES MADE APPLICABLE.—For purposes of this section, rules similar to the rules of subsections (d), (f), and (g) of section 168 shall apply; except that property shall not be treated as placed in service until production from the property begins.

"(f) SPECIAL RULE FOR NONPRODUCTIVE WELLS OR MINES.—This section shall not apply with respect to any nonproductive well or mine. Nothing in this section shall be construed to deny any deduction allowable for a loss sustained by reason of the abandonment of a nonproductive well or mine.".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 611 is amended by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d) and by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) COORDINATION WITH SECTION 611A.—In the case of any qualified depletable property, the deduction provided by section 611A shall be deemed to be the reasonable allowance for depletion provided by this section.".

(2) Subsection (a) of section 611 is amended by striking out "other natural deposits, and timber," and inserting in lieu thereof "and other natural deposits,".

(3) The table of sections of such part is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 611 the following new item:

"Sec. 611A. Simplified cost recovery for depletable property.".

Subtitle B—Other Changes

PART I—REPEALS

SEC. 311. REPEALS.

The following provisions are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 263(c) (relating to intangible drilling and development costs in the case of oil and gas wells and geothermal wells).

(2) Section 167 (relating to depreciation).

(3) Section 169 (relating to amortization of pollution control facilities).

(4) Section 178 (relating to depreciation or amortization of improvements made by lessee on lessor's property).

(5) Section 179 (relating to election to expense certain depreciable business assets).

(6) Section 194 (relating to amortization of reforestation expenditures).

(7) Sections 613, 613A, and 614 (relating to percentage depletion).

(8) Section 616 (relating to development expenditures).

(9) Section 617 (relating to deduction and recapture of certain mining exploration expenditures).

PART II—OTHER CHANGES

SEC. 316. 10-YEAR AMORTIZATION OF CONSTRUCTION PERIOD INTEREST AND TAXES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (b) of section 189 (relating to amortization of amounts charged to capital account) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) AMORTIZATION OF AMOUNTS CHARGED TO CAPITAL ACCOUNT.—Any amount paid or accrued which would (but for subsection (a)) be allowable as a deduction for the taxable year in which paid or accrued shall be allowed as a deduction ratably over the 10-year period beginning with such taxable year.".

(b) ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN EXCEPTIONS.—Subsection (d) of section 189 (relating to certain property excluded) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) CERTAIN PROPERTY EXCLUDED.—This section shall not apply to any real property acquired, constructed, or carried if such property is not, and cannot reasonably be expected to be, held in a trade or business or in an activity conducted for profit.".

SEC. 317. CIRCULATION EXPENDITURES.

Section 173 (relating to circulation expenditures) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 173. CIRCULATION EXPENDITURES.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Expenditures (other than expenditures for the purchase of land or depreciable property or for the acquisition of circulation through the purchase of any part of the business of another publisher of a newspaper, magazine, or other periodical) to establish, maintain, or increase the circulation of a newspaper, magazine, or other periodical shall be allowed as a deduction ratably over the 10-year period beginning with the taxable year in which such expenditure was made.

"(b) EXCEPTION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to any portion of the expenditure as (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) is chargeable to capital account if the taxpayer elects, in accordance with such regulations, to treat such portion as so chargeable. Such election, if made, must be for the total amount of such portion of the expenditure which is so chargeable to capital account, and shall be binding for all subsequent taxable years unless, upon application by the taxpayer, the Secretary permits a revocation of such election subject to such conditions as he deems necessary.".

SEC. 318. TERTIARY INJECTANTS.

Subsection (a) of section 193 (relating to tertiary injectants) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of any qualified tertiary injectant expenses of the taxpayer for the tertiary injectants injected during the taxable year—

"(1) 50 percent of such expenses shall be allowed as a deduction for the taxable year, and

"(2) 50 percent of such expenses shall be allowed as a deduction for the succeeding taxable year.".

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"Subpart J—Undistributed Profits of Controlled Foreign Corporations

"Sec. 987. Amounts included in gross income of United States shareholders.

"(a) AMOUNTS INCLUDED.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If a foreign corporation is a controlled foreign corporation (as defined in section 957) for an uninterrupted period of 30 days or more during any taxable year, every person who is a United States shareholder (as defined in section 951(b)) of such corporation who owns (within the meaning of section 958) stock in such corporation on the last day in such year on which such corporation is a controlled foreign corporation shall include in his gross income, for his taxable year in which or with which such taxable year of the corporation ends, his pro rata share of the corporation's earnings and profits for such year.

"(2) PRO RATA SHARE OF EARNINGS AND PROFITS.—United States shareholder's pro rata share referred to in paragraph (1) is the amount—

"(A) which would have been distributed with respect to the stock which such shareholder owns (within the meaning of section 958) in such corporation if on the last day, in its taxable year, on which the corporation is a controlled foreign corporation it had distributed pro rata to its shareholders an amount (i) which bears the same ratio to its earnings and profits for the taxable year, as (ii) the part of such year during which the corporation is a controlled foreign corporation bears to the entire year, reduced by

"(B) an amount (i) which bears the same ratio to the earnings and profits of such corporation for the taxable year, as (ii) the part of such year described in subparagraph (A)(ii) during which such shareholder did not own (within the meaning of section 958) such stock bears to the entire year.

"(b) EARNINGS AND PROFITS.—For purposes of this subpart, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, the earnings and profits of any foreign corporation, and the deficit in earnings and profits of any foreign corporation, for any taxable year—

"(1) except as provided in section 312(m)(3), shall be determined according to rules substantially similar to those applicable to domestic corporations,

"(2) shall be appropriately adjusted for deficits in earnings and profits of such corporations for any prior taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986, and

"(3) shall not include any item of income which is effectively connected with the conduct by such corporation of a trade or business within the United States unless such item is exempt from taxation (or is subject to a reduced rate of tax) pursuant to a treaty obligation of the United States.

"(c) COORDINATION WITH FOREIGN PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANY PROVISIONS.—In the case of a United States shareholder who, for his taxable year, is subject to tax under section 551(b) (relating to foreign personal holding company income included in gross income of United States shareholders) on income of a controlled foreign corporation, the amount required to be included in gross income by such shareholder under subsection (a) with respect to such company shall be reduced by the amount included in gross income by such shareholder under section 551(b).

"(d) ADJUSTMENTS AND FOREIGN TAX CREDITS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary—

"(1) Adjustments to the basis of stock on account of earnings and profits taxed under subsection (a) shall be made in the manner provided in section 961 (relating to increases and reductions in basis on account of the income tax treatment of subpart F income);

"(2) Elimination of double taxation of previously taxed earnings and profits when distributed shall be made in the manner provided in section 959 (relating to exclusion from gross income of previously taxed subpart F income); and

"(3) Corporations shall be deemed to have paid income, war profits, and excess profits taxes paid (or deemed paid) by foreign corporations to a foreign country or possession of the United States in accordance with the special rules set forth in section 960.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of subparts of such part is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Subpart J. Undistributed profits of controlled foreign corporations.".

(c) TERMINATION OF SUBPART F.—Section 951 (relating to taxation of subpart F income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER DECEMBER 31, 1986.—No amount shall be required to be included in the gross income of a United States shareholder under subsection (a) (other than paragraph (1)(A)(ii) of such subsection) with respect to a taxable year of a controlled foreign corporation beginning after December 31, 1986.".

SEC. 402. REPEAL OF FSC AND INTEREST CHARGE DISC.

(a) FSC.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 921 (relating to exempt foreign trade income excluded from gross income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) TERMINATION.—This section shall not apply to any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986.".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 922 (defining FSC) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) TERMINATION.—No corporation shall be treated as a FSC for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986.".

(b) INTEREST CHARGE DISC.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 991 (relating to tax exemption of a DISC) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"This section shall not apply to any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1984.".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(A) Section 992(a) (defining DISC) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) TERMINATION.—No corporation shall be treated as a DISC for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986.".

(B) Section 995(b)(2) (relating to deemed distributions upon DISC disqualification) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) A corporation which, by reason of the provisions of section 992(a)(4), is a former DISC, for its first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986, shall be treated, for purposes of this paragraph, as having failed to satisfy the conditions of section 992(a)(1) for such taxable year.".

Subtitle B—Other Miscellaneous Provisions

SEC. 411. REPEAL OF TAX EXEMPTION FOR CREDIT UNIONS.

Paragraph (14) of section 501(c) (relating to list of exempt organizations) is hereby repealed.

SEC. 412. REDUCTION OF ANNUAL LIMITS FOR DEFINED BENEFIT AND DEFINED CONTRIBUTION PLANS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—

(1) DEFINED BENEFIT PLANS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of section 415(b) (relating to limitation for defined benefit plans) is amended by striking out "$90,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000".

(B) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(i) Subparagraph (C) of section 415(b)(2) is amended—

(I) by striking out "$90,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000", and

(II) by striking out "$75,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000".

(ii) Subparagraph (D) of section 415(b)(2) is amended by striking out "$90,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000".

(iii) Section 415(b)(7) is amended by striking out "$90,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000".

(2) DEFINED CONTRIBUTION PLANS.—Paragraph (1) of section 415(c) (relating to limitation for defined contribution plans) is amended by striking out "$30,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,000".

(b) REPEAL OF COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS.—

(1) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (d) of section 415 (relating to cost-of-living adjustments) is hereby repealed.

(2) CONTINUATION OF ADJUSTMENT IN THE AMOUNT OF PARTICIPANT'S AVERAGE COMPENSATION FOR HIGH 3 YEARS.—Subsection (b) of section 415 (relating to limitation for defined benefit plans) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(8) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a participant who is separated from service, the amount taken into account under paragraph (1)(B) shall be annually adjusted for increases in the cost-of-living in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. Such regulations shall provide for adjustment procedures which are similar to the procedures used to adjust primary insurance amounts under section 215(i)(2)(A) of the Social Security Act.

"(B) BASE PERIOD.—The base period taken into account for purposes of subparagraph (A) shall be the last calendar quarter of the calendar year before the calendar year in which the participant is separated from service.".

SEC. 413. METHOD OF ACCOUNTING FOR TAXPAYERS ENGAGED IN FARMING.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—The section heading and subsection (a) of section 447 (relating to method of accounting for corporations engaged in farming) are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 447. METHOD OF ACCOUNTING FOR TAXPAYERS ENGAGED IN FARMING.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—The taxable income from farming (including timber) shall be computed on an accrual method of accounting and with the capitalization of preproductive expenses described in subsection (b).".

(b) ACCRUAL METHOD NOT REQUIRED FOR TAXPAYERS HAVING GROSS RECEIPTS OF $1,000,000 OR LESS; REPEAL OF OTHER EXCEPTIONS.—Section 447 is amended by striking out subsections (c), (d), (e), (g), and (h) and by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) TAXPAYERS HAVING GROSS RECEIPTS OF $1,000,000 OR LESS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—This section shall not apply with respect to any taxpayer if for each prior taxable year of such taxpayer beginning after December 31, 1986 (December 31, 1975, in the case of a corporation), such taxpayer (and, in the case of a corporation, any predecessor) did not have gross receipts exceeding $1,000,000. For purposes of the preceding sentence, all taxpayers which are treated as a single employer under subsection (a) or (b) of section 52 (as in effect before its repeal) shall be treated as 1 taxpayer.

"(2) FARMING SYNDICATES SUBJECT TO ACCRUAL METHOD WITHOUT REGARD TO AMOUNT OF GROSS RECEIPTS.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any farming syndicate (as defined in section 464(c)).".

(c) CERTAIN EXPENSING DEDUCTIONS NOT ALLOWED TO TAXPAYERS TO WHOM SECTION 447 APPLIES.—Section 447 is amended by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) TAXPAYERS TO WHOM SECTION APPLIES NOT ALLOWED TO EXPENSE CERTAIN EXPENDITURES.—In the case of a taxpayer to whom this section applies, the following provisions shall not apply:

"(1) section 175 (relating to soil and water conservation expenditures),

"(2) section 180 (relating to expenditures by farmers for fertilizer, etc.), and

"(3) section 182 (relating to expenditures by farmers for clearing land.".

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The item relating to section 447 in the table of sections of subpart A of part II of subchapter E of chapter 1 is amended by striking out "corporations" and inserting in lieu thereof "taxpayers".

SEC. 414. ADJUSTMENTS TO COMPLETED CONTRACT METHOD.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 229 of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (relating to modification of regulations on the completed contract method of accounting) is amended by redesignating subsections (b) and (c) as subsections (c) and (d), respectively, and by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b) DEFERRAL OF INCOME OR LOSS TO BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DETERMINING TAX LIABILITY UNDER COMPLETED CONTRACT METHOD OF ACCOUNTING.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The tax treatment of any long-term contract with respect to which the completed contract method of accounting is used shall take into account the fact that under such method there has been a deferral of income or loss for purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

"(2) SECRETARY OF TREASURY TO PRESCRIBE REGULATIONS ESTABLISHING METHODS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of the Treasury (or his delegate) shall prescribe regulations establishing 2 methods which carry out the purposes of paragraph (1), the exact method and the simplified method.

"(B) ALLOCATION OF INCOME AND LOSS TO PROPER YEAR.—Each method described in subparagraph (A) shall be based on allocating to each taxable year in which activities relating to the long-term contract occur such taxable year's proper share of the net income or loss from the contract.

"(C) EXACT METHOD.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'exact method' means a method under which interest is computed under chapter 67 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 on the underpayments or overpayments for prior taxable years which would result solely from the application of subparagraph (B).

"(D) SIMPLIFIED METHOD.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'simplified method' means a method under which the taxpayer's income or loss for the current year is adjusted by an amount which represents interest on each amount which is allocated under subparagraph (B) to a taxable year before the current year. For purposes of the preceding sentence, interest shall be computed under subchapter C of chapter 67 of such Code but at 70 percent of the rates established by section 6621 of such Code.

"(E) $10,000 SMALL BUSINESS EXEMPTION.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—For each current year, the first $10,000 of interest equivalent which (but for this subparagraph) would be owed by the taxpayer under subparagraph (C) or (D) shall not be taken into account.

"(ii) RELATED PERSONS RULE.—For purposes of clause (i)—

"(I) all trades or businesses (whether or not incorporated) which are under common control shall be treated as 1 taxpayer, and

"(II) all interest equivalents of the taxpayer (and related persons) shall be taken into account.

"(F) ELECTION.—The taxpayer may elect the exact method or the simplified method at such time and in such manner as may be prescribed by regulations. Such an election shall apply to all long-term contracts to which the completed method of accounting applies, and (once made) may be revoked only with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate.

"(G) CURRENT YEAR DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'current year' means the taxable year in which the income or loss from the long-term contract is taken into account under the completed method of accounting.".

(b) ELIMINATION OF EXCEPTION FOR CONTRACTS COMPLETED WITHIN 3 YEARS.—Subparagraph (A) of section 229(c)(2) of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (as redesignated by subsection (a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'extended period long-term contract' does not include any construction contract entered into by a taxpayer whose average annual gross receipts over the 3 taxable years preceding the taxable year in which such contract is entered into does not exceed $25,000,000.".

SEC. 415. HIGH INCOME TAXPAYERS REQUIRED TO MAKE ESTIMATED PAYMENTS EQUAL TO 90 PERCENT OF CURRENT YEAR TAX.

Section 6654 (relating to penalty for failure by individual to pay estimated tax) is amended by redesignating subsection (i) as subsection (j) and by inserting after subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) HIGH INCOME TAXPAYERS REQUIRED TO PAY 90 PERCENT OF CURRENT YEAR TAX.—In the case of any individual whose adjusted gross income for the taxable year exceeds $100,000, paragraph (1)(B)(i) of subsection (d) shall be applied by substituting '90 percent' for '80 percent'.".

SEC. 416. RECOGNITION OF GAIN OR LOSS ON DISTRIBUTIONS OF PROPERTY BY CORPORATIONS.

(a) DISTRIBUTION.—Section 311 (relating to taxability of corporation on distribution) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 311. TAXABILITY OF CORPORATION ON DISTRIBUTION.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as provided in subsection (b), gain or loss shall be recognized to a corporation on the distribution of property with respect to its stock in the same manner as if the property distributed had been sold to the distributee at its fair market value.

"(b) EXCEPTION FOR DEBT OF CORPORATION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to any distribution of an obligation of the corporation.".

(b) DISTRIBUTIONS IN LIQUIDATION.—Section 336 (relating to distributions of property in liquidation) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 336. DISTRIBUTIONS OF PROPERTY IN LIQUIDATION.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as provided in subsection (b), gain or loss shall be recognized to a corporation on the distribution of property in complete liquidation in the same manner as if the property distributed had been sold to the distributee at its fair market value.

"(b) EXCEPTION WHERE BASIS DETERMINED UNDER SECTION 334(b).—Subsection (a) shall not apply to any liquidation under section 332 for which the basis of property received is determined under section 334(b).".

(c) REPEAL OF SECTION 337.—

(1) Section 337 (relating to gain or loss on sales or exchanges in connection with certain liquidations) is hereby repealed.

(2) ADJUSTMENTS TO SECTION 338.—

(A) Paragraph (1) of section 338(a) (relating to certain stock purchases treated as asset acquisitions) is amended by striking out "to which section 337 applies".

(B) Subsection (c) of section 338 is hereby repealed.

SEC. 417. ELIMINATION OF SPECIAL BAD DEBT RESERVES OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.

(a) BANKS.—

(1) Paragraph (1) of section 585(b) (relating to addition to reserves for bad debts of banks) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of section 166(c), the reasonable addition to the reserve for bad debts of any financial institution to which this section applies shall be an amount determined by the taxpayer which shall not exceed the addition to the reserve for losses on loans determined under the experience method as provided in paragraph (2).".

(2) Subsection (b) of section 585 is amended by striking out paragraphs (2) and (4) and by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (2).

(b) OTHER FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.—Subsection (b) of section 593 (relating to addition to reserves for bad debts) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) ADDITION TO RESERVES FOR BAD DEBTS.—For purposes of section 166(c), the reasonable addition for the taxable year to the reserve for bad debts of any taxpayer described in subsection (a) shall be the amount determined to be a reasonable addition to the reserve to the extent such amount does not exceed an amount determined in the same manner as provided with respect to additions to the reserves for losses on loans of banks under section 585(b)(2).".

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 501. EFFECTIVE DATES

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1986.

(b) TRUST THROWBACK RULES.—The amendment made by section 121(c) shall apply with respect to income accumulated during taxable years of trusts beginning after December 31, 1986.

(c) CREDITS.—

(1) INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT.—The repeals made by section 201(2) shall apply to—

(A) property (to which section 46(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 does not apply) placed in service after December 31, 1986, and

(B) property to which such section 46(d) applies to the extent of qualified progress expenditures made after December 31, 1986.

(2) PRESERVATION OF EXISTING CARRYOVERS.—The repeals made by section 201 shall not apply to any carryover of an excess credit from a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1987, to a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986; except that any carryover to a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1986, shall be reduced to an amount equal to 30/46 of the amount which would have been such carryover but for this paragraph.

(d) INCREASE IN CASH SURRENDER VALUE OF LIFE INSURANCE CONTRACTS.—The amendment made by section 214 shall apply with respect to policy years beginning after December 31, 1986.

(e) TAX-EXEMPT BONDS.—The amendments made by section 215 shall apply to obligations issued after December 31, 1986.

(f) DEPRECIATION.—The amendment made by section 301 shall apply with respect to property placed in service after December 31, 1986, in taxable years ending after such date.

(g) ALTERNATIVE TO COST DEPLETION.—The amendments made by section 302 shall apply with respect to property from which production first begins after December 31, 1986.

(h) ELIMINATION OF DEFERRAL OF INCOME OF CONTROLLED FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.—The amendments made by section 401 shall apply to taxable years of foreign corporations beginning after December 31, 1986, and to taxable years of United States shareholders in which or with which such taxable years of the foreign corporation end.

(i) RECOGNITION OF GAIN OR LOSS ON DISTRIBUTIONS OF PROPERTIES.—

(1) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) of section 416 shall apply to distributions after December 31, 1986, in taxable years ending after such date.

(2) The amendments made by subsection (c) of section 416 shall apply to sales or exchanges after December 31, 1986, in taxable years ending after such date.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, it is a testament to the creative work of Senator BILL BRADLEY and Congressman DICK GEPHARDT that tax reform is closer to realization today than at any time in the last decade. The Fair Tax Act, which I am pleased to support as an original cosponsor, has literally redefined the debate over what we can do to restore a sense of sanity and economic efficiency to the system of revenue collection in this country.

As a result of their work, the President and his Treasury Department became late recruits to the battle over tax reform and simplification. There are now two constructive proposals on the table which propose major reforms in the system. They both attempt and in many ways succeed in achieving the goals of simplicity, fairness, and efficiency. That the major Republican and Democratic proposals are in accord in this regard is a major step forward. The year 1985 has become the time for sweeping and significant tax reform.

Since the inception of system in 1913, taxation has become, more and more, an instrument of policy. Besides funding Government activities, and adjusting modestly the disparity in the incomes of rich and poor, the system has been stressed by the adoption of broader goals.

Tax policy has been used to fight inflation and recession. It has been relied upon to promote economic growth through incentives for investment and savings. It has become a tool of social policy, and the locus for an improvisational industrial policy. It is burdened by the demands of powerful interests who seek rewards for activities they wish to pursue or simply to shelter their income.

In some cases, the road to complexity has been paved with the best of intentions. But the costs of these conflicting and competing demands are known to us all. We have a tax code that is rent with complexity. Now, over 40 percent of taxpayers require the advice of professional accountants and attorneys to determine what they owe. Taxpayers are united by a deep suspicion that the burdens imposed by the system on them are not distributed fairly or shared equally. There is a pandemic preoccupation with beating the system. The inevitable consequence is an understandable unwillingness among our citizens to support those programs which the tax system is designed to support.

Both the Fair Tax Act and the Treasury Department's reform proposal are designed to deal with these problems. They embrace the notion of economic neutrality. Investors will be encouraged to allocate economic resources on the basis of utility and reward instead of simply taking advantage of loopholes. Tax rates are lowered for individuals and corporations. Even though most tax preferences are eliminated, most taxpayers would pay less, in some cases substantially less, than under the current system. On the corporate side, essential reforms are made so that businesses once again pay their fair share.

In large part, the credibility of the existing system has been undermined by the manner in which corporations are taxed. After passage of the President's 1981 tax bill, many of this country's largest and most profitable businesses are paying no taxes whatever. From 1981 to 1983, Dow Chemical paid an effective rate of minus 28.7 percent on $776 million in profits. General Dynamics paid an effective rate of minus 7.6 percent on $930 million in profits. General Electric paid an effective rate of minus 4.3 percent on $6.5 billion in profits. W.R. Grace, a company which has led the fight to eliminate wasteful Government spending, paid an effective tax rate of minus 1.8 percent on $684.1 million in profits.

There are those who argue that repeal of the investment tax credit and ACRS will be harmful to business and retard the recovery. The facts do not support this conclusion. According to a recent analysis, the average increase for business investment in plant and equipment was 1 percent from 1980 to 1984 compared with 6½ percent over the preceding 4 years. We had a worse business investment record after ITC and ACRS than before. In the real world, the market for goods and services determines how companies can make wise investment decisions. The current system is wasteful in that it provides rewards for what corporations would do ordinarily. By repealing ITC, and reforming the system of business depreciation, the Fair Tax Act will make a major improvement in the existing system.

Cosponsorship of the Bradley-Gephardt fair tax bill does not indicate total support for the entire breadth and width of the proposal. Even Senator BRADLEY would agree, surely, that the Treasury package has some attractive provisions. It is our hope, however, that the debate on tax reform will not be deflected because of intractable arguments over specific differences between the plans. Reform will depend—both politically and financially—on people being willing to give up the tax breaks they favor simultaneously.

There have been indications that the administration, for example, is backing away from some of the specifics of the December plan—particularly on the business side. To the extent that the President or the Treasury Department caves in to pressure on the revision of ACRS, energy companies, banks, labor, life insurance firms, and others will want special treatment as well. This would kill the possibility of reform.

I similarly urge my colleagues on the Democratic side to work closely with the sponsors of the Fair Tax Act. This is a Democratic proposal in the best sense of the term. It aids people of moderate and middle income who have traditionally looked to us for representation in the political process. This legislation packages a variety of reforms which Democrats have been urging for a decade or more. Enactment of legislation along these lines will close loopholes and thereby boost compliance by all taxpayers. Rates will be lowered substantially. Shelters will be eliminated and disparities between and among corporate taxpayers will be reduced.

This legislation represents, in my judgment, a major step forward for the principles of simplicity, fairness, and economic efficiency. A proposal such as this deserves bipartisan support and should be implemented this year.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my senior colleague from New Jersey [Senator BRADLEY] by cosponsoring the Fair Tax Act of 1985. I cosponsored this legislation by the last Congress. Unfortunately, comprehensive tax reform was not a high priority of the 98th Congress. In fact, it has not been a high priority for any Congress in recent history. Far from it. Tax bill after tax bill has been enacted. Almost without exception, they have added to the welter of special provisions that have come to characterize our tax system. Reform proposals, in contrast, have simply been buried, often without the benefit of last rites. The result is a tax structure that is unduly complex, inefficient, and unfair.

The current system, in short, is in need of an overhaul. Almost no one disagrees on that point. Certainly not the average taxpayer. But genuine tax reform has been rather like the weather. Everyone has talked about it but no one has been willing to do much about it.

This year, the situation is beginning to change. The Fair Tax Act, and the hard work Senator BRADLEY and Congressman GEPHARDT have devoted to it over the last several years, have made a big difference. The administration's recent interest in tax reform is also significant. Add to this the other proposals in the works and it is easy to see that the debate on tax reform has advanced significantly. But we still have a long way to go and many hurdles to surmount before we get there.

Mr. President, responsible tax policy has to aim at several goals:

First, a good tax system should be simple enough to understand and to administer efficiently. It should make compliance as easy and painless as possible and offer no inducements to evasion and dishonesty.

Second, a tax system should be fair and it should be perceived as fair. There should not be outrageous disparities among taxpayers in essentially the same circumstances. Everyone who can should bear a fair share of the burden of supporting the common defense and providing essential public services. And there should be no tax-free millionaires, nor tax-exempt profitable corporations.

Third, tax policy should promote economic efficiency and growth. It should not distort economic choices. Nor should it create disincentives for risktaking, capital formation, and investment.

Finally, our tax system should be consistent with certain broadly shared social objectives. Tax policy cannot be considered entirely apart from such quality of life concerns as housing, homeownership, and educational opportunity.

Mr. President, no particular tax plan could meet all these tests perfectly. In fact, these objectives—most of which a majority of Americans would support—are not altogether compatible. But a sound tax structure must be able to maintain a reasonable balance among them all. The existing code fails to do so.

The bill we are introducing today is not perfect either, Mr. President. But it is an important step in the right direction. It begins the task of working out a reform plan that will do justice to the basic goals of the tax policy. This will not be easy. A long, hard road lies ahead. Adjustments and compromises may have to be made. But I believe this bill is a good place to start.

The structure it would establish is sound and realistic. It lowers and simplifies tax rates, broadens the tax base by eliminating or curtailing many special provisions, and retains a number of benefits that serve significant economic and social objectives. The Fair Tax Act would tax individuals at three rates—14 percent, 26 percent, and 30 percent. Corporations would pay a single rate of 30 percent.

Both the personal exemption and standard deduction would be significantly increased. The effect would be to exempt the first $9,200 of an average family's income from tax. Moreover 80 percent of all taxpayers would pay at the lowest rate—14 percent—on their taxable income. At the same time, favorable tax treatment would be preserved for home mortgage interest, charitable contributions, Social Security, and veterans benefits, IRA's and Keoughs, State and local income and property taxes, and other important priorities.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that I look forward to working together with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and with the administration in getting a sensible reform plan adopted. This bill initiates that process. We have a long way yet to go. But the rewards—in increased efficiency, equality, and growth—will be more than worth the effort.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the fair tax plan which will be introduced by my colleague Senator BILL BRADLEY of New Jersey.

I am doing so because tax reform that will lead to fairer taxes, simpler tax forms, and lower personal tax rates is necessary for the health of our economy, and is greatly desired by millions of frustrated taxpayers. I believe the Bradley-Gephardt fair tax measure is the best plan thus far offered, but, my sponsorship does not mean I support it in every detail.

Early last month I spent 2 weeks in California holding a series of eight community roundtable discussions on the twin topics of modified flat tax reforms and the proposed budget freeze plans. Each roundtable panel consisted of 24 invited participants who were selected from among citizens who were not political activists or advocates of any special interest group or organization. We sought to bring together men and women who were representative of all Californians.

I began each discussion with brief opening remarks which set out the broad issues of tax reform. I wanted to learn from Californians what they thought about the tradeoffs involved in obtaining reform of our complicated tax structure in order to make it simple and fair and to lower rates.

I learned that Californians understand that the Government uses the tax system for social and economic purposes, not just to raise revenues. And they understand that to get reform and to lower the tax rates they must be willing to give up a significant number of exclusions, exemptions and deductions—that is, to expose more of their income to taxation but at lower rates.

I asked the panelists at every meeting to discuss two major questions:

First. Is the tax system the best way to subsidize—in an effort to stimulate—the American economy?

We could, after all, provide the same help through direct subsidy payments, loan guarantees and other means which do not involve the tax system. But are these alternatives good ideas? Are they practical?

Second. Do the benefits our economy and our society derive from the current tax system outweigh the fact that it places an unfair tax burden on the majority of people?

Is it, in the long run and in terms of the total economy, worth it to 3 out of 4 American taxpayers to pay more in taxes than they would under a modified flat tax plan so that the economy can be stimulated by permitting wealthy investors to pay proportionately lower taxes?

These are not easy questions.

I was impressed by the effort made by each participant to grapple with the difficult reality of the choices involved.

I also was impressed that people wanted to think through the choices for themselves and were unwilling to follow someone else who would say "this or that is in your best interest."

This brings me to a very basic reason why I believe it is important for the Senate to begin serious consideration of tax simplification soon. The process will take time. People are interested and want to be involved.

The modified flat tax reform introduced by my colleague Senator BRADLEY was the first of the serious tax reform proposals and it was initiated, I am proud to say, by Democrats and was endorsed in principle by the Democratic Party Convention in San Francisco last summer.

Though I support the Bradley-Gephardt plan, I am by no means committed to its every detail. I believe, for example, that it should be modified to allow for a tax differential for capital gains, or some adjustment to keep venture capital and investment flowing into the kind of high tech research and development important to our economic growth and prosperity. I've already advised Senator BRADLEY that I will be working for such a modification.

I find much to commend—but also a good deal to differ with—in the other two major proposals on the table, the Kemp-Kasten plan and the reforms proposed by Secretary of the Treasury Donald Regan.

We may be at a unique point in our political history. For the first time in many years there could be a developing consensus among the Treasury, the White House, and Congress to replace our current complicated and cumbersome Tax Code with some sort of flat tax or modified flat tax plan.

There are those who want to restore a measure of real progressivity in the tax burden who understand that the current progressive rate structure doesn't do the job. Then there are those who think that high marginal tax rates discourage workers, lead investors into unwise tax-reduction schemes and generally hold down the efficiency of the economy.

In addition, there is the widespread perception among the great majority of ordinary taxpayers that the current system treats them unfairly.

Tens of millions of Americans who earn wages and salaries and are in the middle and lower income brackets believe—and the facts back them up—that they pay their full share of taxes because their taxes are withheld automatically through payroll deductions. They are convinced that the present tax system is unfair because they know that higher income people can get away with paying less because much of their income is not subject to withholding. And wealthy taxpayers can afford to hire tax accountants and lawyers to find loopholes in the law through which they can legally reduce their taxes substantially.

Peoples' disrespect for the system is a factor in the widespread cheating among many millions of individuals who have decided not to report income totaling an estimated $250 billion. Many Americans have been found to cheat on their returns on small items of less than $100—but the revenue loss on these petty items alone totals $2.3 billion.

Finally, congressional efforts to restore fiscal balance to the Social Security trust fund increased the payroll tax burden on the working poor. Clearly, the total tax burden on low and moderate income working families is unfair and must be redressed.

All three of the major tax reform plans on the table deal in sensible and fair ways with these issues.

Each plan increases the threshold under which a low income family would pay no income tax.

Each compresses the current 14 rate brackets to 3 or less and lowers the maximum tax rate from 50 percent to a range of 24 percent to 35 percent.

Each eliminates and modifies many of the current deductions and tax credits, retaining only those already well-established and normally claimed by most individuals who itemize deductions.

Each reduces the current incentive for wealthy investors to seek tax shelters.

Each lowers the marginal corporate income tax rate.

Each plan greatly reduces the differential in effective tax rates for different types of business and industry.

Each plan shares a strong commitment to making it possible for the economic changes essential to our Nation's future security to occur unimpeded by Federal tax policy.

I believe these commitments are based on a convergence of significant principles and carry the authors of the three major tax reforms plans and their cosponsors far beyond the ordinary bandwagon jumping that often takes place in the Senate.

Our current tax system has functioned as an industrial and social policy tool for many decades. Some economists are worried that abandoning the present array of special tax incentives would amount to a sudden termination of those policies with very severe consequences for the economy. Others, on the opposite side, agree with Lester Thurow of MIT that, "If you stay with the current tax system you will destroy America."

Eliminating or greatly modifying the many provisions of current tax law and policy will change how we look at our personal finances and the economy in general. It would change how museums, symphony orchestras, and private educational institutions are financed. The nature of the real estate industry and construction could change. We really do not know all the consequences. Trying to find out some of them is another major reason to proceed quickly with consideration of tax reform.

But—as I learned from listening to the participants of the roundtable discussions I held in California—even in the face of these momentous choices and changes, people still want a better, fairer tax system with lower rates.

The Congress is not polarized along partisan lines on this matter. And there is no reason we should be. We have a Treasury that is onboard. And, we have a President who, if he chooses to do so, can help lead the way.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my remarks to the California community forums on modified flat tax be printed at the conclusion of my statement.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MODIFIED FLAT TAX—CALIFORNIA COMMUNITY FORUMS

By Senator Alan Cranston

There are two top priority economic issues that will confront Congress early in the session—and that will occupy much of our attention over the coming weeks and months.

One is whether we should reform our complicated and inequitable tax structure—to make it simple, to make it fair, and to lower the rates.

The other is whether we should impose some kind of a freeze on federal spending—as a first step toward reducing the huge budget deficit that is undermining our economy.

We will discuss both this morning.

The first topic is how to restore public confidence in our tax system.

So far, three tax reform proposals have been put forward. They are fairly simple in broad concept—but the details are complicated.

Our current tax laws allow a huge number of often complex deductions against income to reduce a person's income tax. Some taxpayers can and do take maximum advantage of these deductions; most taxpayers do not. The average American taxpayer who works for a salary and has only small savings benefits little if at all from these potential deductions. In fact, 38 percent of American taxpayers don't even itemize their deductions.

On the other hand, wealthier taxpayers with large incomes from investments have much greater opportunities under our tax code to reduce their income taxes.

Thus the amount of income tax as a percentage of income varies enormously from taxpayer to taxpayer.

Billions of dollars go each year into nonproductive tax shelters and other tax-avoidance schemes that contribute little or nothing to the strength and productivity of our national economy.

Billions more go into tax-evasion scams.

Last year the tax system collected $460 billion, but $370 billion was lost through exclusions, deductions, credits and accounting loopholes.

Another $250 billion of income is not being reported each year and so escapes all taxes whatsoever this causes a revenue loss of between $60 to $70 billion.

The high rates, complexity and the unfairness of the present system encourage such cheating. The complexity is also costly. Collectively, taxpayers will spend about $3 billion just to figure out what they owe the treasury come April 15.

Even worse, under the present tax system many individuals and businessmen devote an immense amount of time figuring out how to avoid paying taxes rather than how to be more productive. Many of their investment decisions are made on the basis of what will reduce their taxes rather than what will increase productivity, profits and jobs.

The advocate of tax reform are saying that if we eliminated most deductions and got them down to a minimum of five or six which everyone could agree on (like charitable deductions and interest on a home mortgage), we could reduce tax rates for everybody without reducing federal revenues—and 70-75 percent of American taxpayers would end up paying less income tax than they do now.

If these figures are correct, it means that under our present tax laws, 3 out of 4 Americans pay more income taxes—and 1 out of 4 Americans pay less—than they would under a reformed tax system

* * * * *

But we don't use our tax system just for revenues.

We use it for other social or economic purposes. We also use it to stimulate industries which need some sort of government help or indirect subsidy. We use it to encourage private investments and savings which might otherwise not be made. And we use it to help local and state governments by exempting their securities from federal taxation.

Why do we do this?

Well, some businessmen argue that without tax laws which permit items like accelerated depreciation, investment tax credits, depletion allowances, or intangible expenses, some needed segments of our economy could not survive. Investors argue that lower tax rates on their return is mandatory if they are to risk their capital, especially in high-risk ventures. State and local governments argue that they would be forced to cut services and infrastructure unless they could issue tax exempt securities.

The problem is that tax concessions can be used to create unproductive tax shelters, tax deferral plans, tax free income and so on which permit certain individual taxpayers to reduce—or even eliminate—their taxes.

Tax reform means we must decide which few tax exclusions, exemptions and deductions we want to retain—and which we are prepared to give up. And in making such choices, we must bear in mind that if we fail to give up enough of those exclusions, exemptions and deductions, we will not be able to achieve the lower tax rates most of us want.

For business, tax reform may mean lower tax rates—but it probably will mean higher taxes. Flat-tax advocates assert, however, that businessmen will benefit more by investing their money in ways that will increase the efficiency and productivity of their company rather than in ways that merely lower their taxes.

The immediate effects will differ from industry to industry.

High tech companies seeking capital probably would benefit under some of the reforms being discussed.

But construction and home-building industries would lose if the investment tax credit, rapid depreciation and liberal deductability of interest expenses were taken away.

Who will be the winners and who will be the losers? Will our economy be better or worse off over-all?

Essentially, the question I would like us to discuss this morning is two-fold:

1. Is the tax system the best way to subsidize—in an effort to stimulate—the American economy?

We could, after all, provide the same help through direct subsidy payments, loan guarantees and other means which do not involve the tax system. But are these alternatives good ideas? Are they practical?

2. Do the benefits our economy and our society derive from the current tax system outweigh the fact that it places an unfair tax burden on the majority of Americans?

Is it, in the long run and in terms of the total economy, worth it to 3 out of 4 American taxpayers to pay more taxes than they would under a modified flat tax plan so that the economy can be stimulated by permitting wealthy investors to pay proportionately lower taxes?

A secondary question is: If we decide to adopt a tax reform proposal, what are those few deductions we should retain?

These are not easy questions.

I think I know some of the answers, but I certainly don't know all of them.

By Mr. JOHNSTON (for himself, Mr. WARNER, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S. 410. A bill to repeal the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

REPEAL OF COMMERCIAL AND APARTMENT CONSERVATION SERVICE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today on behalf of myself, Senator MCCLURE, Senator MURKOWSKI, and Senator WARNER, I am introducing a very simple bill. It would repeal the amendments to the National Energy Conservation Policy Act [NECPA] that were enacted in 1980 to require electric and gas utilities to offer comprehensive site-specific energy audit services to their customers who are owners of multifamily dwellings and commercial buildings. This program is called the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service [CACS].

My bill does not affect the provisions of NECPA enacted in 1978 to require utilities to offer energy conservation services to residential customers in individual residences. This program, which my bill leaves intact, is called the Residential Conservation Service.

This legislation will provide the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and, ultimately, the Senate, with a vehicle for a review of the extent to which we believe it necessary to compel electric utilities to offer energy conservation services to their customers. This review may produce ideas for legislation different from my bill. We may decide to leave things just as they are. But we won't know about that until the review takes place. I hope that hearings on this issue will be scheduled soon so the process can begin.

The Residential Conservation Service and the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service are two Federal programs that require electric and gas utilities to offer their customers site-specific information about energy conservation opportunities in the buildings where these customers live or work. The RCS Program has been in effect nationwide since 1979. The CACS Program is set to go into effect nationwide in 1985. CACS State plans for Michigan, Rhode Island, New Mexico, and Arkansas have been approved and more plans may be approved at any time. Action by DOE approving a CACS State plan triggers implementation of CACS in that State.

On July 30, 1984, the House passed and sent to the Senate H.R. 5946, the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984. This bill made several changes in the RCS Program, including the extension until 1990 of a requirement that utilities notify their customers of the availability of the required services. This notification requirement was set to expire on January 1, 1985.

The House bill also repealed the CACS Program. Because this legislation arrived in the Senate late in the session, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources decided to simply extend both programs for a year to obtain time to review the proposed reforms during the 99th Congress. The Senate adopted the committee's approach without a dissenting vote, but the Senate's position proved unacceptable to the House, and H.R. 5946 died at the end of the 98th Congress.

On January 1, 1985, the RCS notification requirement expired. On December 31, 1984, DOE published a notice of proposed rulemaking on its CACS Federal Standby Program Regulations (49 FR 50970). In the event that a State refuses to provide an adequate CACS State plan for its utilities, DOE must implement the Federal standby plan in that State. DOE is reviewing CACS State plans for several States and nonregulated utilities and is near approval for California, North Carolina, and Wisconsin. These will be the next States in which the CACS program will be implemented.

In Senate Report 98-625, the committee indicated its intent to review the RCS and CACS programs in the 99th Congress. On November 2, 1984, I joined the chairman and seven other members of the committee in writing to the Secretary of Energy to urge that no action be taken with respect to RCS or CACS if that action would require new, irreversible commitments of resources by utilities to these programs. In this letter we indicated our intent to review these programs early in the 99th Congress. On January 15, 1985, Senator WEICKER and I wrote to Under Secretary of Energy to request DOE's opinion as to what responsibilities remain under the RCS program now that the notification requirement has lapsed.

On February 1, 1985, Secretary Hodel responded to these letters and indicated that the Department intends to go forward with the CACS program, despite the administration's opposition to it. It is the Department's position, however, that "utilities are free to terminate their RCS programs within a reasonable time after the last offer of services is made on or about January 1, 1985." Clearly this position will be controversial.

My purpose in introducing this bill is to begin the debate on what, if anything, the committee and the Senate want to do about these programs. The important thing now is to get hearings on this bill scheduled soon so that a full airing of the issues can occur.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill and a copy of Secretary Hodel's February 1, 1985 letter to me—with an attachment—be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 410

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Conservation Service Reform Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) IN GENERAL.—Title VII of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to energy conservation for commercial buildings and multifamily dwellings) is hereby repealed.

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents for such Act is amended by striking out the items relating to title VII.

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY,
Washington, DC, February 1, 1985.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSTON: Thank you for your letter of November 2, 1984, concerning implementation of the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service (CACS) program and the Residential Conservation Service (RCS) program. Before addressing your specific concerns let me state that the Department continues to support repeal of these two programs which we feel are burdensome, overly restrictive, and often not cost-effective. Moreover, we are in full agreement with you that to the extent permissible by law program costs should be minimized pending program review by the Congress in this session.

Under the CACS legislation, State participation in the CACS program is entirely voluntary. Once a State plan is submitted and not subsequently withdrawn, however, section 721 of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (NECPA) requires the Department to review and either approve or disapprove the plan according to a prescribed timetable. Although both the Senate and the House passed legislation that would have repealed or postponed this provision, final Congressional action unfortunately was not taken before the 98th Congress adjourned. Thus, notwithstanding our opposition to the CACS program, we are required by law to proceed in good faith with our review of the proposed CACS plans.

To date the Department has received a total of 63 CACS plans from States and utilities. Of these, four have been approved and 57 other States and utilities have been informed of necessary changes to their plans to meet the regulatory requirements for approval. Initial reviews of two plans have not yet been completed.

Regarding the CACS program startup costs, section 731 of NECPA allows utilities 12 months from the date of plan approval before they must have offered program services. Thus there is opportunity to avoid major startup costs if Congress acts early in this session to repeal or amend CACS.

Under section 741 of NECPA, DOE is required to implement a Federal Standby Plan (FSP) in States that do not choose to participate in CACS. A proposed rulemaking for the CACS FSP was published in the Federal Register on December 31, 1984. The public comment period closes March 1, 1985. Beyond that, the rule must be finalized, and its timing and other procedural provisions respected, before Standby could be implemented in those States that elect not to participate in the program.

In addition, your letter addresses the potential for unfair competition in the CACS and RCS programs. We share this concern. With regard to the CACS program, however, section 216(g) of NECPA is not applicable and our statutory authority to monitor and enforce against anticompetitive acts or practices in the CACS program is limited. Nevertheless, subject to this limited authority we have promulgated regulations which we feel will provide reasonable safeguards to ensure competition. Moreover, the Department will continue to monitor the RCS program, with the assistance of the Federal Trade Commission, to ensure that anticompetitive acts or practices are prevented or corrected. If necessary, the Department is prepared to use whatever available authority is appropriate, including section 216(g)(2) authority, to preserve competition. Furthermore, we have adopted several additional procedures, such as consultation with the Small Business Administration and notice and an opportunity for public comment, for our review of waiver requests for utility supply and installation activities. A more detailed discussion of this will be included in our annual report to Congress.

Finally, you have requested the Department to notify you regarding our authority and responsibility to implement and enforce compliance with the RCS program provisions after January 1, 1985. It is the position of the Department that utilities are free to terminate their RCS programs within a reasonable time after the last offer of services is made on or about January 1, 1985. On the related matter of enforcement, to date the Department has issued RCS Standby orders to utilities in six States without approved RCS plans and is currently reviewing the matter of RCS enforcement after January 1, 1985. You will be informed of the outcome of this review before any further related action is taken.

In closing let me say that I appreciate your interest in the development and implementation of these two programs by the Department. Moreover, I would like to offer any assistance we may be able to provide in your upcoming review of these programs.

Sincerely,

DONALD PAUL HODEL.

DOE DETERMINATION ON THE TERMINATION OF THE RCS PROGRAM

DOE has determined that it will formally notify States, nonregulated utilities and utilities under the Federal Standby Plan that utilities covered by NECPA are allowed to terminate their RCS programs within a reasonable time after they have completed their current cycle of unconditional audit offers.

IMPLICATIONS FOR RCS STATES

Such a State:

Must notify its utilities of DOE's position,

Must make the determination of what constitutes a "reasonable time" and notify its utilities,

Must notify DOE of the expected expiration date of its utilities' programs or any plans for continuing an audit program,

Must continue to meet its program responsibilities (e.g., Master record, monitoring, etc.) as long as its utilities are still providing RCS program services, and

Must continue to meet the regulatory annual reporting requirements to DOE through July 1, 1986.

This determination does not affect RCS or other audit programs mandated by State laws or regulations.

IMPLICATIONS FOR RCS NONREGULATED UTILITIES

Such a utility:

Must make the determination of what constitutes a "reasonable time,"

Must notify DOE of the expected expiration date of its program or any plans to continue an audit program,

Must complete its distribution cycle of unconditional audit offers and provide the audit and arranging services requested in response to these offers,

Must continue to meet its other program responsibilities (e.g., Master record, monitoring, etc.) as long as it is providing RCS program services, and

Must continue to meet the regulatory annual reporting requirements to DOE through July 1, 1986.

This determination does not affect RCS programs mandated by State laws or regulations or audit programs carried out voluntarily by the utility.

IMPLICATIONS FOR RCS REGULATED UTILITIES

Such a utility:

Must complete its distribution cycle of unconditional audit offers and provide the audit and arranging services requested in response to these offers, following the "reasonable time" determined by the State lead agency,

Must continue to meet its other program responsibilities as long as it is providing RCS program services, and

Must continue to meet the regulatory annual reporting requirements to its state lead agency through July 1, 1986.

This determination does not affect RCS programs mandated by State laws or regulations or audit programs carried out voluntarily by the utility.

IMPLICATIONS FOR FEDERAL STANDBY UTILITIES

Such a utility:

Must complete its distribution cycle of unconditional audit offers,

Must allow customers 60 days in which to accept the audit offer,

Must allow customers 30 days in which to request arranging services following the audit,

Must notify DOE of the expected expiration date of its program or any plans to continue an audit program,

Must continue to meet its other program responsibilities as long as it is providing RCS program services, and

Must continue to meet the regulatory annual reporting requirements to DOE through July 1, 1986.

This determination does not affect RCS or other audit programs carried out voluntarily by the utility.●

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 411. A bill to reduce individual income tax rates, to increase savings of individuals, to broaden the income tax base, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

BROAD-BASED ENHANCED SAVINGS TAX ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, a short while ago I introduced S. 243, the Broad-Based Enhanced Savings Tax Act of 1985. The same bill has been introduced by Congressman HENSON MOORE on the House side. The bill is identical to the bill that we introduced during the 98th Congress.

Mr. MOORE and I set several goals that we felt were essential to tax reform, and our bill has achieved these objectives. The important aspects are:

The bill provides substantial savings incentives which serve to minimize the tax bias against saving and investment that exists in our Tax Code.

The bill substantially lowers marginal tax rates and, therefore, diminishes the disincentives against work effort and saving.

Through substantial base broadening, the bill provides for a system that raises the same revenue as our current system. This was certified last year by the Joint Committee on Taxation.

The bill does not change the distribution of the tax burden by income class. Each income class will pay the same percentage of taxes as under current law.

The bill is fair to all taxpayers and greatly simplifies the Tax Code.

Mr. President, I am encouraged by the bipartisan nature of the tax reform movement in this Congress. I applaud the efforts of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. BRADLEY] and his House colleague [Mr. GEPHARDT].

I also applaud the efforts of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN], and his House cosponsor [Mr. KEMP]. The two bills introduced by these gentleman are innovative, important plans, and our Nation would be better off under either of these plans. I also want to congratulate the Treasury Department on their innovative work.

The one flaw in these plans is that they don't go far enough to remove the bias against savings in our Tax Code. Now there is a reason why these plans didn't address the antisavings bias. Up until relatively recently, the conventional wisdom held that you couldn't put substantial savings inventives in a tax reform. It was argued that if you put in savings incentives, one or more of three things would happen: You'd lose enormous sums of revenue, or you'd need high marginal rates for the tax burden would be shifted from rich to poor.

Mr. President, when the Joint Committee on Taxation began work on the technical aspects of my proposal, they were given the following instructions:

Come up with a rate structure that allows substantial savings incentives, does not alter the income distribution, raises the same amount of revenue as current law, and results in lower marginal tax rates.

And, Mr. President, that is exactly what the joint committee came back with.

This bill, which I am introducing today, should be considered a serious proposal, but it should be recognized that even the best plan may have some flaws. We are placing this bill in the public eye so that people can debate it, criticize it, and make suggestions. This bill does prove that moving in this direction is worthwhile and that a system doesn't have to penalize saving in order to be equitable and raise revenue.

Mr. President, we must remove the bias against saving.

Our present Tax Code has got to be one of the most archaic, complex, and cumbersome documents ever produced. It is a maze of special rules, technical amendments, technical changes to technical amendments, special exemptions, and so on, and so forth.

The reason that you see a lot of these things in the code is because the tax system penalize a lot of economic activities that it shouldn't.

Congress, in turn, has tried to take the pressure off some of these activities by granting special exemptions. Other exemptions were, quite frankly, put into effect by the efforts of special interest groups.

The one activity that has beeen penalized the most in this economy has been savings and investment. And yet, it is this sector which is so crucial to our present and future international competitive posture.

I believe that many Senators would agree that our Nation's declining ability to keep up with the international competition in recent years, is, in large measure, the result of our dismal level of personal savings and investment.

America is a land of tremendous opportunity and growth; our country is welling over the new ideas and inventions; our entrepreneurial spirit is alive and as vigorous as ever; our Nation is still well ahead of the rest of the world in discovering and developing new technologies.

But when it comes to finding the capital to put these new ideas and technologies to use, we come up short. Our rate of personal savings—the chief source of capital for industrial growth and modernization—is pitifully small compared to those of our major trading partners in the Pacific Basin and Western Europe.

But why don't we save more? Why does a nation that has always recognized the importance and value of putting something aside for a rainy day have a personal savings rate of around only 4.7 percent? From 1970 to the present, the U.S. savings rate has averaged less than 7 percent, while the Japanese, for example, has an average savings rate of almost 20 percent. Why this imbalance?

I believe the primary answer can be found in a tax system which encourages consumption now and discourages savings for the future. Our current tax system contains an inherent bias against savings; in fact, it penalizes savings by taxing them twice. Once when the money is earned, and again when it produces income in a savings account or other interest-earning investment.

Eliminating this double taxation of savings is a vital and necessary ingredient in reforming our tax system. We need a tax system that encourages, rather than penalizes, personal saving. Why? Because every dollar saved is a dollar that go to new investment to build new plants or to modernize old ones and to create jobs. Savings is the engine that drives long-term economic growth. At the same time, we need simplified Tax Code with lower rates for the average taxpayers.

Our tax plan, like the others that have been proposed, will broaden the tax base, reduce marginal rates, and simplify the tax system. But it will go one vital step further. It will remove the existing bias against saving and investment in order to provide our Nation with the needed savings for economic growth.

Let me briefly describe my tax plan which will replace the existing individual income tax.

Specifically, we would eliminate virtually all the existing exemptions, deductions, and credits. The only exceptions would be the home mortgage interest deduction, a deduction for charitable contributions, and a deduction to protect against catastrophic medical expenses. In addition, legitimate business expenses for a personal business will, of course, be deductible.

In order to insure that no one below the poverty line is taxed, the system would expand the substantial zero bracket amount—the old standard deduction—and retain personal exemptions. The earned income credit would also be expanded beyond that of current law.

In this system, there would be one other deduction—and it is this deduction that makes this plan uniquely suited to stimulate savings and investment.

Most income invested in a savings account or other savings instrument would not be taxed until it is withdrawn and spent.

The centerpiece of this plan would be the creation by Congress of supersavings accounts—Susa for short. The Susa would function much like current IRA's. Except that saving could be for any purpose, not just retirement. The funds could also be withdrawn at any time without penalty.

Net contributions to the Susa would be tax deductible and net withdrawals would be added to taxable income. Within the account, investment could be made in any financial asset. The limits on the Susa would be $10,000 for an individual and $20,000 for a couple filing jointly. Existing IRA's would be rolled into the Susa's, but my plan would retain existing Keogh's as a separate entity not covered by the Susa limits.

The second major feature of my plan is to replace the complicated system of capital recovery provisions and credits for equipment with immediate expensing. This is crucial to our goal of creating an environment for investment for economic growth. Lives for structures will also be shortened.

Of course, any proposal as dramatic as this necessarily poses a number of transition problems. To mitigate some of the transitional difficulties, our tax system would be phased in over a period of 5 years. In close consultation with the Joint Committee on Taxation, we have determined that a permanent rate structure of four rates between 12 and 34 percent would be sufficient to make the system revenue and income distribution neutral.

Who then should support such a tax system?

In my judgment, the broad spectrum of the American populace would benefit substantially from such a proposal and would be strong supporters of our initiative.

Groups that would benefit would include:

Young married couples—the future hope of our society—who look forward, for the first time, to owning their own homes. The supersavings accounts would provide low-interest mortgage money to help make home ownership a reality.

Middle-aged and middle-income families—the very backdone of our Nation—who want to save whether for their children's education, a summer home in the country, a long awaited and needed vacation, or whatever.

The elderly, who have toiled countless hours to make our country great and now find themselves—under our present tax system—unable to save tax free. With our proposals, the elderly could save funds tax free to help protect themselves against catastrophic illness or to provide a legacy for their children.

The jobless and underemployed—unwilling victims of technological change—would support this initiative because this new system would create new jobs by increasing the competitiveness of U.S. products and services in world markets.

The American business community—our plan would provide a steady and expanding source of capital so necessary for business growth.

In short, anyone who wants to see the United States preserve its economic strength, anyone who wants to maintain and strengthen the benefits of this recovery, anyone who wants to see America reassert its leadership in world trade and industrial productivity will support our initiative.

The time is ripe to jettison our present outmoded, cumbersome, and inherently biased tax system and replace it with one that is simple and fair. The system we proposed today does that and more. Our tax plan encourages savings and investment, lays the groundwork for sustained economic growth and job creation, and ensures a better life for all of our citizens.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD along with title-by-title analysis.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; ETC.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Broad-Based Enhanced Savings Tax Act of 1985".

(b) AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(c) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate, not later than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, shall submit to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Finance of the Senate a draft of any technical and conforming amendments to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which are necessary to reflect the substantive amendments made by this Act.

TITLE I—REDUCTION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATES

SEC. 101. REDUCTION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—So much of section 1 (relating to tax imposed) as precedes subsection (f) is amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. TAX IMPOSED.

"(a) MARRIED INDIVIDUALS FILING JOINT RETURNS AND SURVIVING SPOUSES.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every married individual (as defined in section 143) who makes a single return jointly with his spouse under section 6013, and every surviving spouse (as defined in section 2(a)), a tax determined in accordance with the following table:

Over $30,000	$8,181, plus 45% of the excess over $30,000.

"(e) ESTATES AND TRUSTS.—There is hereby imposed on the taxable income of every estate and trust taxable under this subsection a tax determined in accordance with the following table:

"If taxable income is:	The tax is:
Not over $8,225	18% of the taxable income.
Over $8,225 but not over $13,225.	$1,481, plus 26% of the excess over $8,225.
Over $13,225 but not over $28,225.	$2,781, plus 36% of the excess over $13,225.
Over $28,225	$8,181, plus 45% of the excess over $28,225.".

(b) ADDITIONAL DECREASES IN TAX RATES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) ADDITIONAL REDUCTION IN RATES.—In prescribing the tables under subsection (f) for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1987, the Secretary shall substitute the following percentage rates for the percentage rates in the tables contained in subsection (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e):

"In the case of a taxable year beginning in:	Substitute for each percentage the percentages listed under it:
	18%	26%	36%	45%
1988	17	24	34	42
1989	14	21	31	37
1990 and thereafter	12	20	30	34.".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 1(f)(2) is amended—

(A) by inserting "except as provided in subsection (g)," before "by" in subparagraph (B), and

(B) by inserting "and the adjustments under subsection (g)" after "brackets" in subparagraph (C).

(c) INDEXATION OF TAX TABLES.—

(1) INDEXING TO BEGIN IN 1986.—Paragraph (1) of section 1(f) (relating to adjustments in tax tables so that inflation will not result in tax increases) is amended by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

(2) COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT.—Paragraph (3)(B) of section 1(f) is amended by striking out "1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "1984".

(3) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 1(f) are each amended by striking out "paragraph (3) of".

SEC. 102. INCREASE IN EARNED INCOME CREDIT.

(a) INCREASE IN PERCENTAGE FROM 11 PERCENT TO 13 PERCENT.—Section 32(a) (relating to earned income credit) is amended by striking out "11 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "13 percent".

(b) INCREASE IN BASE FROM $5,000 TO $5,200.—Section 32(a) is amended by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,200".

(c) ADJUSTMENTS SO THAT INFLATION WILL NOT REDUCE THE VALUE OF CREDIT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Section 32 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i) INFLATION ADJUSTMENTS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Not later than December 15 of 1985 and each subsequent calendar year thereafter, the Secretary shall prescribe the amounts which shall apply in lieu of—

"(A) the $5,200 amount contained in subsection (a),

"(B) the $676 amount contained in subsection (b)(1),

"(C) the $6,900 amount contained in subsections (b)(2) and (f)(2)(B), and

"(D) the $12,308 amount contained in subsections (f)(2) (A) and (B), with respect to taxable years beginning in the succeeding calendar year.

"(2) METHOD OF ADJUSTING AMOUNTS.—The amounts which shall apply in lieu of the amounts referred to in paragraph (1) with respect to taxable years beginning in any calendar year shall be prescribed by increasing each such amount by the cost-of-living adjustment (as defined in section 63(d)(2)(C)) for such calendar year. If such increase is not a multiple of $10, such increase shall be rounded to the nearest multiple of $10 (or if such increase is a multiple of $5 but not a multiple of $10, such increase shall be increased to the next multiple of $10).".

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 3507(c)(2) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new flush sentence:

"Each time the Secretary makes an adjustment under section 32(i), the Secretary shall make the same adjustment to each amount contained in this paragraph.".

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS—

(1) Paragraph (1) of section 32(b) is amended by striking out "$550" and inserting in lieu thereof "$676".

(2) Paragraph (2) of section 32(b) is amended—

(B) by striking out "$6,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,900".

(3) Section 32(f)(2) is amended—

(A) by striking out "$11,000" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,308", and

(B) by striking out "$6,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,900".

(4) Section 3507(c)(2) (defining earned income advance amount) is amended by striking out "11 percent" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "13 percent",

(5) by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,200",

(6) by striking out "$6,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,900",

(7) by striking out "$11,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,308",

(8) by striking out "$2,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,600",

(9) by striking out "$3,250" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,450",

(10) by striking out "$5,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,154".

SEC. 103. INCREASE IN PERSONAL EXEMPTION FOR 1985.

Section 151(f) (defining exemption amount) is amended to read as follows:

"(f) EXEMPTION AMOUNT.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'exemption amount' means with respect to any taxable year, $1,050 increased by an amount equal to $1,050 multiplied by the cost-of-living adjustment (as defined in section 1(f)(3)) for the calendar year in which the taxable year begins. If the amount determined under the preceding sentence is not a multiple of $10, such amount shall be rounded to the nearest multiple of $10 (or if such amount is a multiple of $5, such amount shall be increased to the next highest multiple of $10).

"(2) 1985.—For taxable years beginning in 1985, the exemption amount shall be equal to $1,050.".

SEC. 104. REPEALS RELATED TO REDUCTION IN RATES.

The following provisions are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 55 (relating to alternative minimum tax for taxpayers other than corporations).

(2) Paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of section 402(e) (relating to special averaging rules for lump-sum distributions).

(3) Part I of subchapter Q of chapter 1 (section 1301 and following, relating to income averaging).

TITLE II—INCENTIVES FOR INVESTMENT AND SAVINGS

Subtitle A—Depreciation Reform

SEC. 201. EXPENSE-METHOD DEPRECIATION FOR PERSONAL PROPERTY PLACED IN SERVICE BY TAXPAYERS OTHER THAN C CORPORATIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 (relating to itemized deductions for individuals and corporations) is amended by inserting after section 168 the following new section:

"SEC. 168A. EXPENSE-METHOD DEPRECIATION FOR PERSONAL PROPERTY.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—There shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to the basis of each expense-method property placed in service by the taxpayer during the taxable year.

"(b) EXPENSE-METHOD PROPERTY DEFINED.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, for purposes of this title, the term 'expense-method property' means tangible property—

"(1) which is 3-year or 5-year property, and

"(2) which is placed in service—

"(A) after December 31, 1984, and

"(B) by a taxpayer other than a C corporation.

"(c) CERTAIN PROPERTY EXCLUDED FROM DEFINITION OF EXPENSE-METHOD PROPERTY.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) PROPERTY USED PREDOMINANTLY OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include property which, during the taxable year, is used predominantly outside the United States (within the meaning of paragraph (2) of section 48(a)).

"(2) LESSORS.—The term 'expense-method property' includes property with respect to which the taxpayer is the lessor only if the requirements of subparagraph (A) or (B) of section 46(e)(3) are met with respect to such property.

"(3) PROPERTY FOR WHICH INVESTMENT CREDIT NOT ALLOWABLE UNDER PRIOR LAW.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include any property which, if it had been placed in service before January 1, 1985, would have been excluded from the definition of section 38 property under—

"(A) paragraph (3) of section 48(a) (relating to property used for lodging),

"(B) paragraph (4) of section 48(a) (relating to property used by certain tax-exempt organizations), or

"(C) paragraph (5) of section 48(a) (relating to property used by governmental units).

"(4) TAX-EXEMPT USE PROPERTY.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include tax-exempt use property (within the meaning of section 168(j)(3)).

"(5) PROPERTY ACQUIRED AT DEATH.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include any property the basis of which in the hands of the taxpayer is determined under section 1014(a).

"(6) TAX-EXEMPT FINANCED PROPERTY.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include any property to which section 168(f)(12) applies (determined without regard to this section).

"(d) COORDINATION WITH SECTION 1245.—In the case of any disposition of expense-method property—

"(1) the excess referred to in paragraph (1) of section 1245(a) shall be determined as if such paragraph did not contain subparagraph (A) thereof,

"(2) paragraph (1) of section 1245(b) shall not apply, and

"(3) paragraph (3) of section 1245(b) (and paragraph (5) of section 1245(b) to the extent it relates to such paragraph (3)) shall not apply unless the transfer is in a transaction to which section 381(a) applies.

"(e) DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) DISPOSITIONS WITHIN 1 YEAR AFTER PROPERTY PLACED IN SERVICE.—The term 'expense-method property' does not include any property disposed of by the taxpayer before the date 1 year after the date on which such property was placed in service.

"(2) PROPERTY WHICH CEASES TO BE EXPENSE-METHOD PROPERTY.—If any expense-method property for which a deduction was allowable to the taxpayer under this section ceases to be expense-method property with respect to the taxpayer (other than by disposition)—

"(A) the taxpayer shall be treated as having disposed of such property on the date of such cessation, and

"(B) the basis of such property in the hands of the taxpayer after the date of such cessation shall be treated as equal to its fair market value as of such date.

"(3) 3-YEAR AND 5-YEAR PROPERTY.—The terms '3-year property' and '5-year property' have the meanings given such terms by section 168.

"(4) BASIS.—For purposes of this section, the basis of any property shall be the adjusted basis provided in section 1011 for purposes of determining the gain on the sale or other disposition of such property.

"(5) LIFE TENANTS AND BENEFICIARIES OF TRUSTS AND ESTATES.—Rules similar to the rules of section 167(h) shall apply for purposes of this section.

"(6) TRANSFEREE BOUND BY TRANSFEROR'S TREATMENT OF PROPERTY IN CERTAIN CASES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of expense-method property transferred in a transaction described in subparagraph (B), the transferee shall be treated as the transferor for purposes of computing the deduction allowable under subsection (a) with respect to so much of the basis in the hands of the transferee as does not exceed the adjusted basis in the hands of the transferor.

"(B) TRANSACTIONS COVERED.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the transactions described in this subparagraph are—

"(i) any transaction of property if the basis of such property in the hands of the transferee is determined by reference to its basis in the hands of the transferor by reason of section 351, 361, 721, or 731,

"(ii) any acquisition where the transferor and transferee are related persons, and

"(iii) any acquisition of property by any person if such person acquired the property from another person and leases it back to such other person (or a person related to such other person).

"(C) PROPERTY REACQUIRED BY THE TAXPAYER.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, expense-method property which is disposed of and then reacquired by the taxpayer shall be treated, for purpose of computing the deduction allowable under subsection (a), as if such property had not been disposed of.

"(D) RELATED PERSON DEFINED.—For purposes of this paragraph, a person is related to another person if—

"(i) the person bears a relationship to such other person specified in section 267(b) or 707(b)(1), or

"(ii) such persons are engaged in trades or businesses under common control (within the meaning of subsections (a) and (b) of section 52).

For purposes of clause (i), sections 267(b) and 707(b)(1) shall be applied by substituting '10 percent' for '50 percent'.

"(7) PROPERTY TREATED AS RECOVERY PROPERTY.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, expense-method property shall, for purposes of this title, be treated in the same manner as recovery property.

"(g) TRANSITIONAL RULES.—

"(1) IMMEDIATE EXPENSING FOR CERTAIN PROPERTY.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The taxpayer may designate items of expense-method property which shall be deductible under subsection (a) without regard to the rules of paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(B) LIMITATION.—The aggregate bases of expense-method property which are placed in service during any taxable year and which are designated under subparagraph (A) shall not exceed the amount determined in accordance with the following table:

"If the taxable year begins in:	The limit is:
1985, 1986, or 1987	$5,000
1988 or 1989	$7,500

"(2) ONLY CERTAIN PORTION OF PROPERTY TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Except in the case of property designated by the taxpayer under paragraph (1), this section shall apply only to the applicable percentage of the basis of expense-method property of the taxpayer placed in service before 1990.

"(B) APPLICABLE PERCENTAGE.—For purposes of subparagraph (A)—

"In the case of property placed in service during:	The applicable percentage is:
1985	50
1986	60
1987	70
1988	80
1989	90.

"(3) SPECIAL RULES FOR DESIGNATIONS UNDER PARAGRAPH (1).—

"(A) DESIGNATION.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—A designation under subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) shall be made on or before the due date prescribed by law (including extensions thereof) for filing the return under this chapter for the taxable year in which the property is placed in service. The designation shall be made in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe. Any such designation may not be revoked except with the consent of the Secretary.

"(ii) DESIGNATION APPLIES TO ENTIRE BASIS.—A designation under subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) shall apply to the entire basis of the property being designated, except that the designation may apply to a portion of the basis of one item if (but for this exception) the designation of such item would result in the limitation of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) being exceeded.

"(B) PARAGRAPH (1) NOT TO APPLY TO ESTATES AND TRUSTS.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to estates and trusts.

"(C) DOLLAR LIMITATION IN CASE OF PARTNERSHIPS OR S CORPORATIONS.—In the case of a partnership or S corporation, the dollar limitation of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) shall apply with respect to the partnership and with respect to each partner and with respect to the S corporation and with respect to each shareholder.

"(D) MARRIED INDIVIDUALS.—In the case of a separate return by a married individual (within the meaning of section 143), the dollar limitation of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) shall be one-half of the amount otherwise determined.

"(E) TRANSITIONAL RULE.—In the case of any taxable year which begins before January 1, 1985, and ends after December 31, 1984, the dollar limitation of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount which (but for this subparagraph) would be such limitation, as—

"(i) the number of months in such taxable year beginning after December 31, 1984, bears to

"(ii) 12.

A similar rule shall also apply in the case of a short taxable year beginning after December 31, 1984.

"(4) SPECIAL RULES FOR TRANSITION PERIOD.—

"(A) INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT ALLOWED FOR REMAINING BASIS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (11) of section 48(a) shall not apply to that portion of the basis of any expense-method property to which this section does not apply by reason of paragraph (2) (hereinafter in this paragraph referred to as the 'remaining basis').

"(ii) CLARIFICATION OF LIMIT ON USED PROPERTY.—For purposes of section 48(c)(2), the cost of any used section 38 property shall not include the portion of the cost of such property to which this section applies.

"(B) DEPRECIATION DEDUCTION ALLOWED.—The recovery deduction provided by section 168 shall apply to the remaining basis without regard to the last sentence of section 167(a).".

(b) TERMINATION OF REGULAR INVESTMENT CREDIT FOR PERSONAL PROPERTY.—Subsection (a) of section 48 (defining section 38 property) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(11) EXPENSE-METHOD PROPERTY.—For purposes of applying the regular percentage, the term 'section 38 property' shall not include any expense-method property (as defined in section 168A).".

(c) EXPENSE-METHOD DEDUCTION TREATED AS DEPRECIATION.—Subsection (a) of section 167 (relating to depreciation) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the case of expense-method property (as defined in section 168A), the deduction allowable under section 168A shall be deemed to constitute the reasonable allowance provided by this section."

(d) TREATMENT OF EXPENSE-METHOD DEDUCTION WITH RESPECT TO ACTIVITIES NOT ENGAGED IN FOR PROFIT.—Subsection (d) of section 183 (relating to activities not engaged in for profit) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "For purposes of this subsection and subsection (e)(2), in the case of expense-method property (as defined in section 168A), there shall be substituted for the deductions under section 168A the deductions which would be allowed for each taxable year if section 168 had applied to such property.".

(e) SECTION 179 NOT TO APPLY TO EXPENSE-METHOD PROPERTY.—Section 179(d)(1) (defining section 179 property) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The term 'section 179 property' does not include expense-method property.".

(f) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part VI of subchapter B of chapter 1 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 168 the following new item:

"Sec. 168A. Expense-method depreciation for personal property.".

SEC. 202. EXTENSION OF RECOVERY PERIOD FOR REAL PROPERTY TO 18 YEARS NOT TO APPLY AFTER 1989.

Subsection (g)(1) of section 111 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 is amended by inserting "and before January 1, 1990" after "1984".

SUBTITLE B—SAVINGS INCENTIVES

SEC. 211. SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by redesignating section 223 as 224 and by inserting after section 222 the following new section:

"SEC. 223. SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to the amounts paid in cash by such individual during the calendar year which ends with or within the taxable year to a super savings account.

"(b) MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF DEDUCTION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The amount allowable as a deduction under subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed the excess of—

"(A) the applicable limit, over

"(B) the amount allowable as a deduction under section 219 for such taxable year.

"(2) APPLICABLE LIMIT.—For purposes of this section, the term 'applicable limit' means the limit determined in accordance with the following table:

"For taxable years beginning in:	The limit is: Joint return	Other
1985	$15,000	$7,500
1986	$16,000	$8,000
1987	$17,000	$8,500
1988	$18,000	$9,000
1989	$19,000	$9,500
1990 and thereafter	$20,000	$10,000

"(c) SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNT DEFINED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'super savings account' means a trust created or organized in the United States for the exclusive benefit of the individual establishing such account or the beneficiaries of such individual, but only if the written governing instrument creating the trust meets the following requirements:

"(1) No contribution to the trust will be accepted unless it is in cash.

"(2) No contribution to the trust will be accepted for any taxable year which is in excess of the applicable limit for such taxable year.

"(3) All distributions from the trust will be in cash.

"(4) The trustee is a bank (as defined in section 401(d)(1)) or another person who demonstrates to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the manner in which such person will administer the trust will be consistent with the requirements of this section.

"(5) The interest of an individual in the balance of the account is nonforfeitable.

"(6) The assets of the trust will not be commingled with other property except in a common trust fund or common investment fund.

"(7) The assets of the account may be invested in accordance with the direction of the individual establishing the account, except that the assets may not be used to acquire any collectable (within the meaning of section 408(m)(2)).

"(d) TAX TREATMENT OF DISTRIBUTIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, any amount paid or distributed out of a super savings account shall be included in gross income by the individual receiving such amount in the taxable year in which such payment or distribution is made.

"(2) EFFECT OF PLEDGING ACCOUNT AS SECURITY.—For purposes of paragraph (1), if, during any taxable year, the individual for whose benefit a super savings account is established uses the account or any portion thereof as security for a loan, the portion so used shall be treated as distributed to such individual.

"(3) EXCESS CONTRIBUTIONS RETURNED BEFORE DUE DATE OF RETURN.—Paragraph (1) does not apply to the distribution of any contribution paid during a taxable year to a super savings account to the extent that such contribution exceeds the amount allowable as a deduction under subsection (a) if—

"(A) such distribution is received on or before the day prescribed by law (including extensions of time) for filing such individual's return for such taxable year,

"(B) no deduction is allowed under subsection (a) with respect to such excess contribution, and

"(C) such distribution is accompanied by the amount of net income attributable to such excess contribution.

Any net income described in subparagraph (C) shall be included in the gross income of the individual for the taxable year in which it is received.

"(4) TRANSFER OF ACCOUNT INCIDENT TO DIVORCE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this subtitle—

"(A) the transfer of an individual's interest in a super savings account to the former spouse of the individual under a divorce decree or under a written instrument incident to such divorce shall not be considered a taxable transfer, and

"(B) the interest in such account shall, at the time of the transfer, be treated as a super savings account of the former spouse and not of the individual.

"(e) TAX TREATMENT OF ACCOUNTS.—

"(1) EXEMPTION FROM TAX.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), a super savings account is exempt from taxation under this subtitle.

"(2) TAX ON UNRELATED BUSINESS INCOME.—Notwithstanding paragraph (1), a super savings account shall be subject to any tax imposed by section 511 (relating to imposition of tax on unrelated business income of charitable, etc. organizations).

"(f) SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) NO DEDUCTION FOR CONTRIBUTION OF BORROWED AMOUNTS.—No deduction shall be allowed under subsection (a) for any contribution to a super savings account out of the proceeds of any indebtedness incurred or continued by the individual making the contribution.

"(2) COMMUNITY PROPERTY LAWS.—This section shall be applied without regard to any community property laws.

"(3) CUSTODIAL ACCOUNTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—A custodial account shall be treated as a trust if—

"(i) the assets of such account are held by a person described in subsection (c)(4), and

"(ii) the account would, but for the fact it is not a trust, constitute a super savings account.

"(B) TRUSTEE.—For purposes of this title, the custodian of an account treated as a trust by reason of subparagraph (A) shall be treated as a trustee of such account.

"(4) CONTRIBUTIONS OTHER THAN CASH ALLOWED IN 1985.—Notwithstanding subsection (a) or (c)(1), stocks, bonds, or other securities readily tradeable on an established securities market may be transferred to a super savings account during calendar year 1985. In computing the amount of the deduction under subsection (a), and in applying the limit under subsection (b), the fair market value (as of the date of transfer) of any property so transferred shall be taken into account.

"(g) REPORTS.—The trustee of a super savings account shall make such reports regarding such account to the Secretary and to the individual for whose benefit the account is maintained with respect to contributions, distributions, and such other matters as the Secretary may require under regulations. The reports required by this subsection shall be filed at such time and in such manner and furnished to such individuals at such time and in such manner as may be required by those regulations.".

(b) DEDUCTION ALLOWED IN ARRIVING AT ADJUSTED GROSS INCOME.—Paragraph (10) of section 62 (defining adjusted gross income) is amended—

(1) by striking out "Retirement savings" and inserting in lieu thereof "Savings", and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "and the deduction allowed by section 223 (relating to deduction of certain payments to super savings accounts)".

(c) TAX ON EXCESS CONTRIBUTIONS.—Section 4973 (relating to tax on excess contributions to individual retirement accounts, certain section 403(b) contracts, certain individual retirement annuities, and certain retirement bonds) is amended—

(1) by inserting "SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS," after "ACCOUNTS," in the caption of such section,

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) as (3) and (4), and by inserting after paragraph (1) the following:

"(2) a super savings account (within the meaning of section 223(c)),", and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) EXCESS CONTRIBUTIONS TO SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS.—For purposes of this section, in the case of a super savings account, the term 'excess contributions' means the amount by which the amount contributed for the taxable year to the account exceeds the amount allowable as a deduction under section 223(b) for such taxable year. For purposes of this subsection, any contribution which is distributed out of the super savings account and a distribution to which section 223(d)(3) applies shall be treated as an amount not contributed.".

(d) TAX ON PROHIBITED TRANSACTIONS.—Section 4975 (relating to prohibited transactions) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(20 percent in the case of a prohibited transaction involving a super savings account)", and

(2) by inserting "or a super savings account described in section 223(c)" in subsection (e)(1) after "described in section 408(a)".

(e) FAILURE TO PROVIDE REPORTS ON SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS.—Section 6693 (relating to failure to provide reports on individual retirement account or annuities) is amended—

(1) by inserting "OR SUPER SAVINGS ACCOUNTS" after "ANNUITIES" in the caption of such section, and

(2) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following: "The person required by section 223(g) to file a report regarding a super savings account at the time and in the manner required by such section shall pay a penalty of $10 for each failure unless it is shown that such failure is due to reasonable cause.".

(f) STUDY.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall conduct a study on whether section 223 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 should be modified to take into account any differences between common law and community property States and report to the Congress the results of such study, together with any recommendations.

(g) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) The table of sections for part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 223 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 223. Super savings accounts.

"Sec. 224. Cross references.".

(2) The table of sections for chapter 43 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 4973 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 4973. Tax on excess contributions to individual retirement accounts, super savings accounts, certain 403(b) contracts, certain individual retirement annuities, and certain retirement bonds.".

(3) The table of sections for subchapter B of chapter 68 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 6693 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 6693. Failure to provide reports on individual retirement accounts or annuities or on super savings accounts.".

(2) Section 217 (relating to deduction for moving expenses).

(3) Section 221 (relating to deduction for two-earner married couples).

(4) Section 222 (relating to deduction for adoption expenses).

Part II—Other Changes

SEC. 332. REPEAL OF ADDITIONAL PERSONAL EXEMPTION DEDUCTIONS FOR TAXPAYERS 65 OR OVER.

Section 151 (relating to allowance of deductions for personal exemptions) is amended by striking out subsection (c).

SEC. 333. LIMITATION ON INTEREST DEDUCTION.

Subsection (d) of section 163 (relating to limitation on interest on investment indebtedness) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) LIMITATION ON INTEREST DEDUCTIONS OF INDIVIDUALS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation, the amount allowed as a deduction under this chapter for nonbusiness interest shall not exceed the qualified housing interest for the taxable year.

"(2) NONBUSINESS INTEREST.—The term 'nonbusiness interest' means any interest allowable as a deduction under this chapter (determined without regard to paragraph (1)) other than interest allowable as a deduction in computing adjusted gross income (determined with regard to paragraph (4)).

"(3) OTHER DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) QUALIFIED HOUSING INTEREST.—The term 'qualified housing interest' means interest which is paid or accrued during the taxable year on indebtedness which is incurred in acquiring, constructing, or substantially rehabilitating any property which—

"(i) is the principal residence (within the meaning of section 1034) of the taxpayer at the time such interest accrues or is paid, or

"(ii) is a qualified dwelling used by the taxpayer (or any member of his family within the meaning of section 267(c)(4)) during the taxable year.

"(B) QUALIFIED DWELLING.—The term 'qualified dwelling' means any—

"(i) house,

"(ii) apartment,

"(iii) condominium, or

"(iv) mobile home not used on a transient basis,

including all structures or other property appurtenant thereto.

(1) by striking out paragraph (3), and

(2) by striking out "; and" at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 165 is amended by striking out subsection (h).

SEC. 335. INCREASE IN FLOOR ON MEDICAL DEDUCTION.

Subsection (a) of section 213 (relating to medical, dental, etc., expenses) is amended by striking out "5 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent".

Subtitle D—Repeal of Special Capital Gains Treatment

SEC. 336. REPEAL OF SPECIAL CAPITAL GAINS TREATMENT.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 1202 (relating to deduction for individuals for capital gains) is hereby repealed.

(b) LIMITATION ON CAPITAL LOSSES APPLIED WITHOUT REGARD TO DISTINCTIONS BETWEEN SHORT TERM AND LONG TERM.—

(1) Subsection (b) of section 1211 (relating to limitation on capital losses in the case of taxpayers other than corporations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) OTHER TAXPAYERS.—In the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation, losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets shall be allowed only to the extent of gains from such sales or exchanges plus (if such losses exceed such gains) the smaller of—

"(1) $3,000 ($1,500 in the case of a separate return by a husband or wife), or

"(2) the excess of losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets over gains from such sales or exchanges.".

(2) Subsection (b) of section 1212 (relating to carryovers for taxpayers other than corporations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) OTHER TAXPAYERS.—If a taxpayer other than a corporation has a net capital loss for any taxable year, the excess (if any) of—

"(1) the amount of such loss, over

"(2) the amount allowed for the taxable year under paragraph (1) or (2) of section 1211(b), shall be treated as a capital loss in the succeeding taxable year.".

TITLE IV—EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 401. EFFECTIVE DATES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

(b) DEPRECIATION REFORM.—The amendments made by subtitle A of title II shall apply to property placed in service after December 31, 1984, in taxable years ending after such date.

(c) PRESERVATION OF EXISTING CREDIT CARRYOVERS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The repeals made by section 301 shall not apply to any carryover of an excess credit from a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1985, to a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1984; except that any carryover to a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1984, shall be reduced to an amount equal to the applicable fraction (for the taxable year to which such credit is being carried) of the amount which would have been such carryover but for this paragraph.

(2) APPLICABLE FRACTION.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the applicable fraction shall be determined as follows:

In the case of a taxable year beginning in:	The applicable fraction is:
1985	45/50
1986	none
1987	none
1988	42/45
1989	37/42
1990	34/37

(C) REDUCTION IS PERMANENT.—In computing the amount of the carryover to any taxable year following a taxable year in which a reduction is made under paragraph (1), such carryover shall not be increased by the amount of such reduction.

THE BROAD-BASED ENHANCED SAVINGS TAX ACT OF 1985

GENERAL EXPLANATION—OVERVIEW

The bill would amend the individual income tax to reduce marginal tax rates and the number of tax brackets, expand incentives for investment and savings, and broaden the tax base. The reduction in marginal tax rates and the expansion of incentives for investment and savings would begin in 1985 and would be fully phased in by 1990. Provisions that broaden the tax base would generally take effect in 1985.

The bill is designed to be approximately revenue neutral. Also, the bill is designed so that each income class would pay approximately the same share of the tax burden under the phased-in proposal as under present law.

TITLE I—REDUCTION OF MARGINAL TAX RATES

The bill would reduce the number of tax brackets to four. In 1985, the brackets would begin at $2,400, $15,000, $25,000 and $50,000 of taxable income for unmarried individuals, for married persons filing jointly, the brackets would begin at $3,550, $20,000, $30,000 and $60,000 of taxable income. This structure incorporates a $100 increase in the zero bracket amount for unmarried individuals ($150 for married couples), which would be at least as great as the increase that indexing is expected to produce for 1985 under present law. The dollar amounts defining the rate brackets, including the zero bracket amount, would be indexed for inflation, beginning in 1986.

Marginal tax rates in the four brackets in 1985 would be 18, 26, 36 and 45 percent, respectively. These rates would be phased down in three steps in 1988, 1989 and 1990, so that after 1989 the marginal tax rates in the four brackets would be 12, 20, 30 and 34 percent, respectively.

The earned income credit for certain individuals and couples with children would be increased in 1985 to 13 percent of the first $5,200 of earned income, for a maximum credit of $676, and the credit would be phased out at a 12.5-percent rate as income increases from $6,900 to $12,308. The personal exemption would be increased in 1985 to $1,050, which would be at least as great as the increase that indexing is expected to produce under present law for 1985. Both the personal exemption and the earned income credit would be indexed for inflation, beginning in 1986.

Consonant with the flattened rate structure and reduced marginal tax rates provided by the bill, the alternative minimum tax for individuals (sec. 55), income averaging (sec. 1301), and special averaging rules for lump-sum distributions (sec. 402(e)) would be repealed.

TITLE II—INCENTIVES FOR INVESTMENT AND SAVINGS

Investment incentives

In lieu of current investment tax credits and capital cost recovery allowances stretching over 3 to 5 years, individuals would deduct the entire cost (expense) of machinery and equipment in the year it is placed in service. Expensing would be limited to expense-method property, which generally is property that is assigned to the 3-year or 5-year class and qualifies for the investment credit under present law. Thus, expensing would not be available with respect to property predominantly used outside the United States (sec. 48(a)(2)), certain property owned by noncorporate lessors (sec. 46(e)(3)), and property used by tax-exempt entities (sec. 168(j)(3)). In addition, expensing would not be available with respect to certain property financed with tax-exempt bonds (sec. 168(f)(12)) or acquired from a decedent (sec. 1014(a)).

Expensing would be phased in over 5 years. Fifty percent of the basis of expense-method property placed in service in 1985 would be expensed. This percentage would increase thereafter by 10 percentage points per year, so that expensing would be fully effective beginning in 1990. Notwithstanding the percentages prescribed by the phase-in schedule, the current option (sec. 179) to expense the first $5,000 of property ($7,500 in 1988 and 1989) would be retained through 1989.

The remaining basis—that is, the portion of cost of expense-method property that is not expensed because of the phase-in schedule—would be recovered as under present law. However, to prevent excessive benefits from the combination of the investment credit, ACRS deductions and declining marginal tax rates, the bill would reduce the regular investment credit for the remaining basis to 3 percent for 3-year property and 5 percent for 5-year property. Similarly, investment credits would not be available for individuals with respect to 10-year property and 15-year public utility property placed in service after 1984, and investment credit carryovers allowable in years after 1984 would be reduced as marginal tax rates are reduced.

Lastly, the recovery period for 18-year real property placed in service after 1989 would be reduced to 15 years.

Savings incentives

The bill provides that individuals may establish a super savings account (SUSA), which would operate to defer tax on income for so long as it is saved. Contributions to a SUSA would be deductible in determining adjusted gross income for the year they are made. There would be no penalty for distributions from a SUSA, but distributions would be included in adjusted gross income for the year they are made. Contributions and distributions would have to be in cash, except 1985 contributions could include stocks, bonds, or other securities readily tradeable on an established securities market. Income earned on assets of a SUSA would not be inlcuded in the tax base until distributed.

The bill provides rules designed to protect the proper operation of SUSAs as a stimulus to savings. No deduction would be allowed for contributions that are directly attributable to indebtedness which is incurred or continued to purchase or carry an interest in a SUSA. Assets of a SUSA that are used as security for a loan would be treated as distributed, and assets could not be used to acquire collectibles such as gems or antiques (sec. 408(m)(2)).

The maximum amount of the deduction allowed to an individual for net contributions to a SUSA during 1985 would be $7,500. This amount would then increase by $500 per year until it reaches $10,000 for 1990 and thereafter. For joint returns, the maximum amount would begin at $15,000 in 1985, then increase in annual increments of $1,000 until it reaches $20,000 for 1990 and thereafter. The bill would not affect the operation of IRAs, but the maximum amount allowed as a deduction for net contributions to a SUSA during a taxable year would be reduced by deductions taken for contributions to an IRA or otherwise allowed under section 219 for the year.

TITLE III—BASE BROADENING

The bill would broaden the individual income tax base by repealing or limiting many tax credits, exclusions, and deductions, beginning in 1985.

Tax Credits

The bill would repeal all nonrefundable personal tax credits other than the present credit for interest on certain home mortgages (sec. 25). Thus, the bill would repeal credits relating to expenses for household and dependent care services (sec. 21), the elderly and disabled (sec. 22), residential energy expenditures (sec. 23), and political contributions (sec. 29). In addition, credits relating to certain clinical testing expenses (sec. 28), producing fuel from a nonconventional source (sec. 29), and increasing research activities (sec. 30) would only be available to C corporations. Except for the reduced regular investment tax credit that is provided for the remaining basis of expense-method property during the phase-in of expensing, the general business credit (sec. 38) would only be available to C corporations.

Exclusions

The following exclusions would be repealed for individuals:

(1) employer-provided premiums on group-term life insurance (sec. 79);

(2) unemployment compensation benefits (sec. 85);

(3) employer-paid death benefits (sec. 101(b));

(4) certain military compensation for injuries or sickness (sec. 104(a)(4));

(5) employer-paid health plan premiums (sec. 106);
(6) rental value of parsonages (sec. 107);
(7) certain combat pay and mustering-out payments (sec. 112 and 113);
(8) partial exclusion of dividends (sec. 116);
(9) scholarship and fellowship income in excess of tuition (sec. 117);
(10) meals or lodging furnished for employer's convenience (sec. 119);
(11) amounts received under group legal service plans (sec. 120);
(12) one-time exclusion of gain on sale of principal residence (sec. 121);
(13) certain reduced military retirement pay (sec. 122);
(14) employer-provided transportation (sec. 124);
(15) cafeteria plans (sec. 125);
(16) cost-sharing conservation payments (sec. 126);
(17) educational assistance program benefits (sec. 127);
(18) employer-provided dependent care assistance (sec. 129);
(19) foster care payments received (sec. 131);
(20 earned income of citizens living abroad (sec. 911);
(21) foreign areas allowances and certain other allowances (sec. 912); and
(22) dividends reinvested in public utility stock (sec. 305(3)).

The current exclusion of payments received to encourage production of strategic minerals (sec. 621) would only be available to C corporations. The treatment of possession-source income for residents of a possession would generally follow the rules that now apply to residents of Puerto Rico (sec. 933).

Deductions

The bill would repeal deductions currently allowed to individuals for nonbusiness interest other than housing interest (sec. 163), taxes (sec. 164), moving expenses (sec. 217), two-earner married couples (sec. 221), and adoption expenses (sec. 222). Deduction for losses due to casualty or theft and not connected with a business or profit-seeking transaction (sec. 165(c) (3)) and for the long term capital gains of individuals (sec. 1202) would be repealed. Finally, medical expenses would be deductible only to the extent they exceed 10 percent of adjusted gross income (sec. 213), and the additional personal exemption for elderly taxpayers would be repealed (sec. 151(c)).●

S. 412. A bill to clarify the circumstances under which territorial provisions in licenses to distribute and sell trademarked malt beverage products are lawful under the antitrust laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MALT BEVERAGE INTERBRAND COMPETITION ACT

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation jointly with my colleague from Arizona, Mr. DECONCINI, and several other Senators, to reaffirm the legality under Federal antitrust laws of exclusive territorial agreements between breweries of beer and their wholesale distributors.

Now, let me make clear that the bill will not exempt beer wholesalers from the national antitrust laws. It merely confirms the consensus of prevailing case law that territorial agreements between a manufacturer and wholesaler are not per se in violation of antitrust rules. I am referring to the Supreme Court decision in Continental TV against GTE Sylvania in 1977 in which the Court held that so-called vertical, nonprice agreements between manufacturers and wholesalers do not per se automatically violate the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Passage of this legislation would have two important effects. First it would reinforce States rights under the 21st amendment to the Constitution, thus providing the States with maximum freedom and security in deciding the type of distribution best suited to local needs and regulatory systems. Second, it would preserve the integrity of the distribution system that for more than 50 years has been the procedure of choice for the overwhelming majority of States.

Mr. President, each of the States draw broad power from section 2 of the 21st amendment to regulate the use, transportation, or importation of malt beverages wholly in their territory. In the words of the Supreme Court:

> The Twenty-first Amendment grants the States virtually complete control over whether to permit importation or sale of liquor and how to structure the liquor distribution system.

Acting under this power and their reserved powers, 49 of the 50 States presently mandate or permit exclusive territorial distribution agreements between the manufacturers of trademarked malt beverages and the wholesalers who deliver those brands within their borders. The legislation we are introducing today will clarify the Federal law on these agreements.

Without such a clarification, State laws that either permit or require exclusive territorial agreements in the brewing industry could be subject to challenge in the Federal courts.

The Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act would not alter or supersede any State laws. It would only say that the States have the right to continue in the practices they have chosen or may choose in the future for the regulation of malt beverage distribution. A specific provision of the bill, in section 7, clearly preserves the supremacy of State law in the field.

It should be noted that, during the last Congress, the National Conference of State Liquor Administrators endorsed the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act. In a resolution passed June 23, 1983, the conference said the proposed bill "will greatly strengthen the ability of State liquor administrators to effectively discharge their responsibilities for controlling malt beverages * * * and promote more effective collection of * * * malt beverage excise taxes."

Exclusive territorial agreements have allowed State regulators to more easily monitor and control the distribution and sale of beer within State boundaries. These agreements put the responsibility for quality control on a single wholesaler and his employees. That responsibility goes so far as to include the maintenance and cleanliness of beer taps and coils in individual bars and retail outlets.

As for my second point—that retailers and consumers are best served by the territorial distribution of malt beverages—more than 50 years of experience argue that this is true.

Nationwide, the present distribution structure is made up of 4,500 beer wholesalers competing with each other at the local level in such a way as to provide customers of both large and small retail outlets maximum benefits in the form of service, variety, and quality of product.

The beer industry is marked by robust competition among brands. Brewers and their designated wholesalers fight for greater market share for their respective lines. Thus the real competition in the beer industry is among wholesalers marketing different brands, not among wholesalers selling the same brand. Consequently, the concern of this Chamber should be with the encouragement of interbrand competition. That is the focus of the bill. That is why the bill is called the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act.

As I stated earlier, in 1977, the U.S. Supreme Court, speaking generally for all products, held that a territorial agreement between a manufacturer and a wholesaler is not per se an antitrust violation. The Court also said a determination should be made in each case using a rule of reason.

The same decision held that competition is best served by promoting vigorous competition among differing brands of the same product, interbrand competition. The Court also found that territorial agreements may be necessary for a wholesaler to risk substantial capital investment, to hire the number of employees required for optimal service, to advertise and promote the product and to meet the commitment to serve all potential retailers of the product—large, medium sized, and small. All of those conditions are particularly applicable to the beer industry.

However, the Court's decision created a serious problem of interpretation. It failed to provide sufficient guidance as to how the rule of reason should be applied. This confusion has led to a welter of cases—some frivolous—and resulted in confusing legal standards as different courts applied the rule in different ways.

The legislation we are proposing would eliminate this confusion—by establishing a clearer statutory threshold test for determining the legality of territorial restrictions.

If substantial and effective competition exists, then the case would be dismissed. If, on the other hand no showing of substantial and effective competition can be made, a full antitrust trial would assess the reasons for the territorial restriction and its demonstrated consequences.

Thus, this bill would provide a two-step approach to antitrust analysis of territorial agreements for malt beverage distributors. It would not exempt beer wholesalers from any provisions of the antitrust laws. Section 3 expressly provides that it would not alter in any way the existing prohibitions against price fixing or any form of horizontal restraint of trade. Nor would the bill remove the right of private persons to recover treble damages for injuries caused by any agreement that does not meet the requirement of substantial and effective competition among different brands of beer in the same area. But the bill may eliminate or reduce frivolous or nuisance suits and relieve unjustly targeted defendants and our overburdened courts.

There is established legislative history to support the effectiveness of the substantial and effective competition standard. Congress embodied this same principle for the soft drink bottling and distribution industry when it enacted the Soft Drink Interbrand Competition Act in 1980.

Mr. President, when I first introduced this bill as S. 1680 last July, I warned that the alternative to territorial agreements for malt beverage distribution is transshipping. Transshipping encourages avoiding excise taxes and servicing only the largest, high-profit retail outlets. It undercuts hard-working local wholesalers who provide full service to all retailers and it may lead to a decline in product quality by unloading truckloads of stale beer on unknowing retailers.

Mr. President, by passing this legislation we will uphold a proven system of State-regulated wholesale distribution of beer which has made a wide variety of the freshest product readily available through all legal retail outlets at highly competitive prices, and I ask my colleagues to support it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 412

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act".

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in any antitrust law shall render unlawful the inclusion and enforcement in any written contract in effect on or entered into after the effective date of this Act by any brewer, importer, trademark owner, or trademark licensee of a trademarked malt beverage with any wholesale distributor of provisions granting the wholesale distributor the sole and exclusive right to distribute and to sell such product in any defined geographic area within any State and limiting such exclusive distributor to the distribution and sale, directly or indirectly, of such product only for ultimate resale to consumers within that defined geographic area when such product is in substantial and effective competition with other malt beverage products within that defined geographic area.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to legalize the enforcement of provisions described in section 2 of this Act in any written contract described in that section by means of price-fixing agreements, horizontal restraints of trade, or group boycotts, if such agreement, restraints, or boycotts would otherwise be unlawful.

SEC. 4. As used in this Act, the term "antitrust law" means the Act entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" (Sherman Act), approved July 2, 1990, the Federal Trade Commission Act, approved September 26, 1914, and the Act entitled "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes" (Clayton Act), approved October 15, 1914, and all amendments to such Acts.

SEC. 5. As used in this Act, "malt beverage" shall mean and include beer of all types and varieties as defined in any Federal State statute, ale, porter, stout, and all other similarly designated fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per centum or more alcohol by volume.

SEC. 6. As used in this Act, the term "State" includes the District of Columbia and any territory or possession of the United States.

SEC. 7. This Act shall not invalidate or affect any provision of the laws of any State.●

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act, which I am cosponsoring today, simplifies and clarifies the application of the antitrust laws to distributor arrangements in the malt beverage industry. The act will set a clear and concise standard for determining the legality of vertical nonprice restrictions on the distribution of malt beverages. The act enhances State control over the distribution of alcoholic beverages. It will ease the collection of excise taxes on those beverages, and it will preserve the highly competitive system of beer distribution that has served the consumer so well for more than 50 years. Finally, the act ensures that the widest possible selection of high quality malt beverages remains available to legal consumers everywhere.

The Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act cuts through the confusion resulting from lower courts interpretations of the rule of reason. It establishes a threshold test of substantial and effective competition for measuring antitrust claims based on territorial agreements and for eliminating those claims that pose no threat to consumers or competition. If there is substantial and effective competition among manufacturers and wholesalers in the area under question, the suit could be dismissed. If substantial and effective competition cannot be shown, a full treble-damage antitrust trial would assess the reasons for the territorial agreement and its demonstrated consequences. In short, the act helps the courts and the defendants get to the meat of these cases without unnecessarily incurring excessive litigation expense.●

By Mr. STEVENS (for himself and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 413. A bill to extend the provisions of title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, relating to war risk insurance; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ISSUANCE OF WAR RISK INSURANCE

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill which would extend for 5 years the authority of the Secretary of Transportation to issue war risk insurance under title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936.

During the last Congress, the House passed legislation similar to the bill I am now introducing. The House-passed bill was subsequently reported by the Senate Commerce Committee but was not acted upon by the full Senate. Consequently, the authority for the Title XII Program expired on September 30, 1984.

Title XII is standby legislation which authorizes the Secretary of Transportation, with the approval of the President, to provide war risk and certain marine and liability insurance for the protection of vessels, cargoes, and crew life and personal effects, when commercial insurance cannot be obtained on reasonable terms and conditions. Commercial war risk insurance policies now in effect contain automatic termination clauses which cause such insurance to terminate upon hostile detonation of a nuclear device of war or upon the outbreak of war—whether there is a declaration of war or not—between any of the following countries: United States of America, United Kingdom, or any other member of the British Commonwealth. France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the People's Republic of China. Without Government war risk insurance, American vessels would be without protection against loss by risks of war after termination of the commercial policies. Ships and cargoes could not be moved without adequate insurance coverage.

War risk insurance was provided by the Government in both World Wars I and II, and proved both necessary and effective in protecting the United States and its waterborne commerce, with total premium receipts in excess of loss paid. The recently expired title XII program was first enacted at the outbreak of the Korean war in 1950. It was temporary legislation that expired 5 years later. Since then, it has been extended several times, normally for 5-year periods.

Title XII operates as a revolving fund, with income provided from binder fees, insurance premiums, interest from investments and claim reimbursements from other Federal agencies. Fees and expenses of underwriting agents and appraisal contractors, as well as insurance claims are then paid from the fund. The program requires no appropriations. In fiscal year 1984, net receipts were approximately $885,000. The Congressional Budget Office projects that the program would continue operating at this level through 1989, assuming no major outbreaks that would trigger substantial claims.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 414. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to deny any deduction for interest paid or incurred on loans in connection with certain takeovers, or certain attempted takeovers of corporations; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIRNESS IN CORPORATE TAKEOVERS ACT

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, as most of my colleagues will recall, the Senate last year wrestled with the question of petroleum company mergers. On the Senate floor and before both the Senate Judiciary and Energy Committees, I made it clear that I had some strong reservations about the mergers that were taking place and I indicated that I would much prefer that some of the merged companies remain independent.

Several of the mergers the past several years have directly affected the people and economy of Oklahoma—Dupont-Conoco, Occidental-Cities Service, Texaco-Getty, and SoCal-Gulf. We must now add to that list the possibility of Phillips Petroleum Co., a model corporate citizen of Bartlesville, OK, depending on the outcome of a shareholders meeting later this month.

Last year I made clear the fact that although I had strong reservations with a congressional moratorium—due to the depressing effect it would have on oil stock prices, its singling out of an industry, and the violence it would do to any individual stockholders freedom and property rights in his stock—I indicated that I was open to the need to legislate.

I am a strong advocate of the free enterprise system. I am not naive enough to believe that abuses do not sometimes occur within our system of free enterprise. When they do, we have a responsibility to examine ways Congress can correct or eliminate those abuses.

I am not interested in any quick-fix legislation, which we all know has the effect of backfiring and causing more problems than what it attempts to solve. But I do believe now, at the beginning of this new 99th Congress, we should get the ball rolling on this issue.

To that end I am introducing legislation today.

My bill is aimed to remove one of the incentives our tax policy gives to those attempting a hostile takeover on borrowed money—the deductibility of interest on those loans. Presently individuals or companies borrow money and, in effect, pledge the assets of the targeted company as surety. Government does not need to encourage this type of action by its tax policy.

I am open to other approaches and am open to this bill being amended to improve it. This piece of legislation should not be seen as a cure-all but as a starting point. I look forward to working with my colleagues in examining what role, if any, Congress should play to correct abuses of our free enterprise system.●

S. 415. A bill to amend the Education of the Handicapped Act to authorize the award of reasonable attorney's fees to certain prevailing parties, and to clarify the effect of the Education of the Handicapped Act on rights, procedures, and remedies under other laws relating to the prohibition of discrimination; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HANDICAPPED CHILDREN'S PROTECTION ACT

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce The Handicapped Children's Protection Act of 1985. This is the same bill which I introduced at the end of the 98th Congress. It is an amendment to Public Law 94-142 and its purpose is simple: To reaffirm the intent of Congress to protect the educational rights of handicapped children.

In passing the Education for all Handicapped Children's Act of 1975 (Public Law 94-142) Congress indicated that "it is the national interest that the Federal Government assist State and local efforts to provide programs to meet the educational needs of handicapped children in order to assure equal protection under law." In those States which accept funds in connection with Public Law 94-142, the act established an enforceable right to a free appropriate public education for all handicapped children, and established due process procedures, including the right to judicial review, to protect those rights.

In 1984, approximately 4.5 million handicapped children received special education and related services in connection with Public Law 94-142. Parents, professional educators, and school administrators at local, State and Federal levels have agreed that the impact of Public Law 94-142 has been overwhelmingly positive. As a result of the act, children are being provided with better opportunities to learn, to become more independent, and to better develop their potential.

Although the law has worked very well in most cases, Congress knew that there would be instances where parents would be denied the free appropriate public education to which their handicapped child was legally entitled under Public Law 94-142. Consequently, Congress established due process procedures as the method whereby disagreements about the appropriate educational program for a given handicapped child could be resolved. These due process procedures include, as an option of last resort, the right to litigate the issue in a Federal court. The due process procedures have proven to be a very effective method for ensuring an appropriate education for handicapped children and youth and litigation is rare. In fact, the majority of school districts have never been in court in connection with Public Law 94-142 and the educational program of fewer than 1 child in 10,000 is contested in court.

It is clear to me that Congress' original intent was for the due process procedures, including the right to litigation if that became necessary, to be available to all parents—not just the unusually well informed or the wealthy. Unfortunately, on July 5, 1984, the Supreme Court, in its Smith versus Robinson decision, jeopardized the protection and enforcement of the educational rights of handicapped children. In a 6 to 3 decision, the Court determined that Public Law 94-142 does not allow the award of attorneys' fees to parents who, after exhausting administrative procedures, prevail in a civil court action to protect their child's right to a free appropriate public education.

By denying the award of attorneys' fees in Public Law 94-142 cases, the Court raised questions about the extent to which rights, remedies, and procedures available under section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act and other Federal civil rights statutes will be applicable to claims made under the Education of the Handicapped Act (EHA). Specifically, in Smith versus Robinson, the Court ruled that when a remedy "provided under section 504 is provided with more clarity and precision under EHA, a plaintiff may not circumvent or enlarge on the remedies available under EHA by resort to section 504." The Court reasoned that the comprehensiveness and detail with which EHA addresses the provision of schooling to handicapped children, implies that Congress intended to limit remedies to those explicitly provided for in Public Law 94-142.

It is important to note that Congress has authorized attorneys' fees in virtually all civil rights actions brought under Federal law. Thus, it is clear to this Senator that it was not the intent of Congress to leave unprotected the civil rights claims of handicapped children seeking a free appropriate public education. For example, when Congress approved section 505(b) of the Rehabilitation Act, which makes attorneys' fees available for claims made under section 504, there was no exception made for handicapped children seeking an education. The 1978 Senate and House reports accompanying section 505(b) explain that disabled individuals were one of the very few minority groups in this country who had not been specifically authorized by Congress to seek attorneys' fees. The purpose of section 505(b) was "to correct this omission and thereby assist handicapped individuals in securing the legal protection guaranteed them under title V of the Rehabilitation Act." It certainly was not the intent of Congress to exclude the claims of handicapped children seeking a free appropriate public education from the coverage of section 505(b).

Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today is a specific response to the court's opinion in Smith versus Robinson. My amendment to Public Law 94-142 is for the limited purpose of clarifying what I believe has always been, and continues to be, the intent of Congress: that reasonable attorneys' fees be available to parents of handicapped children who prevail in a civil court action to enforce their child's right to education. This amendment will in no way change requirements for parents to first exhaust the available administrative procedures in attempting to resolve the disagreements. The administrative hearing procedures will continue to be the process by which the vast majority of disagreements about appropriate educational programs are resolved. In other words, civil court action will remain, as it has always been, an option of last resort.

The amendment also clarifies that Congress did not intend that passage of Public Law 94-142 should limit or reduce the rights, procedures, and remedies available to handicapped children under the U.S. Constitution, title V or the Rehabilitation Act, or any other Federal statute. As a result of this clarification there will be no question about the commitment of Congress to guarantee to handicapped children the civil rights which are available to the rest of our country's citizens.

The unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves as a result of Smith versus Robinson was summarized appropriately by Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens in their dissenting opinion to the case: "Congress will now have to take the time to revisit the matter. And until it does, the handicapped children of our country whose difficulties are compounded by discrimination and by other deprivations of constitutional rights will have to pay the costs. It is at best ironic that the court has managed to impose this burden on handicapped children in the course of interpreting a statute wholly intended to promote the educational rights of those children."

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation which simply clarifies the intent of Congress to protect the educational rights of handicapped children, and I ask that the Handicapped Children's Protection Act of 1985 be printed in its entirety in today's RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 416. A bill to amend the act establishing Voyageurs National Park, Minnesota, to allow certain State leaseholders of lands within the park to continue to lease such lands for up to 20 years; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

STATE LEASEHOLDERS IN VOYAGEURS NATIONAL PARK

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to rectify an inequity which occurred with the creation of Voyageurs National Park in northern Minnesota.

When the park was established, certain lands were donated to the Federal Government by the State of Minnesota. Many of these lands were under lease to individuals for summer recreational lodging. In contrast to other residents of the park, who were given 25 years to enjoy their property, these leaseholders were limited to 10 years and their leases expire this year.

The property under lease has been donated to the Federal Government by the State of Minnesota. On April 14, 1975, Voyageurs National Park issued uniform 10-year leases to lessees of former Minnesota State Park property.

This bill would extend these leases for 10 years. This would serve to benefit the local economy of northern Minnesota, park visitors and the residents. At present, 65 leaseholders will have to vacate their vacation homes, officially, at the expiration of the uniform 10-year limit.

These people serve a variety of community functions. As knowledgeable residents of the area, they are helpful in giving directions, fuel, emergency shelter, and first aid to people unfamiliar with the territory and waters. Likewise, they patronize and contribute to the neighboring towns surrounding the park, International Falls and Ranier, MN. This becomes important in consideration of recent employee layoffs made by the Boise-Cascade Co. in this area, and the detrimental economic effects which could result.

This bill will bring the retained rights of former State lessees closer to the rights retained by persons who sold land to the Federal Government—25 years. This provision applies only to improved properties.

I believe the Park Service is agreeable to this change. I hope Congress can quickly approve it as well to provide some stability to affected leaseholders.

S. 417. A bill for the relief of Juan Macias-Arias, his wife Margarita Radich de Macias, and their children

Juan Eduardo Marcias-Radich, and Mary Macias; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF JUAN MACIAS-ARIAS AND FAMILY

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill to aid Juan Macias-Arias, his wife Margarita, and their two children. This bill would put an end to a lengthy and traumatic experience for a family whose members have shown beyond doubt, that they are dedicated to being contributing members of their community.

Mr. President, after careful deliberation, Juan Macias and his family made a decision to immigrate to the United States of America from their native Bolivia.

They met with staff at the U.S. Consulate in La Paz to discuss the best method for immigrating. Upon the advice of the staff there, they decided to apply for investor's visas and Mrs. Macias traveled to the United States where she invested the required $40,000 by purchasing Daisy's Beauty Salon in Alamogordo, NM. When Mrs. Macias returned to Bolivia with the appropriate documentation, the family was told that a mistake had been made and that they could not be issued investor's visas at that time. Consequently, they were issued visitor nonimmigrant visas and were told that they would be notified as soon as their investor's visas were approved. In August 1978 the family moved to New Mexico.

Since that time they have dutifully renewed their visas and continually sought to change their status.

Through a series of technical and circumstantial difficulties, that status has never been granted.

In the 6½ years that the Macias family has lived in Alamogordo, they have earned the respect and love of the members of that small community. In addition to the beauty salon, which Mrs. Macias owns and operates, Mr. Macias has purchased a restaurant which he operates. They have employed over 12 New Mexicans in the two businesses.

Their daughter Mary is a student at New Mexico State University and their son attends high school in Alamogordo.

The reaction of the people of Alamogordo to the news of the family's possible deportation is overwhelming. One petition I received bears the signatures of over 500 people requesting my assistance in enabling the Macias to remain in Alamogordo. Numerous people have written letters to the local newspapers, to elected officials, and to Federal agencies, seeking help to allow the Macias family to continue to live in their community. The people who write refer time and again to the contributions that this family has made to Alamogordo. I have statement after statement testifying to the Macias' value as a friend, neighbor, and productive member of the community.

Mr. President, America needs people like the Macias family. People who are willing to work hard to prove that they want to be contributing members of our society. People who have made a large financial and emotional commitment to their town. People who show pride in their work and in their home. It would be a shame for our country to lose a family as dedicated and deserving as the Macias.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 417

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in the administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Juan Macias-Arias, his wife Margarita Radich de Macias, and their children Juan Eduardo Marcias-Radich and Mary Macias shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act upon payment of the required visa fees. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such aliens as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper officer to reduce by the proper number, during the current fiscal year or the fiscal year next following, the total number of immigrant visas which are made available to natives of the country of the aliens' birth under section 203(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act or, if applicable, the total number of immigrant visas which are made available to natives of the country of the aliens' birth under section 202(e) of such Act.●

By Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 418. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exclude certain net capital gain of insolvent taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax; to the Committee on Finance.

MINIMUM TAX LEGISLATION

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to offer legislation and ask that it be appropriately referred.

This proposal addresses an urgent problem facing many of my constituents, who are facing a foreclosure action by their local bank on their farm or small business.

Under current law, our minimum tax is imposed on a series of preference items to be certain all taxpayers pay a minimum sum of tax. The purpose of this tax is to prevent individuals from sheltering all of their income in tax preferred activities, and thus avoid their fair share of the Nation's tax burden. The minimum tax is designed to place a floor on an individual's tax liability, requiring a tax contribution from each taxpayer.

One of the preference items in the minimum tax is the net capital gains deduction. As my colleagues know, taxpayers with capital gains are eligible to deduct 60 percent from the gain on the sale of capital assets. While the individual minimum tax provides for an offset for losses, these losses often offset the income from the forced sale of equipment and the cancellation of indebtedness. Taxpayers with farms and small businesses who are forced to sell the land or deed it over to a bank frequently recognize a large capital gain on the sale of this asset. At this point, the taxpayer has used up all of his losses and is still faced with an alternative minimum tax on the net capital gain previously excluded.

Family farmers and small business people who have been in the business for years, frequently have a very low basis in these assets. Consequently, they are facing a very large minimum tax liability in the event of foreclosure or a forced sale.

As my colleagues know, taxpayers who are forced to sell off a portion of their small business or farm, use these proceeds to satisfy their creditors in the hope of retaining their farm or family business. In fact, this legislation only grants relief to taxpayers who are insolvent; that is, the fair market value of their assets is less than their liabilities. Imposing an alternative minimum tax on these taxpayers is a particularly harsh result.

In my home State of Iowa, many lifelong farmers are facing bankruptcy or foreclosure. To learn the scope of the problem, I contacted the Farmer's Home office in Iowa. Through September 30, 1984, 233 FmHA borrowers had filed petitions in bankruptcy, 6 borrowers had been forced into foreclosure and in 12 cases prior lienholders to FmHA had initiated foreclosure. While bankrupt taxpayers can dischange the tax lien, farmers not yet in bankruptcy are responsible for the tax.

Another inequity caused by the alternative minimum tax for farmers and small businessmen is that this tax discourages them from selling off a portion of their assets to become financially stable. Taxpayers must wait until they file for bankruptcy to sell capital assets with a low basis to avoid the minimum tax. Many times these individuals would be better served by liquidating those assets to try to become a smaller more viable entity; however, the minimum tax liability can be sufficiently high to make a partial sale uneconomical. My legislation simply adds an exception to the capital gains rules to stop the imposition of the tax on insolvent taxpayers in two instances. Minimum tax liability is forgiven if the taxpayer transfers land to a creditor or if the taxpayer sells the land under threat of foreclosure.

Insolvent taxpayers are currently exempt from income on forgiveness of indebtedness. I have incorporated the same definition in my legislation. An insolvent is defined as an individual whose liabilities exceed the fair market value of his assets. If an individual's liabilities do not exceed the fair market value of his assets, he will be liable for the minimum tax.

In short, this amendment eliminates insolvent taxpayers from the requirement of paying the alternative minimum tax in a forced sale or foreclosure situation. Alternative minimum tax was enacted to prevent high bracket taxpayers from sheltering all of their income and avoiding Federal tax liability. This provision merely exempts taxpayers with extraordinary economic hardship from liability for the alternative minimum tax.

It deserves the support of all my colleagues, and I ask for its immediate enactment.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Iowa, Mr. GRASSLEY, in offering this measure that is of great importance to a number of people who desparately need our help.

The American farmer is under siege, like no other time in our history since the Great Depression. In fact, some of the farmers I talked to that experienced the Great Depression say that this is worse. The dust bowls don't exist, but current economic and financial factors are slowly strangling them just the same.

Fully 30 to 40 percent of farmers nationwide have substantial debt and are in various stages of financial difficulty. In the judgment of agricultural economists, farmers who have a debt to asset ratio of over 70 percent will find it very difficult to stay in business—there is little hope for economic survival. This means that in Minnesota, approximately 13,000 farms are expected to be forced to liquidate in the next couple of years.

The legislation we introduce today does not attempt to address the totality of this problem. What it does address is a problem with our tax law that makes it difficult for farmers to sell off a portion of their assets in order to become a smaller and thus, potentially more viable entity. And, if it's too late, and a farmer must liquidate under threat of foreclosure, this bill will prevent the Tax Code from kicking him when he is down.

The Tax Code provision to which I refer is the alternative minimum tax. One of the preference items in the minimum tax is the net capital gain deduction. For several reasons, farmers who have been in business for some time, have a very low basis in their capital assets. This means that for farmers who held assets which have appreciated the capital gains deduction when the asset is sold can be substantial. Consequently, when the 20 percent alternative minimum tax is triggered on the 60-percent capital gain deduction taken previously, these people are hit with a very large tax bill when they are forced to sell the business assets.

In short, our Tax Code virtually forces taxpayers with substantially appreciated property who could otherwise avoid bankruptcy by voluntary transfer of property in satisfaction of indebtedness to take bankruptcy to avoid the Federal alternative minimum tax on capital gain preferences. This is not a result that was desired when we enacted the alternative minimum tax. The alternative minimum tax was enacted to prevent high bracket taxpayers from sheltering all of their income in tax advantaged activities, thereby avoiding sharing the burden of maintaining the Federal Government.

The effect of our bill is simple—it eliminates insolvent taxpayers from the requirement of paying alternative minimum tax. It deserves the support of this body, because it eliminates the unintentional result of sticking taxpayers with a stiff minimum tax bill, when they need the proceeds of the sale to pay off creditors.

The farmers need our help, my colleagues realize this, and while we continue working on solving some of the farm problems, we should pass this legislation as a small step in the right direction.

EXCISE TAX ON CORPORATE TAKEOVER ATTEMPTS

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am joining with my colleague Senator NICKLES in introducing a bill relating to the use of incentives now in the tax code in situations in which there is an attempted two-tier hostile takeover of a corporation. A companion bill has been introduced by several members of the Oklahoma delegation in the House of Representatives. It is critical that we stop the use of the tax code to subsidize the utilization of larger sums of previous credit for corporate takeovers which not only will increase productivity but in many cases will reduce productivity, reduce investment in research in key industries and reduce employment. This is an issue which is of vital concern not only to Oklahoma but to the Nation as well.

With credit so badly needed by farmers, small businesses and those wanting to modernize their plants, it is simply wrong to allow speculations, motivated purely by personal gain, to get tax benefits to use up precious capital resources to destroy responsible corporate citizens and imperil thousands of jobs.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

In addition, I have written to Chairman PACKWOOD to ask that the committee hold hearings as soon as possible on the use of tax incentives in the issuance of so-called junk bonds to finance these two-tier hostile takeovers. I have sent a copy of my letter to the chairman and ranking member of the Banking Committee as well because unconfirmed reports that some financial institutions may be investing in bonds of this description. A full airing of the matter should be accomplished as soon as possible.

I also ask that a copy of my letter to Chairman PACKWOOD appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, I will soon be circulating a letter to my colleagues about this legislation. It is time that we act to end this misuse of our credit system which drains our Nation of badly needed resources. I hope that many Members of the Senate will decide to cosponsor this legislation.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, February 6, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT PACKWOOD,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN PACKWOOD: Today several members of the Oklahoma delegation introduced legislation which would limit the tax advantages given to those who undertake what is known as hostile two-tier takeovers of corporations. The use of the stepped-up basis for assets and the deductibility for interest on borrowed funds for hostile takeovers in situations where there is no additional productivity and where in fact there is the potential for reduced research, production, and employment deserves immediate examination by the Congress.

In addition, the whole question of the use of so-called "junk bonds" to finance these takeovers and the deductibility of borrowing costs of these bonds deserves our attention and the attention of the Committee on Banking as well. It is widely reported that the issuance of these so-called "junk bonds" is rapidly growing. These bonds are initially unsecured and ultimately secured only by the assets of the company which is targeted for takeover. In many cases they may involve a high degree of risk. There are reports that thrift institutions and perhaps other financial institutions may be investing in these bonds at a rather high and alarming level.

I am writing to you to urge that the Finance Committee, at the earliest possible date, schedule hearings to fully investigate the use of "junk bond" financing to see how widespread it has become and who is using it and the tax incentives which may be encouraging its use in the case of two-tier hostile takeovers and the potential impact on credit markets and financial institutions.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID L. BOREN,
U.S. Senator.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 420

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXCISE TAX ON GREENMAIL PROFITS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Chapter 46 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to golden parachute payments) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 4999A. GREENMAIL PROFITS.

"(a) IMPOSITION OF TAX.—There is hereby imposed on any person who realizes any greenmail profits a tax equal to 50 percent of the amount of such profits.

"(b) GREENMAIL PROFITS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'greenmail profits' means any gain realized by a 4-percent shareholder on the sale or exchange of any stock in the corporation—

"(A) if such shareholder held such stock (as determined under section 1223) for a period of less than 2 years, and

"(B) if, at some time during the 2-year period ending on the date of such sale or exchange, there was a public tender offer for stock in such corporation.

"(2) 4-PERCENT SHAREHOLDER.—The term '4-percent shareholder' means any person who owns (directly or through the application of section 318) stock possessing 4 percent or more of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote.

"(3) PUBLIC TENDER OFFER.—The term 'public tender offer' means any offer to purchase (or otherwise acquire) stock in the corporation if such offer was required to be filed or registered with any Federal or State agency regulating securities.

"(c) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN SHAREHOLDERS AND EMPLOYEES.—The tax imposed by subsection (a) shall not apply to any gain realized by any person on the sale or exchange of stock in any corporation if, throughout the 1-year period ending on the date of such sale or exchange, such person was—

"(1) an officer, director, or employee of such corporation, or

"(2) a 4-percent shareholder.

"(d) ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISION.—For purposes of subtitle F, any tax imposed by this section shall be treated as a tax imposed by subtitle A."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—

"(1) Chapter 46 of such Code is amended by striking out the chapter heading and the table of sections and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

CHAPTER 46—GOLDEN PARACHUTE PAYMENTS; GREENMAIL PROFITS

"Sec. 4999. Golden parachute payments.
"Sec. 4999A. Greenmail profits.

"(2) The table of chapters for subtitle D of such Code is amended by striking out the item relating to chapter 46 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"CHAPTER 46. GOLDEN PARACHUTE PAYMENTS; GREENMAIL PROFITS.

"(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales and exchanges after February 6, 1985, in taxable years ending after such date.

"(2) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN AGREEMENTS.—The amendments made by this section shall not apply to any sale or exchange pursuant to a written agreement in existence on February 5, 1985.

SEC. 2. MANDATORY SECTION 338 ELECTION IN THE CASE OF HOSTILE STOCK PURCHASES.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 338 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain stock purchases treated as asset acquisitions) is amended by redesignating subsection (i) as subsection (j) and by inserting subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) SPECIAL RULE FOR HOSTILE QUALIFIED STOCK PURCHASES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of any hostile qualified stock purchase—

"(A) the purchasing corporation shall be treated as having made an election with respect to such purchase under this section, and

"(B) section 337 shall not apply for purposes of determining the amount of the gain recognized on the deemed sale under subsection (a)(1).

"(2) HOSTILE QUALIFIED STOCK PURCHASE.—For purposes of this section—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'hostile qualified stock purchase' means any qualified stock purchase if all (or any portion of) the stock included in such purchase was acquired pursuant to a hostile offer.

"(B) HOSTILE OFFER.—The term 'hostile offer' means any offer to purchase (or otherwise acquire) the stock of a corporation if such offer is disapproved by a majority (consisting of at least 2 members) of the continuing independent members of the board of directors of such corporation. For purposes of the preceding sentence, any member of the board of directors shall be treated as independent if such member is not an officer or employee of the corporation and (except for ownership of stock in the corporation) has no substantial financial or commercial ties to the corporation."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to hostile qualified stock purchases (as defined in section 338(i)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) with respect to which the acquisition date (as defined in section 338(h)(2) of such Code) is after February 6, 1985.

SEC. 3. DISALLOWANCE OF INTEREST DEDUCTION ON CERTAIN HOSTILE ACQUISITIONS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to items not deductible) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 280H. INTEREST ON INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED IN CERTAIN HOSTILE TAKEOVERS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—No deduction shall be allowed under this chapter for any interest paid or accrued on indebtedness incurred or continued to acquire (or carry) stock in a corporation acquired pursuant to a hostile offer.

"(b) EXCEPTION WHERE CONTROL ACQUIRED BY A CORPORATION.—Subsection (a) shall not apply in the case of any hostile qualified stock purchase by a corporation.

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section, the terms 'hostile offer' and 'hostile qualified stock purchase' have the same meanings as when used in section 338(i)."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"SEC. 280H. Interest on indebtedness incurred in certain hostile takeovers."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to indebtedness incurred or continued to acquire (or carry) stock which is acquired after February 6, 1985.●

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S.J. Res. 45. Joint resolution to designate National Child Safety Week; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution to proclaim September 8 through 14, 1985 as "National Child Safety Week." Similar legislation has been introduced in the House of Representatives by my distinguished Florida colleague, Representative TOM LEWIS.

Throughout my efforts to enact the Missing Children Act, the Missing Children's Assistance Act or reauthorize and fund the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, I have been amazed and gratified by the response of individuals and organizations throughout this Nation who are concerned about the safety of children. The response from individuals and organizations who were requesting more information regarding child fingerprinting and other safety activities was so overwhelming that I convened a task force comprised of representatives of the National Crime Prevention Council, the Ad Council, the American Bar Association, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the Sheriffs Association, the Boys Club, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Fraternal Order of Police, the American Association of Retired Persons, the Girl Scouts, the Adam Walsh Resource Center, Child Keyppers of Florida and various Federal agencies. This task force developed the Child Safety Program Handbook which was cosponsored by ACTION, the National Volunteer Agency and the Department of Justice. Thousands of these handbooks and flyers were requested by interested organizations throughout the Nation. Many of these safety day programs have occurred on May 25, the anniversary of the disappearance of 6-year-old Etan Patz from New York City. However, many of these child safety day programs have expanded from the original purpose of protecting children from abduction, into the equally important issue of protecting children from abuse and exploitation.

A variety of resource material on preventing both abuse and abduction of children is available. The National Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse has compiled an excellent bibliography listing child sexual abuse prevention resources. They range from musical and theatrical presentations such as Bubbylonian Encounter, Hugs and Kisses or Touch, to the Spiderman comic book, the Red Flag, Green Flag coloring book or the Touching Song. The National Crime Prevention Council has a YOUth can Prevent Crime kit which includes latchkey children, missing children and child sexual abuse prevention. But all of these resources need to be utilized if they are to be effective. Child Safety Week can help in this prevention and education effort by increasing the public's awareness and focusing attention on the child safety programs and events occurring during the week of September 8 through 14, 1985. I know, from the phone calls and letters that I have received in my office that individuals and organizations throughout our Nation are interested in promoting child safety and preventing abduction and abuse. I urge my Senate colleagues to listen to their constituents and join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 10—RELATING TO THE MURDER OF HENRY LIU

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON) submitted the following concurrent resolution; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 10

Whereas Henry Liu, a United States citizen of Chinese ancestry, was murdered in Daly City, California, on October 15, 1984;

Whereas certain citizens of Taiwan have been, and others may be, charged by authorities in the United States in connection with this crime; and

Whereas both the cause of justice and sound American relations with the people on Taiwan will best be served if the individuals charged with committing this crime in the United States are tried in courts in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the Taiwan authorities should cooperate fully in the case of Henry Liu by delivering to the United States for trial those citizens of Taiwan charged by authorities in the United States in connection with the murder of Henry Liu.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce with Senator CRANSTON, and with Representative SOLARZ and others in the House, a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Taiwan authorities should cooperate fully in the case of Henry Liu by delivering to the United States for trial those citizens of Taiwan charged by authorities in the United States in connection with the murder of Henry Liu.

The murder of Henry Liu in Daly City, CA, last October was no ordinary crime. The Taiwan regime has acknowledged that members of its military intelligence service were involved in the killing. Moreover, Mr. Liu, an American citizen of Chinese descent, was a prominent critic of President Chiang Ching Kuo, and the Taiwan authorities have been notorious for reprisals against their critics. In 1981 Professor Chen Wen-Chen of Carnegie Mellon University was found dead in Taiwan, hours after being interrogated by the Taiwanese security police about political statements he had made in the United States. More recently, the Taiwan authorities have used libel suits to close down opposition magazines such as the Neo-Formosa Weekly and to sentence their publishers to prison terms of 1 year.

The murder of an American citizen, on American soil, with the complicity of foreign intelligence agents, for whatever reason, is a brazen act of international terrorism against the American people. In order to assure the American people that justice will be done for the murder of Henry Liu, and that such acts of terrorism will not be tolerated in the future, those persons charged by authorities in the United States in connection with this crime should be tried in American courts. Taiwan has no legal obligation to extradite those persons accused by American authorities who fled to Taiwan, but it has a moral obligation to assure us that justice in the case of Henry Liu will be impartial. And it has an interest in repairing the damage which the involvement of its intelligence service in this crime caused to its credibility and to its good relations with the American people. Our resolution therefore urges the Taiwan authorities to deliver to the United States for trial those Taiwan citizens charged by authorities in the United States in connection with the murder of Henry Liu.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on the morning of October 15, 1984, at his home at Daly City, CA, Henry Liu—a distinguished American writer and journalist of Chinese ancestry—was brutally murdered. I have been deeply concerned and have followed developments in this case very closely since the shooting occurred.

Although Taiwanese authorities initially denied complicity in the case, there was from the outset widespread suspicion that Mr. Liu had been assassinated to silence his pen and intimidate others who might dare to write critically about the regime of Taiwan.

Subsequent investigation—both in the United States and in Taiwan—has led authorities in Taiwan to acknowledge that high officials in the Taiwanese intelligence apparatus either knew in advance of plans to kill Mr. Liu, but withheld the information, or actually ordered the killing of Mr. Liu.

The suspected perpetrators of this crime are believed by police authorities to be members of the notorious Bamboo Gang, operating out of Taiwan.

Mr. President, unless justice is done promptly in this case, this assassination will have succeeded in its apparently intended effect. Henry Liu has been forever silenced.

If our Government cannot protect or ensure justice for our citizens in the exercise of their precious constitutional rights, how long will we have those rights?

While the authorities in Taiwan have conducted their own investigation in this matter, and have apparently initiated actions of their own against at least some of those believed responsible, the cloud of fear and suspicion this case has created here will not disappear until those charged with the crime on American soil are brought to trial in American courts.

Mr. President, justice for Henry Liu has three elements:

First, that those charged with this crime be brought to trial in our courts;

Second, that the administration, which has remained strangely, publicly silent about this case, provide public assurance that this act of terrorism cannot be repeated; and

Third, that the family of Henry Liu receive adequate financial compensation for their loss from those ultimately responsible for his death.

It is vital that justice be done in the case of Henry Liu.

I urge that the resolution be promptly adopted.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 11—CALLING FOR THE RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY IN CHILE

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. HARKIN, and Mr. KERRY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 11

Whereas over the past five years, military juntas in Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Uruguay, and Brazil have been replaced by elected civilian governments, but in Chile, the government of General Augusto Pinochet has hindered the restoration of democracy in that country;

Whereas on November 6, 1984, the Pinochet government imposed a state of siege that has resulted in increased press censorship, greater restriction on the right of assembly, and the temporary detention of more than 8,000 people and the internal exile of more than 600;

Whereas the imposition of press censorship and the extensive arrests of opposition political figures during the state of siege impair the movement toward democracy in Chile;

Whereas the restoration of democracy requires, as a first step, a lifting of the states of siege and emergency in Chile, a dialogue between the Government of Chile and the democratic opposition, and an immediate end to human rights violations by the Pinochet government;

Whereas Amnesty International has noted that in recent years there has been a marked deterioration in the human rights situation in Chile, demonstrated by a consistent pattern of arbitrary detention, political imprisonment and killings, and systematic torture;

Whereas Amnesty International, the International Commission of Jurists, the United Nations Human Rights Commission Ad Hoc Working Group on Chile, the United Nations General Assembly, and the Organization of American States Commission on Human Rights have stated that the regime of Augusto Pinochet has violated basic human rights and political freedoms in Chile since the 1973 military coup in that country; and

Whereas the Chilean people want democracy reestablished in their country, and the United States is in full sympathy with the deeply felt desires of the Chilean people for a return to democratic rule: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress supports the Chilean people in their efforts to end the military dictatorship and bring about the peaceful restoration of democratic institutions and human rights in Chile, and calls upon the Government of Chile to negotiate with the democratic opposition for a return to democratic rule;

SEC. 2. Until Chile returns to its long tradition of democratic procedures and institutions and of respect for internationally recognized human rights—

(1) the United States—

(A) should continue to deny and any all direct and indirect military assistance (including cash sales) for the Government of Chile, and

(B) should cease any and all joint military-related activities (including joint military exercies) with the Government of Chile;

(2) the United States should deny all forms of economic assistance to the Government of Chile, and in carrying out this policy, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation should comply with the human rights requirements of section 239(i) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 by not issuing any additional investment insurance pursuant to its 1983 agreement with the Government of Chile; and

(3) as mandated under section 701(f) of the International Financial Institutions Act, the United States should oppose all loans and grants to Chile by international financial institutions such as the Inter-American Development Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the International Development Association, unless such assistance is specifically directed to programs which serve the basic human needs of the people of Chile.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today I am proud to offer with Senators CRANSTON, HARKIN, and KERRY, and Representative WEISS and others in the House, a resolution calling for the restoration of democracy in Chile.

After more than 11 years of rule by General Pinochet, the Chilean people desire a prompt return to their long tradition of democratic procedures and institutions. However, the Pinochet regime responded to a rising tide of protest by political parties, labor unions, and the church last fall by declaring a state of siege, which it just renewed. Under this state of siege thousands have been detained, hundreds have been sent into internal exile and new restrictions have been placed on the press and the people's right to assemble peacefully. Instead of negotiating with the democratic opposition for a return to democracy, the Pinochet regime has sought to destroy it. Moreover, violations of basic individual human rights have increased and the leader of the Catholic Church's human rights office, with whom I had the opportunity to meet last September, has been barred from returning to Chile because he dared to criticize the regime's human rights record.

The people of Chile desire democracy no less than those of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Uruguay, and other Latin American countries where democracy has recently been restored. This can be accomplished in Chile only if the state of siege is lifted and a dialog begins between the Pinochet regime and the democratic opposition. We can show our support for this process by sending an unambiguous message that the United States opposes the state of siege and supports a prompt return to democracy. The administration's decision not to support a $130 million industrial recovery loan to Chile by the Inter-American Development Bank is a useful step in this direction, as was its decision to cancel a visit to Chile by the U.S. Army Chief of Staff last November. The Congress can strengthen this message by clearly signaling our disapproval of General Pinochet's refusal to permit a restoration of democracy as well as the prospect for closer cooperation with Chile if democracy returns.

Our resolution calls for negotiations between the Government of Chile and the democratic opposition for a return to democracy. It provides that, until democracy is restored in Chile, the United States should continue to deny all military and economic assistance to the Pinochet government and should vote against multilateral development bank loans and grants to the Government of Chile, except for humanitarian aid which serves the basic needs of the people of Chile. Our resolution also provides that the United States should not participate in joint military activities, including joint exercises, with the Pinochet regime.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 12—PROVIDING FOR AN ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE

Mr. DOLE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 12

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the Senate adjourns on Thursday, February 7, 1985, or Friday, February 8, 1985, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader, or his designee, in accordance with this resolution, it stand adjourned until 12:00 o'clock meridian on Monday, February 18, 1985, and that when the House of Representatives adjourns on Thurday, February 7, 1985, it stand adjourned until 12:00 o'clock meridian on Tuesday, February 19, 1985, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after their respective Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this resolution, whichever occurs first.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever in their opinion the public interest shall warrant it.

SENATE RESOLUTION 65—COMMENDING THE SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. BOREN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. SASSER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. GORE, Mr. SARBANES, and Mr. EAGLETON) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

S. RES. 65

Whereas the nation's well being is dependent on efficient and productive agriculture, which requires a fertile and well cared for soil resource base and a plentiful water supply; and

Whereas the Soil Conservation Service helps individuals, groups, organizations, cities and towns, and county and state governments reduce the costly waste of land and water resources and use these national assets; and

Whereas the the Soil Conservation Service since its establishment in 1935 within the U.S. Department of Agriculture has diligently carried out its missions of soil and water conservation, natural resource surveys and community resource protection and development; and

Whereas the Soil Conservation Service provides vitally needed technical and financial assistance to achieve its conservation objectives on nonfederal land, and is assisted in this work through its partnership with over 3,000 conservation districts covering more than two billion acres in all 50 states, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and

Whereas it is estimated that 67% of all cropland acres in the U.S. is in need of conservation treatment, and the annual rate of erosion on the 413 million acres of cropland exceeds the maximum rate of loss with which indefinite and prosperous productivity can be maintained, requiring the continued efforts of the Soil Conservation Service in combating this serious national problem; and

Whereas our water resources throughout the U.S. have moved to the forefront of national concern requiring the continued creation of watershed projects, techniques for the improvement of water quality including the reduction of sediments, organic wastes, pesticides and salts from polluting our waterways, and the establishment of improved irrigation systems and management as planned and designed by the Soil Conservation Service

Be it resolved, That the Senate hereby

1. expreses its commitment to the continuation and improvements of vigorous soil and water conservation efforts;

2. recognizes and commends the Soil Conservation Service on the 50th anniversary of its creation;

3. states its intent that the vital work of this agency be continued in the face of serious soil and water problems still confronting this nation; and

4. expresses its full support for and continued funding for SCS and the critical programs that it administers.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by Senators BOREN, DURENBERGER, PRYOR, BENTSEN, MELCHER, SASSER, HEFLIN, STENNIS, GORE, SARBANES, and EAGLETON in introducing a resolution commending the Soil Conservation Service on the 50th anniversary of its creation within the Department of Agriculture and calling on the Senate to express its support for the Soil Conservation Service and its mission of soil and water conservation, for our benefit and for the benefit of generations to come.

Since 1935 the Soil Conservation Service has diligently and professionally carried out its missions of soil and water conservation, natural resource surveys, and community resource protection and development. Born as the Soil Erosion Service within the Department of the Interior in 1933, and transferred to the USDA in 1935 following the great duststorms of May 11, 1934, and March 6, 1935, the Soil Conservation Service was eventually joined by over 3,000 conservation districts covering more than 2 billion acres in all 50 States, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands in carrying out crucial conservation objectives.

Although the father of modern soil and water conservation and the first Chief of the Soil Conservation Service, H.H. Bennett, envisioned that the ravages of 50 years prior to 1935 could be corrected in 20 years, today the threats to the Nation's soil and water resources have never been greater. According to the 1977 natural resource inventory, 67 percent of all cropland acres in the United States are in need of conservation treatment and 25 percent suffer erosion at rates above the level that can be tolerated if the land is to maintain its productivity into perpetuity. Over 5 billion tons of topsoil erode from our crop production lands every year and it is estimated that one-third of all topsoil on our cropland in use today has been irretrievably lost. The national average of sheet and rill erosion per acre is 5.07 tons while the tolerance level is only 5 tons. On 10 percent of the acreage the rate of loss is 10 tons greater. Four States—Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, and Mississippi—have average losses in excess of 10 tons per acre and 14 States, including Arkansas, have average losses in excess of 5 tons per acre. At this rate, the Nation's cropland will lose its entire plow depth in 100 years.

In Arkansas, soil erosion is a very serious problem. Of our 8 million acres of cropland, 4.7 million acres are in need of erosion control work. Our average sheet and rill erosion rate is 6.38 tons per acre—a loss of 50 million tons a year. This is enough to form a column of soil stacked on 1 acre, each year, 5.5 miles high.

The threats to the Nation's water resources are well documented, because, I suspect, they are more tangible and more glamorous. Depleting acquifers, saltwater intrusion, water pollution, and improper water management continue to be serious national concerns threatening domestic, agricultural, and industrial water use.

The continued presence of soil and water problems is not an indictment of the Soil Conservation Service. On the contrary, it dramatically points to the vital need we have for the work of the Soil Conservation Service. We can only imagine the condition of these resources today had it not been for the vision of men such as H.H. Bennett and the tireless work of the men and women of the Soil Conservation Service and their partners in the nearly 3,000 conservation districts.

I would like to take a moment to detail some of the conservation work undertaken by the Soil Conservation Service and the 76 conservation districts in Arkansas. Since the creation of the SCS in 1935 and the establishment of conservation district authority by the authority by the Arkansas State Legislature in early 1937, much conservation work has been completed in my home State. The most destructive period for soil and water resources in Arkansas was between 1800 and 1930. Cotton was king, one of the few crops which could put money in farmers' hands, and millions of Arkansas acres, including land better suited for pasture, were planted to that crop. Year after year, continuous production, followed by the practice of laying out barren land during the winter, led to tremendous erosion abuse and water quality problems due to soil runoff. Reduced productivity, crop failures, and eventually, farm abandonment led to widespread deterioration of the countryside.

In Arkansas, the first organized program of soil conservation began in 1935 with the creation of SCS demonstration projects in seven Arkansas communities and the cooperation of CCC workers in 12 camps throughout the State. The enlistment of local persons into conservation districts in 1937 was the catalyst that led to the highly successful efforts which we in Arkansas benefit from today.

Currently the number of district cooperators in Arkansas who are voluntarily applying conservation measures to their land using technical assistance provided by SCS is nearly 93,000, covering nearly 19 million acres. The SCS has 63 watershed projects in various stages of development including 29 which are completed, and has surveyed 30 million acres or 90 percent of all acreage in Arkansas. It has promoted conservation tillage on 68,000 acres with special emphasis, in concert with chemical and farm implement companies being placed on 750,000 targeted acres in eastern Arkansas, and has or is in the process of reclaiming 100 acres of rural abandoned mines—a project near and dear to my heart. It has begun an animal waste inventory project in 23 western Arkansas counties and a ground water inventory project in 26 eastern Arkansas counties, and has created a 16 county irrigation water conservation target area in which irrigation water management is provided. It has provided a mobile laser survey system to service increased demands for precision land leveling, and has established 5 resource conservation and development areas in Arkansas covering 55 counties for the development of flood protection and recreation water projects. SCS has completed 11 river basin surveys in Arkansas, has established 86 emergency watershed protection projects, plus numerous other projects which benefit farmers and other landowners, various units of government, businesses, recreationists, water users, and, of course, generations to come.

I'm sure the story is essentially the same in every other State. I believe the SCS deserves our continued support because there is still a great conservation mission before us. The opposition of this administration to soil and water conservation as promoted through Federal agencies is well documented as is its opposition to the SCS—conservation district partnerships, evidenced by a highly critical speech delivered by Assistant Secretary John B. Crowell, Jr., to the National Conference of the Soil Conservation Service on September 26, 1983. It has repeatedly attempted to slash conservation funding, yet its fiscal year 1986 budget is its most irresponsible and shortsighted position yet. This proposal threatens to dismantle 50 years of highly successful nationally organized conservation work. It needlessly shakes the morale of dedicated employees with the SCS and members within the partner conservation districts, and is a classic example of being penny-wise and pound-foolish.

Of course, we are facing a serious budget deficit and programs will have to be reduced or eliminated. To be fair, I must note that such actions may be necessary within the budget for SCS. But I feel it is imperative that we maintain a serious commitment toward furthering 50 years of soil and water conservation efforts under the Soil Conservation Service. I urge my colleagues to join us in reiterating our continued support in this resolution commending the Soil Conservation Service for 50 years of work well done.

SENATE RESOLUTION 66—SENSE OF THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO ANZUS

Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. GORTON, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. WILSON) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 66

Whereas the governments of United States, Australia, and New Zealand are parties to a trilateral security treaty signed on September 1, 1951, and commonly known as ANZUS;

Whereas the ANZUS alliance was formed "to coordinate their efforts for collective defense" and "to declare publicly and formally their sense of unity, so that no potential aggressor could be under the illusion that any of them stands alone in the Pacific Area";

Whereas all partners of the ANZUS alliance benefit from and are expected to bear equally the burdens of the Alliance;

Whereas the need for cooperation among the ANZUS partners has increased with the growth of Soviet military activity in the Pacific and Indian Oceans;

Whereas the free world, including New Zealand, enjoys the benefits of international trade on a scope unparalleled in history;

Whereas the security of this trade depends upon the free world's ability and will to defend the sea lines of communications;

Whereas the Government of New Zealand has officially adopted a policy which precludes many ships of the United States Navy from entering its ports;

Whereas such policy detracts from the security of all partners of the ANZUS Alliance, individually and collectively;

Whereas such policy grossly impairs the ability of the ANZUS partners to "coordinate their efforts for collective defense" and detracts from their "sense of unity";

Whereas the Government of New Zealand will not be in compliance with the Subsidies Code of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs as of April 1, 1985, because of its decision to maintain export subsidies on certain agricultural commodities beyond that date; and

Whereas, after March 31, 1985, as a result of such noncompliance by the Government of New Zealand, the United States will no longer be obligated under such Subsidies Code to extend to New Zealand the benefits of the injury test provided under section 701(a)(2) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671(a)(2)): Now therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) it would be in the best interests of allied security and unity for each member country of the Security Treaty Between Australia, New Zealand, and the United States, commonly known as ANZUS, to reinstate the practice of permitting all naval ships of the other member countries access to the ports of such member country; and

(2) the President should—

(A) continue discussions with the Government of New Zealand aimed at resolving the present impasse regarding access of United States naval ships to the ports of New Zealand,

(B) explore with the Government of Australia the desirability and feasibility of a bilateral security treaty,

(C) until the present impasse between the United States and New Zealand is resolved, preclude New Zealand from participating in military and related activities with the United States, and

(D) exercise the right of the United States to withdraw from New Zealand the benefits of the injury test provided under section 701(a)(2) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671(a)(2)).

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, for over three decades, the interests of the United States and, I believe, the interests of Australia and New Zealand have been well served by the ANZUS Alliance. ANZUS has been but one manifestation of the close political, security, and economic ties amongst our three nations.

In recent weeks, however, the Government of New Zealand has taken actions which cast into doubt the future course of United States-New Zealand relations and the ANZUS Alliance.

The Government of New Zealand is adhering to a policy prohibiting port calls by nuclear-powered or nuclear-armed ships. For vital security reasons, the United States maintains a policy of neither confirming nor denying the presence or absence of nuclear weapons on board Navy ships.

The viability of the ANZUS Alliance in the face of New Zealand's policy faced its first challenge recently. In connection with the ANZUS Sea Eagle exercise scheduled for March, the United States requested that a U.S. ship be allowed to make a port call in New Zealand. The Government of New Zealand refused that request.

The ramifications of New Zealand's policy became clear yesterday, when the Sea Eagle exercise was canceled by its host, Australia. New Zealand Prime Minister David Lange was quoted in this morning's press reports as acknowledging that he expected his Government's action would have this result. It is my hope that Mr. Lange is also aware that the ramifications of his policy extend beyond the cancellation of the Sea Eagle exercise. New Zealand must be aware that it cannot be a part-time member of the alliance and of the free world, selecting the burdens it will bear while partaking of all the benefits.

Mr. Lange has stated that his policy is antinuclear, not anti-United States or anti-ANZUS. But as I stated 2 weeks ago from this floor, no person, no group, no nation has a moral corner or monopoly on the fear of nuclear war. Every sane and rational person views the potential for the termination of much, if not all, of life with a horror as absolute as the vision of apocalypse demands.

But to be aware and fearful of nuclear weapons is not enough. Nor is it sufficient to adopt policies which serve notice of one's fear and outrage if those policies do not reduce but, rather, increase the chance of nuclear war. This appears to be the course New Zealand is following.

It is not given to me or any other Member of Congress to lecture the people or leadership of a free and sovereign nation. But as a Member of the U.S. Senate and as chairman of the Sea Power Subcommittee, I have an obligation to point out the consequences that will naturally flow from such an ill-considered action.

If New Zealand chooses to take unilateral action to demonstrate its opposition to the existence of nuclear weapons, then it raises the question of whether it is prepared to defend itself unilaterally—not only its national security but its national economy as well.

It is by virtue of the defense of freedom that nations enjoy the benefits of international trade on a scope unparalleled in history. We in the free world depend upon open access to the global trade routes. Diminish the ability to defend that access and you place in jeopardy the ability to enjoy the benefits of that trade.

New Zealand has a long and special relationship with the United States, manifested in both our security and our economic ties. One of the benefits New Zealand has enjoyed because of this special relationship are the restraints we have placed upon our domestic producers of products that New Zealand places into international markets. Regrettably, New Zealand has chosen to call into question the need for this special relationship.

If New Zealand chooses to reject the burdens of defending freedom, it must understand that it may also be choosing to forfeit the benefit of our and Australia's efforts to defend it for and with them, as well as the economic benefits of our special relationship.

In my view, it would be in the interests of allied security and unity for the ANZUS countries to return the situation that existed a few months ago, when the ANZUS Alliance and United States-New Zealand relations were in good health. The choice, however, is New Zealand's.

Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a resolution that expresses the sense of the Senate that the ANZUS partners should return to the situation of a few months ago. However, I regret that I am not hopeful in this regard and thus am compelled to call on this body to urge President Reagan to initiate specific responses to New Zealand's actions.

Clearly, the President should continue discussions with the Government of

New Zealand aimed at resolving the present impasse.

ANZUS is the only security treaty the United States has in the South Pacific. The need for security cooperation with Australia has increased with the growth of Soviet military activities in the Pacific and Indian Oceans. Yet the ability to carry out this cooperation has been jeopardized by New Zealand's action. Accordingly, the President should explore with the Government of Australia the possible need for a bilateral security treaty.

The United States and New Zealand participate in a variety of military and related activities. So long as New Zealand chooses to exclude the United States from some of these, the President should preclude New Zealand from participating in the others.

As I have noted, New Zealand has called into question the need for our special economic relationship. The President should respond accordingly. He can first do so with a matter that is now before the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative. Let me briefly explain.

When it became a signatory of the GATT Subsidies Code in 1981, New Zealand agreed to completely phase out its export subsidies by March 31, 1985. As a signatory of the code, the United States agreed to require a showing of injury by domestic petitioners during any countervailing duty investigation on these subsidized New Zealand exports. Under the injury test requirement, domestic petitioners must show not only that New Zealand is subsidizing these exports, but that this has resulted in injury to domestic producers.

It is my understanding that New Zealand will not phase out its export subsidies by the March 31 deadline and has proposed a much longer time frame for eliminating these subsidies. I also understand that New Zealand has asked that we retain the injury test requirement, even though after March 31 we will not be obligated to do so.

Had New Zealand not adopted its policy regarding port calls, some would undoubtedly have argued that the United States, in keeping with its special relationship with New Zealand, should honor that nation's requests for additional time and retention of the injury test. New Zealand, however, seems to have decided that it no longer needs or wants that special relationship. Accordingly, in my view, the President should exercise the United States right to withdraw the benefit of an injury test, effective April 1, 1985.

The resolution I am introducing urges the President to take these four actions I have described:

Continue discussions with New Zealand to resolve the present impasse;

Explore with Australia the possible need for a bilateral security treaty;

Until the present impasse is resolved, preclude New Zealand from participating in military and related activities with the United States; and Exercise our right to withdraw from New Zealand the benefit of the injury test I described.

It is clear from my contacts with the executive branch that these actions are generally consistent with the administration's policy. Several of my colleagues from both sides of the aisle are joining me in sponsoring this measure, and I believe that if it receives sufficient bipartisan support, the administration will act upon it. I therefore urge my colleagues to examine this issue and join in cosponsoring this resolution.

I would prefer to be more delicate and diplomatic in approaching the national and moral sensibilities of an allied nation. But such an ill-considered idea, left unhindered by logic or history, has many waiting votaries. Indeed, there are those in other nations who do not yet live under the shadow of the Soviet state who believe that the only remaining choices are between freedom and annihilation, atomization and abdication.

Mr. President, peace and freedom are in fact possible, but not if we unilaterally undermine the ability to defend that freedom.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator COHEN and my other colleagues in sponsoring this resolution. New Zealand's current policy on visits by U.S. ships to its ports threatens the very fabric of the ANZUS Alliance.

We are taking this action today not because we want to rend our alliance with New Zealand, but because we want to see that alliance reinvigorated. An alliance in which one of the parties unilaterally takes an action which undermines the common defense is no alliance at all. We must use every lever available to us to reverse this unilateral action by the New Zealand Government. I hope that our other allies will join us in this effort.

I might note that last month I visited Japan to talk about security and trade issues. This was at the time of Prime Minister Nakasone's visit to New Zealand. I know from my visit that many Japanese are very concerned about New Zealand's policy and I hope that Prime Minister Nakasone raised the issue with Prime Minister Lange during his visit. Unfortunately, whatever demarches which we and our allies have made to the New Zealand Government have not reversed that Government's ill-conceived policy. It is time now to put some bite into our jawboning.

I commend Senator COHEN for having drafted a resolution that does just that. I hope that it will receive wide support among our colleagues in the Senate, and that our allies abroad who share our concern about this problem will undertake similar initiatives.

SENATE RESOLUTION 67—RELATING TO EMERGENCY CREDIT FOR THE NATION'S FARMERS

Mr. BOREN (for himself, Mr. EXON, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. HARKIN, and Mr. FORD) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

S. RES. 67

Whereas agriculture is the Nation's most basic industry, and its associated production, processing, and marketing sectors, together, provide more jobs than any other single industry;

Whereas United States agriculture is the world's most productive and the world's largest exporter;

Whereas it is the Nation's interest to carry out an agricultural policy that will ensure an adequate and dependable supply of food and fiber at reasonable prices;

Whereas producers are the basic element in the food and fiber system and their ability to make a profit and meet their financial obligations is critical to their remaining in business;

Whereas technological developments have greatly increased the capital requirements of agricultural production;

Whereas agricultural-related debt has risen from $50,000,000,000 in 1970 to $215,000,000,000 in 1984;

Whereas a general decline in the financial condition of producers, as evidenced by increases in the average debt-to-asset ratio and debt-to-equity ratio, threatens the ability of producers to obtain the credit needed to continue their operations;

Whereas it is essential that producers be able to obtain adequate credit at interest rates conducive to debt servicing and profit-making; and

Whereas the foundation of the Nation's agricultural system will be adversely affected if producers are unable to obtain a return on their investment that enables them to service their debt and continue their operations: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should—

(1) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately support the enactment of necessary legislation so as to make available not less than $4,000,000,000 in loan guarantee authority for Farmers Home Administration farm operating and ownership loans;

(2) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to eliminate the administrative requirement that banks agree to write off a part of the loan in exchange for 90 percent loan guarantee under any of the Farmers Home Administration farm programs;

(3) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to permit lenders to write down interest rates on farm loans in exchange for Federal guarantees on the principal;

(4) request a supplemental appropriation of $600,000,000 for insured farm ownership loans;

(5) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce the interest rates on insured Farmers Home Administration farmer program loans to one half of the Treasury's cost of borrowing;

(6) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to modify the administrative requirement that a borrower must show that the borrower will have 110 percent of the cash flow needed to meet the borrower's obligations to qualify for the Farmers Home Administration debt set-aside program;

(7) direct the Secretary of Agriculture to approve or deny an application for any Farmers Home Administration farm program loan or loan guarantee within sixty days after the receipt of the completed application;

(8) direct the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to approve the Department of Agriculture's pending request for additional field personnel and equipment to reduce Farmers Home Administration caseload backlog;

(9) direct the Federal bank examiners to exercise caution and restraint in making adverse classifications with respect to agricultural loans;

(10) oppose any increase in banks' minimum capital requirement; and

(11) support the extension of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation net worth certificate program with an amendment expanding eligibility in this program to agriculture banks.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators EXON, MELCHER, BURDICK, BAUCUS, HARKIN, FORD, and myself, I am introducing a sense of the Senate resolution urging the President to provide emergency credit assistance for the Nation's farmers.

As I have said repeatedly over the past week, we must take action now to avoid a complete collapse in the agricultural economy. If we fail to prevent this from happening, the economic stability of our entire Nation will be jeopardized.

For the past week I have anxiously awaited the announcement of farm credit relief by the administration. I was deeply disappointed in Secretary Block's so-called farm credit relief measures announced earlier today.

I had hoped the administration would have finally awakened to reality and presented a program which could be truly effective in providing badly needed credit to our farmers. and ranchers.

The administration continues to ignore the intent of Congress by placing unrealistic requirements on banks before approving loan guarantee applications. When Congress provided the additional authority for the loan guarantee program last year, it was assumed that the program would be handled as before. Yet, when the program was announced last fall, before a farmer could receive a guarantee on his loan, he had to convince his banker to write off part of the principal of the loan. When one considers the financial condition of most of our agricultral banks, it is no wonder very few loans have been made under the guarantee program.

I repeat, again, the statement made by Senator EXON and myself that we stand ready to stop consideration of any legislation on the Senate floor until an effective farm credit program is in place.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this resolution which urges the President to take action now and outlines the bare necessities of any meaningful farm credit program.●

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Labor will hold an oversight hearing on March 19, 1985, regarding the proposed asbestos claims facility. The hearing is scheduled for 9:30 a.m. in room 430 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. Persons wishing to testify should submit a written request to Chairman DON NICKLES, Subcommittee on Labor, 428 Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC 20510 by February 15. If you have any questions concerning the hearing, please contact Rick Lawson, on the subcommittee staff, at 202-224-5546.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE LEGAL BILLS OF MR. MEESE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Bill Rentschler publishes the News/Voice and some other publications in Lake County, IL.

He is a public-spirited citizen who has contributed a great deal to our State, who happens to be of the Republican persuasion.

He has written a column on the nomination of Ed Meese that should be of interest to all the Members of the Senate as we face this difficult decision.

I submit his statement for the RECORD:

TALK ABOUT GALL: NOW MEESE WANTS US TO PAY HIS HUGE LEGAL BILLS

(By Bill Rentschler)

Talk about gall.

Now Edwin Meese is demanding to be reimbursed by us taxpayers for more than $700,000 in legal fees he ran up in defending himself against charges he traded federal jobs for personal financial favors.

It was Meese who demanded the appointment of a special prosecutor to clear his name, which the prosecutor did, sort of, finding him "not guilty" of criminal wrongdoing, but showing him to be as insensitive to propriety as a warthog in a cathedral.

Now he wants you and me to take care of his overblown legal fees at rates up to $250 an hour. It is ironic that the Justice Department which he seeks to head has fought bitterly against reimbursement of legal fees for ordinary citizens wrongfully accused by the government.

This is the same Ed Meese, you understand, who was a hard-line, southern California-bred, string-'em-up, law-and-order type county prosecutor, longtime Reagan retainer/advisor, and more recently, the White House insider who wants to be Attorney General of the United States, keeper of our sacred traditions of equal justice under law, and who is asking the public to underwrite his quest for this prestigious post.

Can you imagine a worse choice?

Notwithstanding the frequently weasel-worded whitewash of Meese by a special prosecutor, who was arranged by Meese's friend and associate, incumbent Attorney General William French Smith, Meese comes across as an opportunist who skates at the very edge of illegality. Surely this is hardly the sort who should be rewarded with control of this nation's vast, shadowy, all-powerful investigative and law enforcement arsenal.

Ohio Democratic Senator Howard Metzenbaum is determined to defeat Meese's confirmation in Senate Judiciary hearings underway this week. Metzenbaum promises to dwell at some length on Meese's evasions, in which his memory failed at least 50 times during the five-month investigation. If Meese had been an ordinary target, a typically-hungry federal prosecutor would have leapt on such convenient "amnesia" like a ravenous wolfpack attacking a moose with severed hamstring and doubtless would have emerged from the grand jury room with an indictment.

Metzenbaum has stated the special prosecutor's report shows clearly that Meese has engaged in a "pattern of unethical and improper conduct" which should disqualify him for a position of such trust at Attorney General.

On Monday Wall Street Journal investigative reporter Edward T. Pound, a former Chicago newsman, disclosed a staff report by the Office of Government Ethics that concluded Meese had "violated the federal government's ethical standards." The report "leaked out" and has not been formally released, which gives substance to allegations of a cover-up, possibly by the White House. This may give Meese's foes further fuel of a highly incendiary nature.

Most, but not all, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is headed by Meese-backer Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, say they will vote for Meese if the nomination comes to the Senate floor. Many, however, are uneasy and embarrassed; GOP Senator Paul Trible of Virginia has urged the President to withdraw the nomination.

There is no position in the public life of this nation where the "appearance of impropriety" should hold greater sway as the decisive factor than in determining the fitness of an individual to be Attorney General. It is he (or she) who each day must make critical ethical and legal judgments which affect lives, property, reputations, causes, institutions, and fairness in the administration of justice.

These newspapers last March 29 urged President Reagan to withdraw the Meese nomination. Others from many sectors have done the same. My guess is the crescendo will rise swiftly as the hearings proceed. But the President resolutely hangs tough where his cronies are concerned, no matter their merit, and Meese appears mainly to be buoyed up by partisan loyalists and Reagan's defiance of the critics.

Sadly, the damning evidence that Edwin Meese does not measure up is not likely to dissuade enough U.S. Senators to deny him this lofty post.

Once again, clout and self-interest will prevail over principle and good sense. Pity.●

HOW CASTRO ATTEMPTS TO USE THE JOSE MARTI LEGACY

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, recently we marked the 132d anniversary of the birth of Jose Marti, Cuban patriot and man of letters. Jose Marti is the symbol of the struggle for Cuban independence and his ideas and writings underscore a lifelong commitment to democratic government. The Congress created Radio Marti in order that the Cuban people would have access to the truth. The truth is essential to the fight for freedom, thus it was highly appropriate that the U.S. broadcasting service to Cuba be named in recognition of Jose Marti.

The purpose of Radio Marti does honor to the memory of Jose Marti. The cynical use of this patriot by the Castro regime dishonors that memory. Jose Marti denounced communism in his writings and it is certain that he would be in the forefront of opposition to Fidel Castro if he were alive today. Recently the Wall Street Journal published a column by Manuel A. Tellechea that describes how Castro attempts to use the Marti legacy in a way that perverts all that Jose Marti represents.

I commend this article to the attention of the Senate and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb 1, 1985]

CUBAN HERO'S LEGACY SUFFERS FROM CASTRO'S PRAISE

(By Manuel A. Tellechea)

There is some question as to when the U.S. government's radio transmissions into Cuba, named Radio Marti, will become operational. For whatever reasons and however much longer Radio Marti's broadcasts are delayed, its mere existence will have served one useful purpose: publicizing the ideas of a man whose name and reputation have been wrongly co-opted by the totalitarians who rule Cuba today.

Jose Marti was born in 1853 and died fighting for Cuban independence 42 years later. He spent the greater part of his brief but fecund life in exile, the last 15 years in the U.S. There he launched two revolutions—one in the sphere of letters and the other in human affairs. The first culminated in the Modernist movement in Spanish poetry, and the latter in a free Cuba.

Marti is also credited with having acquainted the Latin two-thirds of the Western Hemisphere with the other third. He did this through a biweekly column that was carried in virtually every newspaper in Latin America 100 years ago—making Marti one of the world's first internationally syndicated journalists.

Marti does not supplant earlier commentators on the U.S. scene. He is, in fact, their ideal complement. Alexis de Tocqueville saw the U.S. in its infancy; Marti, in its gilded age.

Marti realized there were faults inherent in the U.S. system of government, and he railed against them. But he deplored the faults, not the system, which he regarded as the paramount achievement of man as a social animal.

In Marti's judgment, the U.S.'s strength lay not in its institutions, Constitution or people (which is not to say that any of these lacked strength). Its strength was rooted in its universal quest for material aggrandizement. So long as that remained its chief objective, its overpowering obsession, the U.S. would remain free. Marti was not the first to realize that there is a connection between economic freedom and individual liberty, but he was the first to see this not as a happy coincidence but as a fixed dictum: Democracy stimulates commerce, and commerce unobstructed guarantees democracy.

Because he saw firsthand the benefits the U.S. reaped from capitalism, Marti wished to introduce that system in Latin America. He edited and wrote for a magazine, America, the stated purpose of which was "to create Latin American markets for American machinery." Marti hoped the introduction of modern technology in Latin America would speedup its industrialization. Reapers and steam engines were the solution to Latin America's ills, not class warfare.

Marti's appreciation of capitalism was truly "revolutionary." In 19th-century Latin America, the Roman Catholic hierarchy opposed capitalism, as did the oligarchs. The church, because capitalism—along with universal suffrage, which the church also opposed—was associated with that most accursed anathema, classical liberalism. The oligarchs, because capitalism was a threat to feudalism.

Communism is the modern version of feudalism, and has its own lords, vassals and serfs. It may inveigh against exploitation, but would not see it end, only the practitioners changed. Marti was the first Latin American to realize this. "Communism," he wrote, "is the creed of spiteful and avaricious men who, in order to have shoulders upon which to raise themselves, pretend to be impassioned defenders of the disenfranchised.

"When not a delirium caused by the pain of want, hatred of wealth is the madness of rabid beasts. Only those who despair of ever reaching the heights of success wish to see those heights levelled. Heights are good. Whatever enables a man to reach them is devine."

Incredible though it may seem, Cuban Marxists claim Marti as the "intellectual architect" of the Cuban Revolution. Marti—along with Lenin and Marx—has been made into a deity by Fidel Castro. Several quotes, taken out of context, are used to justify his inclusion in Fidel Castro's pantheon of degenerates. The most famous is from Marti's obituary of Marx: "Karl Marx is dead. He put himself on the side of the weak and should be commended for doing so."

Fidel Castro's adherents never finish the Marti quote. Having paid this genteel compliment to the dead, Marti goes on to say: "It is not enough merely to point to a problem and burn in anxious hopes of remedying it; one must propose a benign solution, and that Marx did not do. His solution frightens us, for he would pit man against man; it disgusts us, because he would make brutes of some men in order that others might profit thereby."

Marti's very life refutes everything communism stands for. A man's writing may be interpreted in many different ways, but a man's life cannot. From the tender age of 15, when he was imprisoned for having opposed Spanish rule in Cuba—a rule far less oppressive than Fidel Castro's—Marti fought relentlessly for the sovereignty of his country, a sovereignty Fidel Castro has sold to the lowest bidder.

Marti is, if anything, the very antithesis of Fidel Castro: the one created a nation, and the other is bent on destroying it. But apples and oranges are the same in Cuba. And why not, since no one in Cuba has seen either in 26 years? If Radio Marti ever gets off the ground, perhaps it will help Cubans to know the difference.

SUPPORT OF THE ACTIONS OF THE NBA AND THE ALL-STAR PLAYERS IN THEIR EFFORTS TO AID ETHIOPIA

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, not in recent memory has a calamity such as the one that has afflicted thousands upon thousands of men, women, and children in Ethiopia touched the hearts of people throughout our Nation.

All of us have seen the devastation and the despair that have consumed drought-stricken Ethiopia. All of us have seen the faces of small children crying out for a morsel of food. All of us have seen the anguish on the faces of women cradling dead infants in their arms.

Americans have shown their compassion for the victims of famine in Ethiopia by making contributions that will help to alleviate the suffering in that country.

In recent weeks, however, the catastrophe in Ethiopia has not been given the news prominence that it deserves, yet the plight of the Ethiopians continues to be one that merits our wholehearted support.

Out of sight must not be out of mind when it comes to helping a people virtually destroyed by starvation and disease.

This is why I would like to call your attention to a special event on Sunday, February 10. On that day, the National Basketball Association will hold its annual all-star game in Indianapolis.

The players in that contest have shown that they are all stars in more ways than one. They have agreed to donate their prize money from that game for Ethiopian relief, and the NBA will match the players' contribution, resulting in a combined total of more than $100,000 to be donated to a truly worthy cause.

The NBA players are to be commended for this humane effort. Equally important, their action will serve to encourage the millions of Americans who will watch the game on television to follow their lead and make donations to appropriate relief agencies.

As public figures, the NBA players realize they have a significant social responsibility. Through this special fund drive, they are giving expression to their dedication to helping the afflicted, regardless of where the need may occur.

Basketball has been called America's game. The players in the NBA all-star game on Sunday personify America's great tradition of extending a helping hand to those trapped by tragedy. These fine athletes deserve our gratitude for their spirit and their leadership.●

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF LOYAL FEDERAL SERVICE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, all of us in Congress, and elsewhere in Government, take a certain pride in knowing that whatever our capacity, we are performing a service for our country. While this service normally goes unheralded, occasionally the service of some of us becomes so noteworthy that it deserves public mention.

I am pleased to announce that Friday, February 8, 1985, will mark the 25th anniversary of Federal Government service for D. Michael Harvey, chief counsel for the minority of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Mike began his Federal career in 1960 with the Bureau of Land Management in the Interior Department, where he spent 11 of the next 13 years, the last 4 of which he served as Chief, Division of Legislation and Regulatory Management. In the mid-1960's he served with the Public Land Law Review Commission and the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration.

In 1973, he accepted an invitation from Senator Henry M. Jackson to become special counsel to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. In February 1977 when the Senate reorganized its committee structure and created the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, he was appointed as its first chief counsel, a post in which he served until January 1981.

Mike then became chief counsel for the minority. When I became ranking minority member in January 1983, I was fortunate enough to inherit Mike in that capacity, where he remains today.

He received a B.A. from the University of Rochester in 1955. He then joined Eastman Kodak Co., for 4 years, before moving to Washington. He received a J.D. from Georgetown University in 1963, while working at BLM.

He is actively involved in American Bar Association activities, particularly the section of natural resources law. Last fall he became a member of the section's council, or governing body, the first time a Federal Government employee has been chosen to do so. He was chairman and member of the Fairfax County, VA, Park Authority, and chairman of the Natural Resources and Environment Committee of the Northern Virginia Planning District Commission.

Mike and his wife Pat live in Potomac, MD. He has four children, and six grandchildren, with one more on the way.

Mike is far from the one-dimensional Government lawyer. He loves poetry, and has been known to quote Shakespeare at length. He likes opera and is an avid Georgetown University basketball fan. He is a prolific and eloquent writer—perhaps best exemplified by two touching eulogies he authored after the deaths of his friends and mentors Lee Metcalf and Scoop Jackson.

We are fortunate to have people like Mike Harvey in Government service and we are particularly fortunate to have him on the committee staff. He is a professional in every sense of the word and he and his opinions are highly respected by a broad range of Senators both on and off the committee on both sides of the aisle. From his familiar position at the committee staff table, Mike and his invaluable institutional memory and scholarly demeanor have served the committee and the Senate well.

I salute him for his 25 years of loyal, dedicated service.●

CONTROL EMISSIONS THAT CAUSE ACID RAIN

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I have just come from the Environment and Public Works Committee's hearing on the nomination of Lee M. Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA]. I took the opportunity to share with Mr. Thomas my views on a most important regulatory decision that the Agency is preparing to make. I would like also to bring this matter to the attention of my colleagues.

On October 13, 1983, the court ordered the EPA to finalize a new rule implementing section 123 of the Clean Air Act, which provides for limits on the use of tall stacks to disperse air pollutants as a means of meeting clean air requirements. This rule could substantially reduce one of the major causes of acid rain—sulfur dioxide emissions.

If strictly crafted—in keeping with the intent of Congress—a new rule could reduce sulfur dioxide emissions by 6 million tons or more per year. I am concerned, however, that EPA's final rule—due to be issued by May 13—may not be sufficiently stringent. I have reviewed the Agency's proposed rule, published in the Federal Register on November 9, 1984, and I find it unsatisfactory. The proposed rule would accord greater pollution control credits for stack heights than Congress expected to be permitted under section 123.

A careful reading of section 123 and its legislative history points clearly to the conclusion that tall stacks are not to be used to substitute for substantive emissions reduction steps, such as burning low-sulfur fuels or installing flue gas desulfurization equipment. To the extent that the proposed rule allows taller stacks to replace emissions controls, it will fall short of the letter of the law. Instead of reducing annual sulfur dioxide emissions by 6 million tons or more, the proposed rule would produce only an estimated 800,000 to 2.9 million ton reduction.

The regulations implementing section 123 have a long history. In January 1979, the EPA first issued proposed rules limiting the use of tall stacks and other dispersion techniques to meet clean air requirements. In October 1981, the EPA withdrew its 1979 rulemaking and proposed a revised stack height rule. This latter proposal was adopted in final form on February 8, 1982, and the Sierra Club Legal Defense Fund, the Natural Resources Defense Council, and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania challenged the 1982 regulations in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. On October 13, 1983, the court issued its decision, overturning several portions of the stack height regulations and directing the EPA to promulgate new regulations. The Agency has until May 13, 1985, to issue a new section 123 rule in final form.

On November 9, 1984, the EPA issued a new proposed rule, solicited comments, and asked for additional comments on alternative approaches to implementing section 123. I find the proposed rule inadequate and, on review, I hope that my colleagues will agree and join me in urging the EPA to adopt an alternative approach.

Section 123(a) of the Clean Air Act states:

> (a) the degree of emission limitation required for control of any air pollutant . . . shall not be affected in any manner by—(1) so much of the stack height of any source as exceeds good engineering practice (as determined under regulations promulgated by the Administrator), or (2) any other dispersion technique. (Emphasis added.)

Section 123(c) of the Act defines "good engineering practice" [GEP] as:

> . . . the height necessary to insure that emissions from the stack do not result in excessive concentrations of any air pollutant in the immediate vicinity of the sources as a result of atmospheric downwash, eddies and wakes, which may be created by the source itself, nearby structures of nearby terrain obstacles (as determined by the Administrator).

The Congress added these provisions to the Clean Air Act in 1977 to make clear to all the intent of the act: Sources of air pollution are to meet the mandated air quality standards by reducing emissions not by merely using tall stacks to disperse emissions.

Increasing stack height above a de minimus level, that is 200 feet, is to be allowed only after all available emission controls have been employed, and then only to overcome downwash, eddy or wake problems that could violate air quality standards. The EPA's proposed rule of November 9 does not follow this approach. As such, it should be revised before being issued in final form.

We knew something about the long distance transport of air pollutants in 1977, when we adopted section 123. We knew that tall stacks contribute to the problem by releasing emissions higher into the atmosphere, allowing them to be carried by prevailing winds for hundreds or even thousands of miles. We knew enough to be concerned about the effect on the environment, and therefore required that stack heights be tightly regulated.

In 1970 there were only two stacks over 500 feet high in the United States, and today there are 180. In all, there are 650 sources with stack heights greater than 200 feet. The EPA's proposed rule has the potential to reduce emissions from 190 utility sources with stacks over 200 feet high—roughly half of these in Midwestern States. A more strictly crafted rule, however, would reduce the emissions from a greater number of sources with tall stacks.

Given what we know now about the role of long distance transport in the acid rain problem, we can accept nothing less than the most stringent interpretation of section 123. We have learned much since 1977. It was my concern about what we did not know that led me to introduce the Acid Precipitation Act on September 14, 1979. This bill became law in 1980, as title VII of the Energy Security Act (Public Law 96-294). It was then, and remains today, the only Federal acid rain statute.

The research results have been coming in fast and furious. The conclusion is clear: we must act now to control the emissions that cause acid rain. In the words of the President's Acid Rain Peer Review Panel:

. . . additional steps should be taken now which will result in meaningful reductions in the emissions of sulfur and nitrogen compounds into the atmosphere, . . .

What better way to accomplish such reductions than by implementing the existing mandate of section 123, and not permit sources to meet current air quality standards by using tall stacks in lieu of emission controls. Simply put, reducing dispersion of sulfur dioxide emissions will reduce acid rain.

Let us also not forget the commitment we have made to Canada on this matter. On August 5, 1980, the United States and Canada signed a memorandum of intent on transboundary air pollution. In this document we agreed to take certain actions. We committed ourselves, pending such an agreement, to "take interim actions available under current authority to combat transboundary air pollution." In section 123, we have the authority to act to reduce the emissions that cause acid rain.

On March 17, President Reagan will travel to Canada to meet with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. The Prime Minister has already informed the President that Canada wants acid rain "on the top of the agenda" when they meet in Quebec City. Would it not serve us all well if the President would announce at that time that the EPA will issue a rule on tall stacks that will result in a 6-million ton or more reduction in annual sulfur dioxide emission. Mr. President, this is a matter of national as well as international concern that deserves the administration's most careful attention.●

GLOBESCOPE

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am joined by Senator PACKWOOD in calling the attention of our colleagues to an important event designed to examine ways to maintain the integrity of the world's environment. Globescope will be a national assembly scheduled for April 17 to 21 in Portland, OR. Organized jointly by west coast community leaders and the Washington, DC-based Global Tomorrow Coalition, the Globescope assembly will bring together over 1,000 participants from the United States and abroad.

Speakers and panelists of national and international prominence—citizen group leaders, public officials, business executives, scientists, and educators—will address such global environmental concerns as:

Global trends in resources, environment, population, and development, and their impacts on the lives of Americans;

Pressure on natural life-support systems by rapid world population growth and rising demand for goods and services;

A central theme of the assembly will be the importance of people of widely differing backgrounds—civic leaders, students, senior citizens, business leaders, artists, factory workers, clergy, conservationists, and others, working individually and collectively in their communities to find ways to respond to long-term environmental challenges, to help assure a sustainable future and strengthen U.S. international leadership on these issues.

Globescope is an ongoing national project that began in Portland in 1983 as a grassroots citizen initiative. Globescope is a project of the Global Tomorrow Coalition, a nonprofit, publicly supported alliance of 100 organizations with combined memberships of over 6 million Americans. The coalition includes such diverse organizations as the National Audubon Society, Rodale Press, Tufts University, U.S Women's Health Coalition, Center for Development Policy, American Farm Foundation, Turner Broadcasting Systems, New York Zoological Society, Planned Parenthood Federation of America and Natural Resources Defense Council.

A wide spectrum of related exhibits, events, and adjunct programs is planned by participating Portland institutions. Day trips and tours both before and after the assembly will provide opportunities to explore Portland's cultural resources and Oregon's scenic beauty.

Mr. President, I ask that an article on Globescope from Portland Magazine, and another by Mr. Don Lesh, executive director of the Global Tomorrow Coalition, be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

[From Portland Magazine, September 1984]

GLOBESCOPE

Portland, the historic, regional hub of commerce and trade, has long cherished its traditional commitment to quality. Today, a sparkle of innovation lingers on the towers above the Willamette, a river restored and running fresh for recreation as well as transport. The people of this area are justly proud of the natural resources of our heritage. To breathe in our city is a joy because dedicated, aware individuals in business and conservation have long insisted upon livability as a virtue not for sully in Portland.

It seems obvious, then, that an assembly of individuals seeking answers to environmental problems should travel to our ecotopian model; in April 1985, Portland will open its doors to 1,500 participants in the Globescope Project.

Globescope will be an assembly of global-thinking conservationists focusing on the long-term democratic process of affecting environmental policies. By encouraging informed local "grass roots" groups to work locally in every community, and by providing these groups with an information-sharing and supportive communication network, Globescope will prove to be one of the major events in the global conservation movement.

By studying proven case histories of successful local initiatives in creative workshops, delegates from throughout the country will be able to return home and use this knowledge to work in their own areas towards an environmentally-secure future. Many of these case histories are from the Northwest and Oregon in particular, so the organizers of the Globescope Project are understandably excited about the prospect of hosting this first-ever assembly in Portland.

Globescope will encourage dialogue on ways in which we may ensure a sustainable future on a local level while sensitizing us to an awareness of global environmental responsibility. What has worked for Portland and Oregon may well provide a positively-charged model from which other community leaders may find hope for sticky problems. Oregon's recycling program, for instance, is respected throughout the nation. The mechanics of establishing similar programs elsewhere will bring many delegates who are learning to respect their own backyards and the whole earth as well.

The organizers of Globescope believe that a round-table approach to mutual problem solving for economic, scientific, recreational and aesthetic interests expedites creative resolution of impediments to future progress. Louis Fernandez, vice chairman of the board of directors of the Monsanto Co., endorses this approach: "Industry and environmental groups should begin searching for common concerns on the issues of ground water protection, new waste disposal techniques and the application of research findings from fields such as biotechnology."

Tektronix has long recognized the draw of our pristine environmental image in recruitment programs aimed at the cream of the science engineering crop. Nike Inc., likewise, relies upon health and vigor in natural surroundings as part of its marketing image.

Our choice of political representatives as well indicates our finely-tuned sense of balance between industry and environment. During these years of transition from an agrarian-based economy to one more complex and diverse, our positive choices for the environment will increasingly reap financial rewards for the pioneers along the Willamette.

It is properly gratifying that Portland has been chosen as the sight for the Globescope assembly. Globescope is a project of the Global Tomorrow Coalition, a non-profit, non-governmental organization which grew out of the Global 2000 Report to the president. In this report, the need for foresight capability was stressed as insurance for a sustainable future for this nation and planet.

Responsibility for the spirit of this report was assumed in large part by the Global Tomorrow Coalition. Member organizations include the National Wildlife Association, Izaac Walton League, Turner Broadcasting System, National Audubon Society, National Parks and Conservation Association and the U.S. Association for the Club of Rome, to name only a few of the 84 diverse but committed organizations. The unifying concern of this consortium is global trends in population, resources and development.

Donald R. Lesh, executive director of the Global Tomorrow Coalition, stresses the complexity of the problems we face. "The way in which all these disparate threads will be woven together in the fabric of a more sustainable and equitable future is still unclear. Nobody has the ultimate answer because we're all in the middle of defining it by means of our individual choices and collective political decisions through time. It is through the untidy, slow and frustrating, but optimistic, exercise of representative democracy that we are coming to grips with the finite options for our future, choosing where we want to be a decade or generation hence, and working out the details of how to get there from here." The Globescope Project is a "major step in the effort to build an informed constituency in the United States to achieve solutions to global environmental problems."

Globescope Coordinator Diane Lowrie has announced that feature speakers of national and international prominence will be involved with leaders of citizens' groups and public officials. Creative sessions will cover a broad range of subjects: food and agriculture, energy, wildlife conservation and species diversification, population stabilization and pollution.

Globescope will benefit from the advice and honored counsel of Portland Chamber of Commerce past Presidents Randall Kester and Phil Bogue. Dan Goldy and Robert Shoemaker join Kay Corbett and Caroline Stoel in their support of this project, which will stress mediation and dialogue techniques. Insight into other areas of approach will come from John Frohnmayer and Ron Schmidt, among others.

It is certain that Portland will gain national and international recognition of its leadership role in education and policy concerning long-term global trends. As Portland looks out upon the world, so will the world be looking at Portland during the Globescope Project.

[From Interaction, Spring/Summer 1984]

GLOBESCOPE IS COMING

(By Don Lesh)

(Mr. Lesh is Executive Director of the Global Tomorrow Coalition)

One is a distinguished senior attorney and former President of the Chamber of Commerce. Another is a prize-winning young photographer whose vita cites among honors and distinctions his service as coach of a championship women's rugby team. His wife is a multilingual soprano who has sung at the Met, a gourmet cook, and a skilled publicist. Still another is directing the installation of one of the most extensive and complex computer control networks ever designed for a major regional utility. The coordinator of the group is a widely-traveled conservationist and expert on wildlife protection who leads tours to the Galapagos Islands and, in scarce spare time, does jewelry and metal sculpture. Who are all these people, and what in the world are they doing in Portland, Oregon?

Running Globescope, that's what. And those of you who are members of the Global Tomorrow Coalition are their allies, for the Coalition has become an active sponsor, participant, and co-organizer of the project, which is the single most ambitious and challenging effort currently under way to stimulate more widespread local action on global issues in the United States.

It all started in Portland, and that initiative is symbolic of the grassroots spirit of Globescope. Virtually all of the major national environmental groups have joined in sponsoring Globescope, but the commitment to the project is strikingly diverse. Local endorsers range from the World Affairs Council and Portland City Club to Portland State University and the Oregon School of Arts and Crafts. Adjunct exhibits and programs are planned in Portland institutions such as the Washington Park Zoo, Western Forestry Center, and Oregon Museum of Science and Industry.

Globescope is both a continuing process of education, information-sharing, and networking on global issues at the community level across the United States and a key event of international significance: the four-day Globescope National Assembly to be held on April 17-21, 1985, in Portland, Oregon. The process is already under way through the programs of the Global Tomorrow Coalition and its member groups. But it will be expanded and enriched by the lessons learned in the conduct of the Globescope National Assembly. Those lessons will then be applied in organizing similar conferences and meetings in other regions of the country over the coming years.

The primary purposes of Globescope are: (1) to increase public understanding of the challenges posed by long-term global trends in environment, resources, population, and development; (2) to encourage and facilitate positive involvement and action on these issues by non-governmental organizations and individuals at the local level; and (3) to highlight the U.S. role and responsibility in finding cooperative means to respond to these challenges. Major emphasis will be placed on local action as a critical element in the effort to build broad national consensus for sustainable development in a healthy world environment.

Who should take part in Globescope? Why, you, of course. Participants in the National Assembly will include local and national citizen leaders, issue experts, educators, public officials, conservationists, corporate planners, journalists, and concerned individuals—from the United States as well as other countries, including the Third World.

There will be plenary sessions with outstanding speakers and panelists on the issues, naturally, and opportunities through workshops to meet those who can tell stories of either success or failure in trying to project wider concern for global environmental problems and stimulate direct participation and action at the community level.

Corporate executives will be welcome. Intrinsic to Globescope is the recognition that there are no simple solutions or easy answers to long-term global challenges. In a democracy like ours, timely policy decisions must be based on public discussion open to many differing perspectives. Dialogue and consensus—however difficult to achieve—are far more desirable and effective ways to solve long-term problems than antagonism, confrontation, and conflict. That's why many voices will be heard in Globescope.

The Coalition has underlined its commitment to Globescope by establishing an office in Portland (our first operating base outside of Washington DC), and registering as a tax-exempt, non-profit corporation in the State of Oregon. Diane Lowrie, the individual most responsible for creation of the Globescope project, has been appointed a representative of the Coalition in her work as National Coordinator.

For the Coalition, Globescope is particularly exciting because it represents a major step toward one of our goals: to expand the dialogue on long-term global issues at the community level across the United States. It offers a unique opportunity to reach important new constituencies in a region of the country known for environmental awareness and sensitivity.●

HOME TO SEATTLE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, next week Craig Arthur Gannett will leave the minority staff of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee to join the law firm of Davis, Wright, Todd, Riese & Jones in Seattle, WA. Craig leaves the committee staff after 3½ years of dedicated and loyal service as counsel for the minority.

Craig was born and raised in Seattle. He went to both college and law school at the University of Washington, where he received his B.A. in psychology in 1976 and J.D. in 1979. He came to the committee in August 1981, after serving as a law clerk to U.S. district court Judge Barbara Rothstein in Seattle.

He has served as principal minority counsel to the Subcommittee on Water and Power and has been involved in the formulation of numerous legislative proposals affecting Federal water projects, hydropower, irrigation, and oil and gas royalty management, to mention just a few. Craig is a marvelous writer and, unlike so many lawyers, is able to convey his thoughts in a precise yet appealing style. He has a quick and keen legal mind, a fine wit, and a professional attitude about his staff responsibilities that have made him a well liked and respected member of the committee staff.

Craig is one of those individuals who has reveled in his association with the Senate. His enthusiasm for the work of the Senate is contagious. Nearly everyone with whom he has worked somehow ended up enjoying the process more because of that enthusiasm. Craig has taken every opportunity to learn about the institution, its customs, and its Members, and has been proud to be a Senate staff member. His colleagues are a bit more proud themselves for his company.

As Craig moves on to the private sector, I wish him well and thank him for his contribution to the committee and the Senate.●

COMMENTS OF SENATOR STEVENS BEFORE THE CHRISTENING OF THE "ALASKA"

● Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD the comments of Senator TED STEVENS before the christening of the Alaska at Groton, CT, on Saturday, January 12, 1985.

The comments are as follows:

COMMENTS OF SENATOR STEVENS BEFORE THE CHRISTENING OF THE "ALASKA"

I'm proud to be here today to witness the sponsoring of the latest Alaska to defend this Nation.

The first Alaska was a wooden screw gunboat commissioned in 1869. She served the United States in the Pacific and the Atlantic—and was stationed a brief time in Sitka, AK.

The second Alaska was a steam fishing vessel—a mine-sweeper during the First World War.

The last vessel to bear the name of our State was a heavy cruiser that saw action at Iwo Jima, Okinawa, and during the 3rd Fleet operations against Japan. She was retired in 1947 after supporting the occupation of the Asian theater and earning three battle stars for her service.

Now one of our finest submarines will carry Alaska's name through the world's oceans to help ensure a lasting peace.

The last time I was briefed on Soviet submarine strength, I was more shocked than at any other briefing in my 16 years as a U.S. Senator. The Soviets have an awesome commitment to the development of supremacy in submarines—in size, speed and firepower. They maintain a heavy presence in the North Pacific—we don't have a single sub stationed in Alaska.

Those facts, however, should not alarm you. We made a conscious decision not to compete with the Soviets on a submarine by submarine basis. Instead, our Government has devoted its efforts to the development of this highly survivable and potent class of missile launching submarines—the Trident submarine.

As the most effective leg of America's nuclear triad, the Trident provides our most stable deterrent—particularly in light of the heavy advantage the Soviets hold in land based ICBM's. The deterent effect of our ballistic missile submarine force is uncontestable. For more than 20 years, the Polaris and Poseidon ballistic missile submarines have quietly and effectively carried out their mission to deter nuclear conflict. Now Trident represents the next generation ready to patrol the oceans to maintain peace.

This Alaska and her sister ships illustrate our commitment to deter the possibility of a nuclear exchange. Virtually undetectable, they actually protect our land based missiles, our ships on the high seas, and even our aircraft which may be readily pinpointed and are not capable of surviving a first attack as the Trident is.

Although representing the ultimate in our ability to retaliate, it is more important—in terms of preserving the peace—that the Trident would survive a first strike, thereby ensuring America's ability to retaliate. God forbid that we ever have to use the Trident's awesome destructive power—but the fact that America has shown the resolve to provide this deterrent system is the best assurance we have of never having to utilize it.

Before Catherine formally christens the Alaska, I would like to comment on a couple of issues that affect the future not only of our strategic forces but of our total national defense efforts—the budget controversy and the reopened start talks in Geneva.

We christen the Alaska at a time when the United States and the Soviet Union are undertaking an historic new beginning to the urgent effort to control the ominous buildup of strategic weapons and the threat they pose to humanity. We will be at the bargaining table this time with a resolve to radically reduce nuclear weapons and—in the long run, hopefully—to eliminate them. Even as we salute the Alaska, then, we are determined to work for the date that this vessel and the amazing power it will carry will no longer be needed.

As chairman of the Senate observers group to the Geneva talks, I have an active interest in the direction the negotiation talks will take. I intend to do everything I can to insure that the Senate will be kept informed on a timely basis of the progress of these negotiations. The pole of the observers will not be to interfere in these negotiations.

To paraphrase Senator Arthur Vandenberg, if the Senate is expected to be on board when this vessel docks after a long submerged voyage, the Senate must be on board as she sails. The observer group I will co-chair with Senator SAM NUNN must assure full disclosure to the Senate as the negotiations proceed. And, we must demonstrate that we know how to deal with sensitive information—in the national interest.

The two superpowers, no matter how earnest their efforts, will not reverse the existing buildup of strategic weapons easily or quickly. Issues of immense complexity, reaching deeply into the vital interests of each participant and the whole world must be analyzed, debated, and resolved. Decades of deploying terrible weapons of destruction will not be reversed without a new dedication to eliminating the fears that spawned those weapons.

It is critically important that the United States during these negotiations maintain the strongest defensive position possible. Recognizing the vast superiority the Soviets enjoy in land-based ICBM's, this modern and effective sea-based deterrent is essential to the maintenance of our national security.

Modernization of our defensive capability and readiness must be maintained. Those needs are more urgent than ever as we renew the effort to reduce and eliminate the array of nuclear weapons.

Overdue increases in Defense appropriations enjoyed nearly universal support in Congress with the advent of the 1980's and the election of the Reagan administration. When I took chairmanship of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, Congress was eager to add to the hefty Defense funding proposed by President Reagan.

And there was a clear commitment to continuing that support, and recognition that the severe budget constraints in the 1970's and left our Nation with a weakened defense structure.

Now that support has eroded, we hear more and more serious proposals not only to moderate this funding support but to reverse the orderly growth in spending that has been an essential part of our commitment to rebuilding our defensive forces.

We must support reductions in the Defense budget that accompanying an across-the-board commitment to eliminate deficits of the past—after a careful examination of the impact on national security.

Last year the Congress, acting on recommendations of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees that grew out of the congressional budget and authorization processes, reduced the Defense budgets by $20 billion. But we did it on a selective and reasoned basis, without serious impairment of our goal to continue modernizing and rebuilding our military forces.

Costly modernization programs were authorized in the late 1970's and early 1980's—the bills are now due. For instance, the decision to build this submarine was made in 1978, but it's being paid for now. The Defense budget simply isn't as flexible as its critics would have you believe. Only 12 percent of last years budget was for new investment in defense.

This Nation's defense needs must not be undermined by a quick fix approach to the deficit reduction goal. It's cheaper to deter a war than to fight one.

Like the Alaska, recent events in Washington and Geneva renew my hope in our future.

As the father of six—three sons, three daughters—and a grandfather three times also, I thank you for allowing me to participate here today.

Alaska, I pray you will complete each mission successfully; that the men and women who enable you to defend our Nation will have the strength of our mountains, the patience of native people who have survived adversity for years; the ingenuity of those Alaskans who have used modern technology to produce energy and other resources under conditions unbearable to most humans; and, above all, the protection of Almighty God who will assure that we work to achieve his goals as we perform the duties assigned to us. We are forewarned and forearmed—your duty, Alaska, to maintain the peace.

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on this, the 67th anniversary of the establishment of the Republic of Lithuania, I wish to take this opportunity to commemorate the founding of a progressive and independent Lithuania which, for its all-too-brief existence of 22 years, was a beacon of democracy. Symbolizing the determination and courage of the Lithuanian people, February 16 provides an opportunity for all Americans to reflect on the proud heritage of our fellow citizens of Lithuanian descent and to renew our dedication to the principles of freedom and liberty for which Lithuanian Independence Day stands. It is always a great honor for me to join with more than 1 million Lithuanian-Americans in celebrating this quest for human dignity and freedom. This tribute is, as well, a testament to the brave struggle of thousands of Lithuanians who remain in their homeland where, even under foreign repression, these cherished principles will not die.

On February 16, 1918, the people of Lithuania reestablished their indepence after having fallen to Russian rule in 1795. Their constitution, adopted in 1922, granted to their people the basic freedoms of speech, assembly, and religion, and thus ended decades of repression. The hope and pride engendered by this new constitution were tragically short lived. As was the case with all the Repbulics, Lithuania's independence was crushed in 1940 when it was occupied again by Soviet Armed Forces. It has been controlled by the Soviets ever since. Nonetheless, the Lithuanians' indomitable spirit sitll survives as an example of hope to oppressed peoples everywhere.

In the 19th century, Lithuanian immigration to the United States increased substantially due to the oppression under the czarist regime. Many of the social and cultural activities repressed in the homeland found strong expression in America; we in Maryland are fortunate to have a large and active Lithuanian community, prospering as doctors, lawyers, businessmen, teachers, scientists, artists, and technicians. Lithuanians can be proud of their longstanding tradition of self-help and voluntarism. There are well over 2,000 Lithuanian charities and self-help organizations in the United States, and I can state first hand that their pride and respect for the traditions of freedom and equality have greatly enriched the lives of those around them.

While today we commemorate the founding of the Lithuanian Republic, it is important to recall that the Lithuanians have a long and valorous history as a people, spanning over 700 years. The history of this valiant nation has been filled with accounts of battle and struggle against aggressors. The Lithuanian defenders have stood resolutely against their adversaries and their commitment to freedom remained steadfast. Above all, the gallant Lithuanian people have withstood centuries of relentless pressure to abandon their religion, culture and language. The success of Lithuanian immigrants in maintaining their cultural heritage has resulted in countless valuable contributions not only to Lithuania, but to our own country as well.

On this 67th anniversary of the Republic of Lithuania we should reflect on the vision of freedom which continues to burn in the hearts of the Lithuanian people and on the sacrifices that have been made and continue to be made by noble individuals. In Viktoras Petkus, a Prisoner of Conscience in the Soviet Union, we have this vision personified. A close associate of Andrei Sakharov, he was the founder of the Lithuanian Helsinki Monitoring Group in 1976 which promoted the implementation of Helsinki accords on human rights and reported on Soviet violations of those rights. Last arrested in 1977, he has spent 20 years in Soviet prisons. One year has passed since a letter has been received from Viktoras Petkus; he was last said to be in the Kuchino forced labor camp. We should be concerned over his fate and future.

Mr. President, in the face of great repression the people of Lithuania continue to hold fast to the principles of basic human rights. On February 16, as we commemorate the founding of the Republic of Lithuania in 1918, we pay tribute to them. Their courage has won the respect and admiration of all freedom-loving peoples. Let us hope, as they hope, that the day is not far off when their beloved homeland once again flies the banner of freedom and justice for all.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notifications which have been received. The classified annex referred to in one of the covering letters is available to Senators in the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The notifications follow:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1985.

Hon. RICHARD C. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-12 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. This Transmittal concerns the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to Canada for defense articles and services estimated to cost $55 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media of the unclassified portion of this Transmittal.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Lieutenant General, USAF, Director.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

CANADA—MK 48 MOD 4 TORPEDOES

The Government of Canada has requested the purchase of a quantity of 48 MK 48 MOD 4 torpedoes, training, and related support at an estimated cost of $55 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Canada; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The Government of Canada requires the MK 48 MOD 4 torpedo weapon system to upgrade its current anti-submarine defense capabilities in support of its NATO defense commitments. The Canadian military establishment is fully capable of absorbing this weapon system within its current submarine forces. This sale will provide the Canadian Armed Forces with a modern and effective anti-submarine weapon system.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be Gould Incorporated of Cleveland, Ohio.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S.

[1] As defined in Section 47(6) of the Arms Export Control Act.

Government personnel or contractor representatives to Canada.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-08, concerning the Department of the Air Force's proposed Letter of Offer to Korea for defense articles and services estimated to cost $22 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

KOREA—F-4E AIRCRAFT

The Government of Korea has requested the purchase of a quantity of four F-4E aircraft with modifications, and technical orders at an estimated cost of $22 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by helping to improve the security of a friendly country which has been and continues to be an important force for political stability and economic progress in Eastern Asia. The sale of this equipment and support will enhance deterrence and contribute to the preservation of peace and stability on the Korean peninsula.

The Republic of Korea needs these aircraft to replace F-4E aircraft lost in peacetime accidents and thus maintain their F-4E inventory at the previously agreed upon force level. These aircraft can be easily absorbed by the Korean Air Force.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in this region.

These F-4E aircraft will be provided from inventory on "as is, where is" basis.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel or contractor representatives to Korea.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

POPULATION GROWTH AND U.S. FUNDS

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, recently, I joined 16 of my colleagues in the Senate in sending a letter to the White House expressing our grave concern about the recent decision not to provide the International Planned Parenthood Federation [IPPF] with 17 million dollars' worth of population assistance appropriated in the fiscal year 1985 budget.

This action is especially distressing because it comes at a time when several underdeveloped nations in Africa are experiencing famine. First, we are told that IPPF funds are withheld, and now we learn that the U.S. Agency for International Development is holding up money for family planning that might limit the number of babies born into desperate poverty, by not yet providing to the United Nations Fund for Population Activities [UNFPA] the funds appropriated for it.

I would like to include in the RECORD an editorial from the February 5, 1985, issue of the Boston Globe, entitled "Population Growth and U.S. Funds," which sheds important new light on this issue.

The editorial follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Feb. 5, 1985]

POPULATION GROWTH AND U.S. FUNDS

Even as the hollow-eyed faces of starving children stare out of photographs from Africa, an illogical and indecent move is afoot to deny family planning to those countries most in need of it.

With macabre hypocrisy, the Reagan Administration is holding up money for family planning that might limit the number of babies born into desperate poverty, while larding out money to feed those already born—and already starving.

A freeze has been put on a congressional appropriation of $46 million for programs to be carried out in 1985 by the United Nations Fund for Population Activities. UNFPA had targeted a large proportion of those funds for Africa, the continent with the fastest growing population in the world.

The freeze is a reaction to reports, largely out-of-date, about coercive contraceptive and abortion practices in China—practices that are illegal and for which some workers have been jailed. Although an investigatory team of the U.S. Agency for International Development went to China last June and concluded that "allegations that U.S. funds supported any coercive family-planning practices were unfounded," AID is refusing to release any money for UNFPA.

UNFPA funds have never directly aided family planning or abortion in China, nor have they been used for coercive practices anywhere. UNFPA money to China paid for IBM computers to process the census there in the early 1980s, and now primarily supports the training of demographers, maternal and infant-care workers and studies to reduce infant mortality.

Third World countries, whose population increases will account for 90 percent of the world's growth over the next 15 years, rely heavily on UNFPA family programs. UNFPA was to receive a total of $160 million in 1985 from 137 donor nations. Now, the U.S. is reneging on one-fourth of it.

In addition to this denial of family-planning funds, a new U.S. policy has eliminated $17 million for International Planned Parenthood Federation, the world's largest independent family-planning agency.

IPPF, too, had planned major programs for the 11 African countries most sorely afflicted by drought and famine. IPPF support was ended because one-half of one percent of its work—with non-U.S. money—relates to abortion, principally educational and referral services. The cutback in funds for family planning is certain to increase reliance on abortion, the reverse of the intent.

While the famine in Africa is met with compassion and emergency feeding programs, to attribute its cause solely to drought of poor farming practices is misleading. "The underlying reason for what has occurred in Ethiopia and its neighboring countries is overpopulation," says Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute in Washington, D.C. Africa's population of 535 million will rise to 855 million within 15 years.

Not only is it false economy to feed the starving while denying help to stem their number. It is singularly cruel and wholly wrong.●

WATER DEVELOPMENT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I have argued many times before my colleagues about the significance of water development in South Dakota, with special emphasis on the authorization of the Lake Andes-Wagner and CENDAK irrigation projects. It is important, now, to hear from another point of view.

William J. Janklow, Governor of South Dakota, has contacted me, and he has stressed to the South Dakota delegation the same points I have often argued before you. I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
January 31, 1985.

Hon. JAMES ABDNOR,
U.S. Senate,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

Hon. LARRY PRESSLER,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

Hon. TOM DASCHLE,
House of Representatives,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: We understand that you will soon be introducing authorization legislation for the Lake Andes-Wagner and CENDAK irrigation projects, and strongly urge you to do everything possible to secure the earliest possible Congressional approval of these measures.

At the state and local levels we have done all that we can to develop the CENDAK and Lake Andes-Wagner projects. We have established a unified state water plan and reformed our institutional structures to implement this plan. The local sponsors have raised substantial contributions to fund project study efforts. The CENDAK sponsors have utilized over $1.5 million to investigate and design their project, while the Lake Andes-Wagner sponsors have also provided $1.5 million for similar use on their project. Also, the state has provided strong financial support in the form of study loans and direct study participation to further both projects. Collectively, the state and local sponsors have contributed more to the initial study of the Lake Andes-Wagner and CENDAK projects than probably any other water project sponsors throughout the country. Project chronologies which further document state and local efforts in support of these projects are enclosed.

We cannot wait any longer for the federal government to implement the remainder of the Pick-Sloan plan. We cannot continue to watch other eastern and western states obtain their priority while the Upper Missouri Basin suffers from economic stagnation. We need aggressive and effective action on your part to continue the great progress made to date. Congressional delay could effectively negate such progress and essentially kill the CENDAK and Lake Andes-Wagner projects. State and local support will inevitably erode over time unless Congress performs in a responsible and expeditious manner. We look to you to ensure that Congress takes the action required this session which will lead to project construction.

We are ready to provide any support you might deem appropriate during Congressional consideration of the Lake Andes-Wagner and CENDAK authorization legislation. Please contact us regarding any progress or problems with this legislation.

Sincerely,

BILL.

CENDAK—CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

June, 1980—Governor Janklow meets with Interior Secretary Watt. Federal commitment obtained to fulfill Pick-Sloan obligation to South Dakota.

January, 1981—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) proposes traditional five year general investigation to determine feasibility of project for federal authorization. Unacceptable to state; more responsive schedule needed.

June, 1981—Governor Janklow meets with Interior Assistant Secretary Carruthers. General agreement reached to aggressively pursue state water project priorities.

July, 1981—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) proposes new two-stage planning process to expedite planning investigation in response to June, 1981 Janklow-Carruthers meeting. Stage one intended as general concept study, and stage two intended as detailed advanced planning analysis.

August, 1981—Governor Janklow delivers Huron water speech outlining state water development program and "Big Ten" water project priorities.

November, 1981—CENDAK forms nonprofit organization and raises over $300,000 in landowner contributions to pursue project development.

April, 1982—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings), State, and CENDAK local sponsors agree to 18 month plan of study as part of new two-stage planning process. CENDAK planning report and draft environmental statement scheduled for completion by October, 1983.

September, 1982—State and CENDAK representatives meet with Secretary Watt and Commissioner Broadbent to review general status of project. Administration indicates support for full development of 474,000 acres.

October, 1982—State Board of Water and Natural Resources approves $300,000 study loan to CENDAK for project feasibility investigation.

February, 1983—Dispute over project drainage requirements and drainage costs delays completion of plan formulation working document.

March, 1983—State Legislature approves bill to improve effectiveness of irrigation and other special water use districts.

June, 1983—State and CENDAK representatives meet with Broadbent and Regional Director Marcotte to discuss drainage conflict. Broadbent indicates general support for project and establishes special group to examine drainage costs.

July, 1983—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) releases plan formulation working document and recommends full 474,000 acre plan. Drainage costs, however, still disputed and sinking fund concept established to cover Bureau's estimate

August, 1983—State Board of Water and Natural Resources approves $500,000 study loan to CENDAK for continued feasibility investigation.

October, 1983—Special drainage group has final meeting and reaches compromise on cost estimate. Parties proceed toward completion of planning report, but Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) indicates report will be delayed six months due primarily to previous drainage dispute. New completion date schedule for April, 1984.

December, 1983—Special election conducted and voter approval obtained for establishing a new Conservancy Subdistrict organized around CENDAK project area boundaries.

March, 1984—State and CENDAK representatives meet with Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) to review draft of planning report. All basic issues resolved.

April, 1984—Bureau of Reclamation (Washington, D.C.) sends telegram to Billings indicating that proposed project of 474,000 acres is unacceptable due to size and cost. D.C. recommends maxium 290,000 acre of project primarily including aquifer lands.

April, 1984—State and CENDAK representatives submit counter-proposal to Bureau of Reclamation (D.C.) for two-stage project consisting of 300,000 acres in stage I and 174,000 acres in stage II. Proposal calls for continued analysis of stage I while certain drainage questions associated with stage II lands are pursued. Bureau of Reclamation (D.C.) agrees to counter-proposal but directs Billings to submit supplemental plan formulation working document prior to completing planning report based on two-stage development.

May, 1984—Governor Janklow calls for special session of State Legislature to consider abolishing conservancy subdistricts and establishing more effective water development districts. Legislature overwhelmingly approves proposal to create CENDAK and five other water development districts.

July, 1984—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) completes supplemental plan formulation working document and submits it to Washington, D.C. and E&R Center. Billings proceeds with planning report and indicates it will be completed by October, 1984 (one year after originally scheduled).

October, 1984—Bureau of Reclamation (D.C.) and E&R Center indicate supplemental plan formulation working document and draft planing report inadequate. Lack of detailed analysis cited in a number of areas (drainage, water quality, mitigation), although such analysis was intended under second phase of two-stage planning process. Also, D.C. objects to customized procedures for claiming certain livestock benefits, although such benefits were identified in original PFWD approved by D.C. in July, 1983.

November, 1984—Bureau of Reclamation (Billings) indicates April, 1985 earliest possible completion of planning report based on new comments from E&R Center and D.C.

November, 1984—State Board of Water and Natural Resources approves $500,000 study loan to CENDAK for continued feasibility investigation.

November, 1984—Voters elect new representatives to serve on recently established water development districts.

January, 1985—New water development districts hold first organizational meetings to set budgets and work programs.

January, 1985—CENDAK prepares and has state legislation introduced to establish irrigation district with authority to contract and finance project development.

LAKE ANDES-WAGNER CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

1959 to 1966—Bureau of Reclamation evaluates the Lower James-Ft. Randall area and identifies the Wagner Unit as acceptable for flood irrigation. Project is opposed locally due to lack of consideration for local concerns and extensive wildlife mitigation.

March, 1969—Frustrated by years of delay, project sponsors organize into an irrigation district in an attempt to organize a project locally.

March, 1974—The State Legislature grants the Lake Andes-Wagner irrigation district $35,000 to initiate a preliminary detailed feasibility analysis.

1975 to 1978—With a positive preliminary analysis the district bonds for $850,000 to develop a feasibility analysis. When requested to vote on financing construction, the project is defeated due to high repayment cost and a lack of Pick-Sloan power rates.

June, 1980—Governor Janklow meets with Secretary Watt. Federal commitment obtained to fulfill Pick-Sloan obligation to South Dakota.

June, 1981—Governor Janklow meets with Interior Assistant Secretary Carruthers. General agreement reached to aggressively pursue state water project priorities.

August, 1981—Bureau of Reclamation reevaluates the Wagner Unit at the request of the state. A 13,500 acre project is proposed. The state and project sponsors indicate this project is too small and request the Bureau to expand the project area.

August, 1981—Governor Janklow delivers Huron water speech outlining state water development program and "Big Ten" water project priorities.

June, 1982—Bureau of Reclamation proposes a project within a 35,000 acre area. A steering committee is formed and within a month 27,800 acres are signed up to be reevaluated.

December, 1982—Steering committee organizes into the Lake Andes-Wagner Water Systems Inc. and the state Board of Water and Natural Resources approves a loan of $300,000 to complete the engineering analysis west of Choteau Creek.

March, 1983—State Legislature approves bill to improve effectiveness of irrigation and other special water use districts.

December, 1983—Bureau of Reclamation and steering committee meet and decide to include lands east of Choteau Creek. An additional $150,000 loan is approved by the state Board of Water and Natural Resources to fund the project study.

April, 1984—Bureau of Reclamation releases the Draft Planning Report/Draft Environmental Impact Statement for lands west of Choteau Creek. A supplement for the lands east of Choteau Creek is released about 3 months later.

May, 1984—Governor Janklow calls for special session of State Legislature to consider abolishing conservancy subdistricts and establishing more effective water development districts. State Legislature overwhelmingly approves proposal to create Southern Missouri and five other water development districts.

September, 1984—A final loan of $50,000 is secured from the state Board of Water and Natural Resources to complete the project study.

November, 1984—The Planning Report/Draft Environmental Impact Statement in final form is released and forwarded for review as the Proposed Regional Directors Report.

November, 1984—Voters elect new representatives to serve on recently established water development districts.

January, 1985—New water development districts hold first organizational meeting to set budgets and work programs.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, the Governor's letter proves the strong local support these projects have, and it effectively argues that the Federal Government must act now. I cannot stress enough how vital these irrigation projects are to the stabilization of my State's economy and the development of its natural resources.

I urge each of my colleagues to review Governor Janklow's letter to determine for themselves the type of dedication South Dakota has to the development of its water. I sincerely hope that the Federal Government will match my State's dedication to the development of the Lake Andes-Wagner and CENDAK irrigation projects.●

CHASE WOODHOUSE

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, as we begin to tackle the many important issues facing the 99th Congress, I ask my colleagues in the House and Senate to pause for a moment in remembrance of one of our most esteemed former Members.

Mr. President, recently my home State of Connecticut was saddened by the loss of one of our most prominent public servants, and all of America was saddened by the loss of one of the pioneers in the movement toward women's equality. Her name was Chase Going Woodhouse. Connecticut has always prided itself on being a leader in the movement toward equality for women, Mr. President, and we are especially proud of the women who have served us in Congress, including Claire Booth Luce, the Honorable Ella T. Grasso, and in the 99th Congress, my colleagues NANCY JOHNSON and BARBARA B. KENNELLY. Few have served as well, however, or done as much to better the lives of other women, as Chase Woodhouse. Some of my colleagues remember serving with Chase, who represented Connecticut's Second District with great distinction between 1944 and 1950. Her service to Connecticut, however, went far beyond her work on Capitol Hill. Chase was Connecticut's secretary of the State and served on a variety of State boards and commissions, including the Connecticut Comprehensive Health Planning Council, the New England Committee on Solar Energy, the Connecticut Humanities Council, the State Commission on Housing and New Communities, and the Commission on Connecticut's Future. She also was chairwoman of the Governor's Committee on the Status of Women, and in 1965 she was 1 of 12 women elected as delegates to the Connecticut Constitutional Convention.

In addition to this long record of service, Chase distinguished herself as an educator and a friend of the young. She issued four publications on laws relating to children in Connecticut. She also was a professor of economics at Connecticut College, a senior economist at the U.S. Department of Agriculture and personnel director of Women's College at the University of North Carolina. I feel a great sense of personal loss with the passing of Chase Going Woodhouse, Mr. President. She was a great friend of my family, a great Democrat, and both a teacher and inspiration to me as I began my career in politics. Her attempts to focus attention on the problems of young people and the laws affecting them helped lead me to suggest formation of the Senate children's caucus, which today boasts 27 Members of this body. I valued her friendship and advice, and I will miss both greatly.

We remember Chase, Mr. President, not just because of her many accomplishments, and not just because of the sense of loss her passing brings to so many of us from Connecticut. We remember her for her concern, for her energy, and for the great example she set for us.

A few years before her death, Mr. President, Chase was asked how she managed to combine her successful political and professional careers with the demands of being a wife and mother. Her reply is worth listening to: "I have tried to approach whatever obstacles I have encountered as part of my daily life," she said. "If a problem is set aside as something to be worried about, rather than something to be dealt with, then worry itself becomes an obstacle."

I hope we remember those words, Mr. President, and the woman who spoke them, as we wrestle with the many important issues before us in the 99th Congress.●

HOME OUTDOOR ANTENNAS AND LOCAL ZONING RULES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on January 3, I introduced two resolutions, Senate Resolution 35 and Senate Resolution 36, setting out standards which I hope the Federal Communications Commission will adopt concerning local regulation of the installation of home outdoor communication antennas. What I have sought to do is to strike a balance between the interest of individual citizens who desire to install personal communication antennas and the legitimate interests of local governments in regulating local matters, consistent with Federal policy enunciated in the first amendment and national communications laws.

The standards set forth in the resolutions are rather simple. First, a local rule must not discriminate among different types of antennas. Second, a local rule shall not be anticompetitive. Third, if the local regulation meets the two previous standards, it is valid if necessary to accomplish a compelling governmental purpose, and by necessary I mean that there is no reasonable alternative.

Today I will discuss the background of the subject at greater length than I had time to do in my explanatory statement of January 3. FCC action is necessary because of an increasing trend in some communities to effectively prohibit their citizens from receiving news, public affairs, and entertainment programming through over the air services such as broadcast and satellite. Moreover, the same restrictions all too often prevent proper operation of amateur, citizen band, and other personal transmitting or receiving equipment. These results arise from zoning restrictions banning outdoor antennas.

Mr. President, I have long experience in the matter of erecting and using antennas. I can assure my colleagues from personal knowledge that outside antennas are absolutely necessary to tune into ham radio signals, more distant broadcast signals, and satellite signals.

One of the purposes to which I have put some of my antennas was to connect hundreds of thousands of our troops in Asia with their families back home by patching short-wave radio signals into the phone lines at my amateur stations. This would have been impossible without outside antennas. Stringent ordinances would have denied comfort to many military families.

Similarly, amateur radio operators around the country routinely use their equipment to carry out communications which benefit the public at large. They do this voluntarily at no charge. Recent experiments have even tested using amateur radio circuits to temporarily replace telephone circuits during an emergency. But ham operators are not going to be around when needed during an emergency, if they cannot install the antennas essential to their training and mission.

Although I have the deepest concern for the powers of State and local governments and the vitality of the Federal system, I am troubled to see the apparent lack of understanding within many localities of the rights of individual citizens and national communications policy intended to foster competition among the electronic media services and adequately provide for personal and safety uses of radio.

LOCAL ZONING POWERS

Now, I will be the first to recognize that local communities and States have the right to carry out beneficial purposes through use of their zoning and other regulatory powers. For example, last year in a case concerning an ordinance restricting placement of political signs on public utilities poles, the U.S. Supreme Court held that local regulatory power can be exercised for esthetic purposes so long as the ordinance is not designed to suppress communication protected by the first amendment and that equally effective alternative means of communication exist. City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 104 S. Ct. 2118 (1984).

Also, localities possess authority to issue traditional safety rules imposed under local police power, such as a requirement that a home antenna meet a roof's load factor specifications so it would not be torn off in the first windstorm. In other words, I am not proposing that the Federal Government totally preempt local powers. Each local community and neighborhood has legitimate interests in securing the welfare of its locality.

There is a middle ground, between prohibiting all outside antennas everywhere in the community and allowing any kind or size of antenna anywhere. Reasonable height, screening and safety or esthetic concerns, applied on a narrow and nondiscriminatory basis, are substantial interests which a community has a right to preserve. Of course, these concerns should be actual and not be asserted as a clock for anticompetitive reasons. Also, the ordinances concerned should allow for reasonable variances.

Even the esthetic purpose doctrine is not unlimited. Unlike the home antenna situation, no national communications law applied in the recent Supreme Court case. Here, there is a new section 705 of the Communications Act which specifically secures the right of home Earth station operators to view unscrambled signals for their personal viewing and there is a long line of FCC decisions related to communications services. These prevailing national interests cannot be thwarted by localities.

FIRST AMENDMENT INTERESTS

Mr. President, prohibition or impairment of participation by citizens in national communications services directly implicates both the constitutional right of access to information guaranteed by the first amendment and recent Federal policies to encourage competition in the electronic delivery of news and entertainment programs to the public.

The first amendment interests are clearly acknowledged in two seminal Supreme Court cases: Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1 (1945), and Red Lion Broadcasting v. F.C.C., 395 U.S. 367 (1969). In the Associated Press case the Court's opinion emphasizes that the "first amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic groups is essential to the welfare of the public." In Red Lion Broadcasting the Court expounded upon the first amendment right of individuals to receive information by radio, which it viewed as a necessary corollary to the right of speakers to disseminate information.

Congress has consistently sought to promote these constitutional rights by encouraging competition in the delivery of information and programs to the public. For example, last year we enacted a comprehensive cable bill, Public Law 98-549, which includes a provision (codified at 47 U.S.C. § 623) deregulating rates where "effective competition" exists between cable and other comparable services. As I mentioned earlier, another provision of the same law authorizes the sale and use of backyard satellite Earth stations to receive unscrambled signals (47 U.S.C. § 705[b]-[e]). In 1983 we enacted a new section 7 of the Communications Act (47 U.S.C. § 157) to clarify the Federal policy of encouraging the provision of new technologies and services to the public and to provide procedures to make sure this policy is carried out.

It is essential to establish that these constitutional rights and Federal policies cannot be ignored and effectively overruled when local communities enact zoning ordinances. I am particularly concerned about the effect of indirect local prohibition or limitation upon the following services.

BACKYARD SATELLITE RECEPTION

There are now over 1 million backyard satellite receivers in use with another 60,000 being sold each month. Last year, by section 5 of Public Law 98-549, we established a Federal right for the use of such receivers to tune into the unscrambled programming being relayed by satellite. This right is conditioned only by the requirement that appropriate fees be paid for use of the programming when negotiated marketing system may be established.

Backyard receivers permit individuals in rural and noncable areas to receive programming which is available to citizens living in cable areas. These receivers also provide individuals in cable areas an alternative to cable service, and thus constitute one of the competing sources to cable envisaged by the rate deregulation provisions of the Cable Communications Policy Act, noted above. If dishes are banned, rather than reasonably regulated, the Federal policy to promote alternative information sources is irreparably damaged.

SATELLITE MASTER ANTENNA SERVICES [SMATV]

SMATV most commonly provides programming to persons who live in apartments and condominiums. A satellite receiving station is established and the program signals fed to private residences without crossing public streets. Each SMATV system is, in effect, a small scale cable system located completely on private property. As in the case of the backyard satellite dishes, prohibiting reasonable location of satellite dishes also eliminates the possibility of SMATV service, and damages our national policy of promoting competitive services.

DIRECT BROADCAST SATELLITE SERVICE [DBS]

The DBS service envisages use of high power satellite transponders to transmit programs directly to homes. The higher transmission power makes use of 3 or 4 foot receiving dishes possible. Backyard dishes, built to receive the weaker common carriers satellite signals, are typically 8 to 15 feet in diameter.

One company, United Satellite Communications, Inc., is already providing an interim DBS service using medium powered satellite transponders. This company raised these issues in a petition to the FCC, File No. DS-293, to consider the effect of local zoning laws on this service and, among other things, alleged that at least one particular community banned all satellite dishes specifically to eliminate competition with the city-approved cable system.

MULTICHANNEL MICROWAVE DISTRIBUTION SERVICE [MMDS]

One of the new services recently authorized by the FCC, MMDS, also colloquially referred to as "wireless cable," envisages the transmission of multiple channels of programming to subscribers over microwave channels. Because of the frequencies involved, outside antennas are essential to reception of these signals. As in the case of the satellite services, use of this service will be impossible unless reasonable accommodations are made which permit outside antennas.

BROADCAST TELEVISION

Congress has long sought to establish comparability between VHF and UHF television. In 1962 we enacted

Public Law 87-529 (47 U.S.C. § 330) to statutorily implement this policy by requiring that all television sets be capable of receiving both the VHF and UHF channels.

This proved insufficient. In 1978 Congress directed the establishment of a UHF Comparability Task Force to come up with suggestions on how to reach the goal of UHF and VHF comparability. In 1980 this task force reported to us that its major suggestion is for consumers to install adequate UHF receiving antennas outside their homes. It was determined that this was the most cost efficient and effective method to improve UHF reception and thereby increase the public's access to competing sources of information and entertainment programming.

Local bans upon placement of all outside antennas prevent these recommendations from being followed in some communities and prevent the Federal policy from being effectuated. In some areas VHF antennas outside the home are also required for adequate reception. The problem is the VHF signals often can be received adequately for distances up to 40 miles with an inside antenna, but UHF signals often have a comparable range of only 15 or 20 miles. Antenna bans in suburban neighborhoods therefore result in disparity between VHF and UHF reception, since in many of these areas VHF reception with an inside antenna is adequate but UHF reception is not.

AMATEUR RADIO AND THE MILITARY AFFILIATED RADIO SYSTEM [MARS]

Radio amateurs are trained in electronics and radio procedures. They are licensed by the FCC to provide public service and emergency communications which benefit the citizens of the communities in which they are located and the Nation as a whole. Amateurs have proven their value on countless occasions because of their technical ability to assemble and operate radio stations of extremely high efficiency and reliability.

Local civil defense and municipal emergency offices routinely utilize cadres of amateurs to provide communications in local and wide-area emergencies. The cost would be prohibitive if governments had to provide the level of services provided free of charge by amateurs.

The military services have organized volunteer amateur radio operators into the Military Affiliated Radio System, or "MARS," in recognition of their unique abilities and the need that may arise for such expertise with little advance warning. The MARS operators voluntarily participate in training exercises and stand ready to assist our military forces when and where needed.

Our national communications policy consistently has been to encourage the self-training in radio techniques which is the basis of the amateur radio service. The local community and our Nation benefit by having these persons ready and willing to provide emergency and public service communications. These activities are carried on daily.

Unreasonable bans on outside antennas too often prevent effective amateur worldwide communications. The longstanding and consistent Federal policy of encouraging this service is undermined by local zoning laws which indirectly prohibit establishment of a reasonably effective amateur or amateur-military station.

CITIZENS' BAND RADIO

CB is an unlicensed low-cost authorized service which permits individuals to maintain contact with their business associates, family, and friends over ranges of up to 40 or so miles. CB radios can be used in automobiles and on tractors to permit communications which otherwise would not be possible.

Because of its widespread availability and use, CB also is extensively used to report highway accidents and perform other emergency communications services. The public benefits from the CB service, yet dependable use requires an outside home antenna.

CONCLUSION

The purpose of the two resolutions I have introduced is to advocate accommodation of both national communications policies and local zoning policies. Each particular over-the-air communications service requires use of outside antennas in order to establish the communication envisaged by the Federal policies involved.

When dealing with radiowaves, there is one general statement that is almost always true: When it comes to transmission and reception, the bigger and higher properly designed antennas are, the better the signals obtained.

Each community and each home has its own unique aspects. It might be out of character to place a tower or large satellite dish in plain view within a historical district, for example, or in a small city townhouse yard. On the other hand, a dish might be satisfactorily screened and not be seen, even in a historical district, in some instances. In rural areas, on the other hand, any type of antenna may be reasonable.

Because of the myriad of factors, I think that implementation of an inflexible national rule would be unwise. But a declaration of clear standards and a reaffirmation of the Federal interests involved in the authorized communications services, all of which generally require use of outdoor antennas, would go a long way to bringing the relevant facts to the attention of local authorities and resolving numerous local disputes.

One of the apparent problems at the moment is the lack of a clearly articulated or recognized statement of the necessity of outdoor antennas to accomplishment of the Federal purposes implemented through establishment of the various services which use the airwaves. The Federal interest must be considered and provided for, and I am confident that local and State officials will accommodate national concerns as well as local interests when faced with actual situations if a clear statement of the Federal interest is available for their consideration. If not, then more might have to be done.●

ELDRIDGE HUNT: HIS MEMORY WILL LIVE ON

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I do not suppose I have known anyone with a greater love of life than Eldridge Hunt, and he exhibited that love throughout his life by sharing his time, energy, and resources willingly with his family and the people of his community, especially the young people.

Politics and campaigning? For many years Eldridge knew an enthusiasm for things politic that knew no bounds, and he involved himself deeply with candidates that he felt would uphold and protect the interest of the people. I was fortunate enough to be one of those who benefited from his friendship and his dedicated and effective efforts.

C. Eldridge Hunt passed away January 26 at the age of 71 and will be sorely missed by his family and all of us who came to know him for the selfless man that he was. But his love of people and his contributions to their lives will live on.

Eldridge was born November 5, 1913, in Sales City, GA and moved to Florida 65 years ago. He was a resident of Lakeland, my hometown, for the past 25 years.

His survivors include his wife, mother, 6 children, 10 grandchildren, and 2 great grandchildren. Plus, of course, all the community "family" that he shared himself with over the years.

In the fifties Eldridge was accepted into the Masonic Lodge in Bradenton and through this organization and the Sesame Grotto he gave 30 years of devotion and hard work to the youth of Lakeland, particularly in the northern portion of the city.

He tirelessly organized and promoted fundraising events and pressed for county support for a sports complex for the kids. He lived to see his goal accomplished with the completion of the playing fields and support facilities. He has also been responsible for raising funds for youth football equipment for the teams. In recognition, the Polk County Commission formally dedicated the sports complex as the Eldridge Hunt-Charlie Fountain Sports Complex.

Eldridge was a leader in the youth football, soccer, and baseball programs of North Lakeland.

He will be missed—but never forgotten.●

MR. ABSHIRE MAKES PROGRESS IN NATO

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during our absence from the time the last Congress adjourned until now, there has been great progress made in NATO in the understanding between the NATO countries and the United States. Mr. David M. Abshire, our Ambassador to NATO, has accomplished more, I believe, in the short time that he has been there than has been accomplished almost during the entire lifetime of NATO.

As long as we have a strong, understanding, willing group of allies, such as we have in NATO, we have a strong assurance of the continuation of peace in that part of Europe. Ambassador Abshire has written two articles, one appearing in the Washington Post on December 31 of last year and the other in the Wall Street Journal. These are succinct, to the point, and I ask that they be printed at this point in my remarks in the RECORD so that the Members of Congress and other readers of the RECORD can have the benefit of knowing what we have accomplished in NATO.

The articles referred to follow:

NATO: FACING THE FACTS

(By David M. Abshire)

BRUSSELS.—In 1983, "the year of the missile," the European members of NATO were preoccupied successfully with facing down the nuclear blackmail of Soviet SS20 missiles. Too little noticed, this past year, 1984, has turned out to be "the year of conventional forces."

The new attention to conventional capabilities is directly related to fear of nuclear war. Some of this fear finds expression—wrongly, I believe—in calls for nuclear freezes or unilateral nuclear disarmament. Some of it is rooted—rightly—in anxieties that our deterrent depends more on nuclear weapons than it should.

NATO was clearly shaken by the dramatic Senate debate last June over whether the United States should try to force greater defense contributions from its European allies by threatening to withdraw some troops from the continent if the allies did not shore up the conventional aspect of NATO's strategy of flexible response.

The debate was sparked by an amendment offered by Sen. Sam Nunn, and jolted existing NATO efforts that had already placed conventional improvements squarely on the front burner. Earlier this month in Brussels, NATO defense ministers took major steps to improve the reinforcement and sustainability of NATO forces. They approved a budget of $7.8 billion for an infrastructure program that builds airfields, depots, pipelines, communications satellites and so on. This figure means that spending on these facilities will more than double in the next six years.

In a particularly important part of the agreement, funds were pledged to receive and protect reinforcing aircraft sent from the United States in a crisis. This will provide 70 percent of the support requirements for NATO's tactical air reinforcements. The ministers also agreed to expand critical ammunition stocks—a perennial NATO shortcoming.

The West German defense minister was able to report his country had extended its term of national conscription by three months—hardly a popular decision, but a courageous one. For the first time, moreover, the alliance adopted a set of force goals meant to provide compensation by the other allies for possible U.S. deployments outside the NATO area.

Defense ministers heard that by NATO definition the United States, Canada and seven or eight European members this year would increase real defense expenditures by at least 3 percent.

For the longer run, the new NATO secretary general, Lord Carrington, is to organize an effort for improving the alliance conventional deterrent. As part of this effort, the Germans pushed for integrating the new military doctrines, equipment programs and technology initiatives into a framework allowing better planning and procurement policies. An urgent need was recognized to improve transatlantic collaboration in developing and acquiring new arms.

U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger has established a Pentagon committee to foster executive branch coordination in this area, and European defense ministers are supporting the Independent European Program Group, formed to help the allies better coordinate their defense industrial efforts.

Alliance policy makers are aware that these are only the first steps in a long and difficult process. A wide gap remains between the American economic recovery and economic performance in Europe, and between their "high-tech" bases. Resource constraints, contending priorities and political pressures will conspire against NATO's conventional force improvements.

My confidence is strengthened, however, by the quality of the men at the top of NATO. Lord Carrington has provided splendid leadership in his first six months on the job. The defense ministers acclaimed the extension of Gen. Rogers' tour of duty for another two years.

NATO obviously wants to face the facts. It is moving. It has the leadership. It needs the support of the American people and Congress.

NATO: HONING THE GRAND STRATEGY

(By David M. Abshire)

BRUSSELS.—A popular refrain of critics of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is it does not have a comprehensive strategy. After serving as U.S. Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council for more than a year, I would reject this criticism. The alliance does have a strategy—indeed, a grand strategy—and has been actively adjusting it to realities of the 1980s.

This question is especially timely in light of the first official visit to the U.S. by NATO's new secretary general, Lord Carrington. A former foreign and defense secretary of the United Kingdom, Lord Carrington brings impressive skills and experience to his new post. He has signaled a special commitment to strengthening the overall strategy of the alliance.

Grand strategy is not just a military concept. It also encompasses political, economic, and even public affairs elements—all the force that can be brought to bear to achieve the strategy's end. In the West's case, the end is clearly stated in the preamble of the 1949 North Atlantic Treaty, which affirms the allies' determination to unite in a collective defense of the "freedom, common heritage and civilization of their people's." These goals continue today, 35 years later, to be the binding force of the alliance. They motivate allied strategy, which centers on four key factors: political dynamics, military deterrence, resources and public diplomacy.

Political Strategy. Soviet strategy during the drama over deployment of intermediate-range missiles was not only to divide Europe from America but also to divide Europe within itself. Soviet intimidation was equaled only by that displayed during the Cuban missile and Berlin crises. Yet, to the Kremlin's surprise, NATO remained united in defense of peace in freedom.

After the high point of the missile drama, the NATO Council agreed to a proposal by Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans calling for a detailed assessment of the last 17 years of East-West relations—a study that led to the June NATO Foreign Ministers' "Washington Statement on East-West Relations." The allies agreed that in the early years of detente substantial progress was made in reducing tension, spurring trade and expanding the East-West dialogue. However, they concurred that Moscow's relentless arms buildup, aggression in Afghanistan and pressure on Poland have in more recent years caused a serious deterioration in East-West relations. Thus, they say a need to fine-tune political strategy by paying closer attention to requirements of restraint, reciprocity and accountability in a "more realistic and constructive dialogue."

The allies have been actively trying to stimulate the dialogue with the East by advancing a host of new proposals this year—at ongoing negotiations in Stockholm, Vienna and Geneva. In contrast, the Soviets continue to boycott negotiations on nuclear weapons. Nevertheless, when the Soviets do decide to return to the negotiating table, they will find interlocutors prepared to talk.

Deterrence Strategy. NATO is the first great alliance in history ever to have a clear-cut deterrence strategy.

In the wake of sustained debate in the early 1980s on both sides of the Atlantic, it is generally agreed that NATO's strategy of "flexible response" and forward defense remains the best available. That strategy is meant to deter an aggressor from thinking he might gain objectives militarily at an acceptable cost. It requires a credible capability and determination to use nuclear weapons, if necessary, to escalate risks and force the Soviets to reconsider the consequences of aggression. And it demands that the alliance be able to defend itself with conventional force too, so that, should deterrence fail, NATO is not left to choose between nuclear escalation or capitulation.

The principal problem today is that NATO's conventional forces are not strong enough to respond to a Soviet attack. Especially troublesome are serious deficiencies of ammunition stocks. The concern of Sen. Sam Nunn, Democrat from Georgia, in his recent amendment that called for U.S. troop cuts in Europe if the allies do not do more to improve NATO's conventional defenses, as well as the concern in Brussels, is urgently to boost the West's conventional defenses to give it that extra insurance policy for peace. Had NATO maintained balanced conventional forces adequate to conduct a direct forward defense without early threatened use of nuclear weapons (as all the allies agreed to do in approving the current strategy), I don't believe the nuclear nervousness would have developed to the degree it has.

The West is improving sustainability and readiness. Newly-emerged and emerging technologies—through miniaturization, smart weapons and rear-surveillance—offer the opportunity to push back the moment when NATO would have to contemplate use of nuclear weapons.

Resources Strategy. The alliance confronts two challenging economic facts: that improvements in sustainability and new conventional technologies impose competing demands for limited resources; and that European economic recovery lags far behind the U.S. recovery. Europe also has greater structural problems. Nevertheless, NATO has substantial advantages: Its combined gross output is some 2½ times greater and its population some 1½ times larger than that of the Warsaw Pact, which nonetheless outstrips NATO in defense production; and the Western nations are free societies bound by shared values and institutions. What NATO must do more efficiently is bring the West's superior resources to bear on the problem of improving conventional forces at affordable cost.

These facts require a resources strategy that would begin with an agreed assessment of the real military balance and include a conceptual framework into which technological and tactical innovations could coherently fit. It demands improved industrial and armaments cooperation across the Atlantic, and within Europe. Finally, a resources strategy requires public understanding and support for paying the necessary costs of avoiding World War III.

Public Strategy. The Soviets have the short-term convenience but long-term weakness of not having to build domestic political support into their overall strategy. The West's grand strategy must be understood, and supported, by a young generation whose formative political experiences are different from those of NATO's founding fathers; by religious leaders, educators and journalists, who fail us when they oversimplify; and by parliamentarians and political leaders, who have a calling higher than that of seeking easy popularity. In Brussels, NATO is presently engaged in intensified assessments of public perceptions to see what can be done to improve our public strategy.

Simply put, the questions of whether our alliance has a grand strategy and whether we are doing all we can to make it credible are two separate issues. The gap between strategy and performance has permitted critics to charge through with the false accusation of an absence of strategy. My worry is that more malign foes might be tempted to make use of that same gap.●

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, an article by David Hoffman which appeared in the February 3, 1985, edition of the Washington Post clearly and accurately outlines the causes of our deficit problems. Despite the President's rhetoric pointing the finger of blame at Congress for not achieving his campaign promise of a balanced budget by 1984, Mr. Hoffman draws a quite different conclusion. The current deficit is a result of the President's inability to reconcile conflicting priorities. When it proved impossible to simultaneously pursue a defense buildup, a reduction in taxes, and a balanced budget, the President abandoned his commitment to balance the budget. Not only has the balanced budget been taken off the back burner, it has been removed from the stove. The budget the President submitted to Congress this week, containing a deficit of $180 billion for 1986, underscores this fact.

Despite the President's promises to the contrary, the deficit has not melted away with economic growth—and it will not. And the budget cannot be balanced simply by shifting domestic spending cuts to the Department of Defense. It will require responsible action on the part of both the White House and Congress. Less rhetoric and more cooperation are essential if we hope to reduce our massive deficits and prevent the mortgaging of our children's future.

I ask that Mr. Hoffman's article appear in full in the RECORD.

The article follows:

DEFICIT NOT TOP ISSUE FOR REAGAN—PERFORMANCE BELIES PROMISES

(By David Hoffman)

In a 1980 campaign speech, Ronald Reagan attacked President Jimmy Carter for saying he "simply cannot balance the budget, provide for the national security and reduce the high tax load on the American people." Reagan said he could do them all: "I say, 'Stand aside—because we can! And we will!' "

In his radio speech yesterday, Reagan was still using the same themes, calling his next budget "the most exhaustive effort ever made to rein in government's chronic overspending" and saying that it will "stop the excessive growth of government-spending in its tracks" while putting deficits on a "permanent downward path."

But the budget Reagan is to submit Monday will include a $180 billion deficit for next year even if all the spending cuts he wants are approved, and the document does not foresee a balanced budget anytime in his second term.

In his first term, Reagan nearly doubled the national debt; in this one, it will almost certainly top $2 trillion.

Reagan blames Congress for this gap between his promises and his performance.

"All this talk, and during the campaign when I was accused of having never submitted a balanced budget since I'd been here, I wonder how they had the nerve to say that," Reagan said recently. "The president has no right to spend money. The Constitution doesn't give the president the right to spend a nickel. That's up there on the Hill."

But Reagan's decisions over the last four years suggest a different answer:

That the deficit has never been as important to him as his rhetoric would suggest.

Instead, his main objectives have been to lower tax rates and shift national spending priorities away from domestic programs and toward defense.

This order of preferences is well understood among those who have worked closely with Reagan on budget issues since he came to office, and they point to the fiscal 1986 budget he will propose Monday as a textbook example.

Almost every dollar in domestic spending that is shaved from the budget will be replaced by a dollar of new defense spending, and Reagan remains adamantly against tax increases to bring the deficit into a lower range.

Rearrangement of government rather than shrinkage of it has also been a Reagan objective in another way. His combination of tax cuts and spending shifts has created new groups of winners and losers in the population.

Reagan's first-term budget targets were chiefly programs for those at the lower end of the income scale. This year, however, he will shift focus slightly to squeeze the big spending programs that largely benefit the middle class.

His first-term tax cuts, meanwhile, are criticized as having helped mainly the rich, although Reagan denies this, and the tax simplification plan he has promised to propose this year would hurt some favored groups as well.

The record shows that Reagan, for all his warnings over the years about the dangers of deficits, has been one of the biggest-spending presidents in American history. Rather than reduce the government's share of the economy, as he once promised to do and still insists that he will, Reagan has increased it.

Total government spending has reached a peacetime high of nearly 25 percent of the gross national product. Four years ago, in the first budget document he submitted to Congress, Reagan predicted that he would have it under 20 percent by now.

Reagan squeezed domestic spending hard in his first term, and by his budget office's account, Congress approved about half of his requests. But that was not enough to realize his three-cornered promise to balance the budget, cut taxes and rebuild the military. The worst recession since World War II forced the deficit still higher.

When his goals collided, Reagan decided early that the defense buildup and lower taxes were more important than the balanced budget. He grudgingly made some compromises along the way, but the decisions of his first term, and the choice he made for next year's budget, show that they are still his most valued objectives.

Reagan has often insisted that the deficit could be reduced if only more cuts were made in domestic spending, particularly to seek out "waste, fraud and abuse."

Yet Reagan spent more time on this budget than any other he has submitted going over it line by line in search of savings from domestic programs. And he will still fall short of the goal set by his staff of slicing the deficit in half, to $100 billion by 1988. Instead, Reagan would be left with a $144 billion deficit that year if all his cuts were enacted.

Yesterday, the rhetoric and posturing on the budget continued as it has for the last four years.

House Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) said Reagan's budget will get "a respectful and complete consideration on Capitol Hill." But O'Neill insisted that Reagan must "go beyond the generalities and tell the American people exactly what he has in mind for them."

Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) promised, after a briefing from Office of Management and Budget Director David A. Stockman, to put the budget on a fast track, starting hearings next week with the goal of having a bill on the Senate floor before March.

Stockman said the "initial reading" he had from Senate GPO leaders is that "a great majority of the freezes and cuts that we have in the budget will be acceptable." Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) warned, "The time is now to decide whether there are domestic programs that are far too expensive for the public good and for the purpose intended. They will have to be reformed dramatically. If we're not willing to do that, we can stop talking about everything."

If Congress balks at his proposals, Reagan said in a Jan. 26 interview with radio correspondents, "then I've said we'd take our case to the people and explain to the people what it is we're trying to do and why we have to do it."

Yet some of Reagan's aides say privately that there is less to these new budget cuts than administration rhetoric implies. One of the president's senior advisers, speaking on condition that he not be identified, acknowledged that the nation's financial markets no longer expect a "massive deficit reduction" in Reagan's second term.

They realize, he said, that "there is a division in the political system," meaning that Congress will not give the president everything he asks for. But it is not just Congress, he suggested; he said there is a fear in the markets that "the deficits are now so large and the path the budget is on is so worrisome that it may get totally out of control. The system will just lose control, and there will be a quasi—"

He paused, not finishing the word. "A fairly irresponsible financial policy for the long run," he said.

"If we can implement a $50 billion package in '86 that is credible—because what's credible depends on how much screaming there is about it—the markets will conclude that government is taking things away, shutting off some switches and spigots.

"It would be large enough" he said, "to put the budget in a manageable zone" if the economy continues to expand. "It's not an ideal zone. It's going to cause problems of absorption, savings and capital for a long time to come. But at least it takes it out of what I call the danger zone."

This official at one point was publicly predicting, much as the president, that administration policy could produce a balanced budget. Asked why his goals have grown steadily more modest over the years, the official replied, "Well, each year reality gets a little more intractable."

This reality was not evident in Reagan's reelection campaign. He optimistically reassured American voters that the deficit would melt away with economic growth. But after the election, Stockman took to Capitol Hill a chart that told a somewhat different story.

The document showed that, as a percentage of GNP, the current deficit is not shrinking as fast as did previous deficits in recoveries after recessions. In other words, growth was not having the powerful tonic on deficits that Reagan had predicted in his campaign speeches.

For example, the Stockman chart showed that in the recession that hit bottom in 1971, the deficit went up to 2.2 percent of GNP. By the third year of recovery, it had diminished to .5 percent. Likewise, when the recession of 1976 hit bottom, the deficit was 4.5 percent of GNP, then it declined to 1.7 percent by the third year of recovery.

In Reagan's first term, the recession reached bottom with the deficit at 6.4 percent of GNP, but the deficit has declined only slightly during recovery—to 5.7 percent this year and 5.4 percent next year if no action is taken. If all Reagan's proposed budget cuts are adopted, the deficit would still be about 4 percent next year.

As the deficits have mounted, Reagan increasingly has turned his rhetoric to another solution, a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. But that would not take effect in his term; it would leave the hard choices to his successor.

"The constitutional amendment, if adopted, would set a target date, that based on a declining path of deficits, then you could foresee and say: by such and such a date we must achieve a balanced budget, and, from then on, the government spend no more than it takes in," Reagan said in the interview with radio correspondents.

Reagan said he doesn't know what that date will be, but it apparently won't be soon: "You can't now pull the rug out from under people who have maybe directed their business practices or agriculture, things of that kind, and say to them, 'We're pulling the rug out right now. The whole game has changed.' "

THE IMAGE OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, during the recently concluded mid-winter conference of the Maine American Legion and Auxiliary—which was held last month at the Donald V. Henry Post No. 80, in Millinocket, ME—James Witek, assistant director of the National Public Relations Division of the American Legion's National Headquarters in Washington, DC addressed the conference on "The Image of the American Legion."

While Mr. Witek's remarks focus on the American Legion's national image, he accurately recognizes that the State of Maine has one of the American Legion's greatest image makers in Dan Lambert, Maine's American Legion State Adjutant.

Under Dan's leadership, the American Legion and Auxiliary in Maine has been of immense value to me during my service in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. Maine's 155,000 veterans have a tireless, articulate, and effective advocate in Dan Lambert and are fortunate to also be the beneficiaries of the fine public image and effective advocacy of the entire American Legion organization.

I ask that Mr. Witek's excellent address be printed in the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues.

The address follows:

The Image of the Legion

Distinguished guests . . . ladies and gentlemen . . . fellow Legionnaires . . . I was extremely pleased to be invited to your mid-winter conference in this great state of Maine . . . and particularly honored to be asked to be your banquet speaker.

However, when I was asked to speak on the topic of "The Image of the Legion" to this particular audience, I had a very unusual reaction. As you now know from my introduction, I'm an old infantry, ranger, airborne soldier who served two combat tours in Vietnam . . . and I'm fearless. But it scares the hell out of me to get up and give this speech. Not because I don't enjoy talking about the image of The American Legion and normally feel well qualified to do so, but because you have one of the Legion's . . . perhaps the nation's . . . greatest image makers right here in Maine. Dan Lambert not only gets up and talks about image making, but he practices it to perfection day after day . . . year after year. And, as a result, the image of the Legion in Maine is outstanding. Therefore, that somewhat puts me in the position of talking to Moses and his people about a moral code right after Moses received the ten commandments from God.

I know first hand that the image of the Legion in Maine is outstanding because I not only know Dan Lambert quite well, but I read all of your publications and local newspaper clippings and have attended a recent Maine delegation breakfast with your Senators and Congressmen and past national commander Bill Rogers. Also, when I was asked by the legion magazine during the Washington Conference to get some pictures of a sharp, aggressive Vietnam veteran who would be representative of the leadership of the future for the legion, the first person I thought of was your NEC member, Tony Jordan. And Tony kindly obliged. He went out in cold, windy weather in front of our nation's capitol and posed for the pictures the magazine wanted.

Now that we have established that the image of the Legion in Maine is outstanding. I would like to talk about the image of the Legion as a whole . . . what it is . . . how it is developed . . . and what all of us can do about improving it.

Overall, the image of the Legion is very good. But it does vary from place to place and among various individuals and groups.

Before getting into some specifics of the image of the Legion, let's examine what we mean by the term "image" and how it is developed.

As you know from my introduction, I am the Deputy Director of Public Relations for the Legion . . . and I'm speaking about the image of the Legion; therefore, it naturally flows, that the two are closely related.

So that we're thinking along the same lines, I would like to give my definition of public relations. The reason for doing so is that if you ask five people for their definition of public relations, you will get five different answers. And, incidently, there even are different definitions among public relations practitioners.

Many people think public relations and publicity are synonymous. But publicity is just one of the facets of an overall public relations operation. Public relations includes much more.

Let us define public relations, as it pertains to The American Legion, as the planned effort to create understanding, favor and support for the Legion's programs and objectives among members, the media and the general public. In essence, the function of public relations is to build and maintain a positive image of The American Legion . . . it is "image making."

Public relations includes anticipating benefits for both the community and the Legion that might result from its various programs, getting support for these programs, planning them, publicizing them and evaluating them. The key element is that the programs serve the public interest.

If they do serve the public interest and are carried out properly, the Legion will have a positive image. If not, the Legion will have a negative image.

Needless to say, the Legion wants a positive image. So, let's look at some of the things that are needed to attain a positive image.

As you are aware, every organization has a particular image. Whether it is the Legion, Congress or large business firms, that image is based on the character, the integrity and the total performance of the organization. It consists of every contact that the organization has with its various publics. It is a composite of:

The organization's history in dealing with people;

Internal attitude toward members;

External attitude toward community responsibility and involvement;

Press releases and other dealings with the media;

Publications for members;

Organizational logo;

Institutional advertising.

The familiarity ad reputation of its name is one of the greatest assets of any organization. The prominence of a name indicates success because a good reputation can rarely be won without true accomplishments. (Use some examples)

An organization's image determines the "climate" of receptivity toward all its messages—making them more or less effective than their intrinsic merit would warrant. In other words, people will respond favorably to what you have to say if you have a good image. They will respond negatively to the same message if you have a bad image. Therefore, it is essential that the Legion has a good image to accomplish its programs and objectives.

As I mentioned earlier, overall, the image of the Legion is very good. Keeping in mind that to have a good image, the organization must serve the public interest, let's look at a few points about the Legion.

The Legion is a service organization. Its members served their country during national emergencies. Now they serve their comrades who need help, and they serve their communities. They also continue to serve their country by advocating and supporting policies and programs that preserve America's independence and freedoms.

Thus the Legion meets the requirement of serving the public interest. It has been successful over the years in its service programs because the Legion has been able to maintain a large membership with many volunteers who raise money and accumulate resources for thousands of worthwhile projects.

However, the image of the Legion may vary somewhat from place to place and person to person. "The Amercian Legion" is a very large organization that means different things to different people, depending on the extent of contact they have had with the Legion—either personally or through the media. Some of that contact may be at the National or Department level, but most is at the Post or community level.

Depending on their personal experiences and what they read and hear about the Legion, people have different perceptions of The American Legion. To some the Legion is the nation's largest veterans organization dedicated to serving and protecting the rights of all veterans; to others it is noted for its numerous volunteer community efforts on various Americanism and Children and Youth programs. Unfortunately, to some it is primarily a social organization known for its "beer and bingo." The social aspects are not entirely negative, because they help to develop "camaraderie" and facilitate the planning and execution of the volunteer service programs and these should be emphasized.

Even though the overall image of the Legion is very good, there always is room for improvement. And maintaining a good image requires a continuous public relations effort.

And this brings us to the heart of the issue of improving the image of the Legion—who does it and how it is done.

Each one of the 2.6 million members of The American Legion is involved in public relations and thus in "image making." Everything an individual member, post, department or national headquarters does says something about the Legion to someone.

As each member talks to his friends and neighbors about the Legion and some of its activities, he or she is forming an image of the Legion in the mind of that person. As each member or person in a leadership position talks to a newspaper, radio or television reporter or editor, he or she is forming an image in the mind of that reporter or editor that will be relayed to hundreds, or perhaps thousands of people.

Therefore, it is important that each member know as much as possible about the Legion—what it stands for, what programs it is involved in and all of the good the Legion does for each community and for the entire nation. It is even more important for Legionnaires in leadership positions to be as informed as possible on Legion programs and policies because they must keep the membership up-to-date and, more likely than not, they will be the spokesmen for the Legion with the media.

There are a variety of publications available to help you keep informed about the Legion—its history, programs and current policies and activities.

Each member receives a copy of the American Legion magazine and each post receives a copy of the American Legion News Service, which in its current format using heavy gloss paper can be displayed at the post or included in the post or department newsletter or newspaper.

Also available are Advance, The Adjutant's Newsletter, Speakers Guide, and Fact Sheets containing information about the Legion programs and the Legion position on current issues. Each division also publishes a monthly or bimonthly newsletter that contains more detailed information about particular programs.

All of these help you keep informed so you can talk more intelligently about the Legion and help build that positive image that we all want.

I've mentioned how the individual members and leaders at local and department level can help build or maintain that positive image; now let's look at the image of the legion at the national level.

The image of the Legion at the national level really is a composite of what the national headquarters, the departments, the posts and the individual members do or say.

Both the national headquarters in Indianapolis and in Washington, D.C., have a very good image. Much of that is because the national staff contains many dedicated professionals who develop and execute sound programs at the national level and make the necessary information available to Legionnaires at all levels to enable them to develop and execute their programs at the local level.

The National Commander and the staff in Washington have helped develop a particularly favorable image with the White House, Congress, Department of State, Department of Defense, the Veterans Administration and other agencies. The National Commander meets on a regular basis with President Reagan and his security advisors, Secretary of State Schulz and his assistants, Secretary of Defense Weinberger and the service secretaries and chiefs of staff to keep abreast of late-developing world events. The dialogue with Harry Walters of the VA is a continuous one.

Representatives in the White House, Congress and various agencies have said on numerous occasions that they respect the opinions and seek the advice of The American Legion more than any other veterans organization because we research each issue thoroughly and present a sound, logical argument for our position on all issues. This, however, has at times been a disadvantage with the media because the loud, sharp attacks by some organizations provide more provocative quotations for the media and therefore they got more publicity at times than the legion. But, I'm not sure that type of publicity really provided the type of image those organizations would like to have.

Fortunately, the majority of the media provides responsible journalism and within the past year the Legion has been the organization sought out for its position on majority issues as budget cuts, care of the aging veteran and the plight of the Vietnam veterans.

Although the overall image of the Legion is very good, it could be much better. We do get our share of bad publicity when an individual or a post goofs up, but these are few and far between. Unfortunately, it seems that one bad incident wipes out 100 good accomplishments.

Therefore, we must strive to avoid the incidents . . . and more importantly keep informed about the Legion activities so we can tell our friends and neighbors and the media about all the good the Legion does.

Just remember that there are no overnight public relations miracles. Good public relations—"image building"—requires continuous effort.

Thank you.●

WAR IN AFGHANISTAN

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today I am placing in the RECORD the introduction from "A Report From Helsinki Watch, Tears, Blood and Cries." This report makes clear the abominable state of human rights today in Afghanistan. As part of an overall Soviet strategy, innocent civilians are being murdered on a mass scale, agricultural capacity and food stocks are being destroyed, and massive repression of thought, word, and deed is taking place.

Without the attention and support of the free world, starting with each one of us, the brave freedom fighters in Afghanistan will soon face the destruction of their heritage, their homes, and their lives.

I commend you to this introduction to "Tears, Blood and Cries," and to the full report, which I would be happy to provide to any of my colleagues who would like to read it.

I ask consent to insert the following material in the RECORD.

The material follows:

A REPORT FROM HELSINKI WATCH, TEARS, BLOOD AND CRIES

I. INTRODUCTION

"A whole nation is dying. People should know." This terse, direct statement befitted the speaker—Engineer Mohammad Eshaq, a resistance leader from Afghanistan's Panjsher Valley, a man of strong convictions and determination. Yet his eyes clouded over with tears when he told us about the fate of two men from his ancestral village of Mata—brothers, aged 90 and 95. Old and blind, they stayed behind when the rest of the villagers fled during last spring's offensive: "The Russians came, tied dynamite to their backs and blew them up." He paused to collect himself, then added simply: "They were very respected people."

For five years now, in their remote, mountainous land in the center of Asia, the people of Afghanistan have been defending their independence, their culture and their very existence in a desperate battle with one of the world's great superpowers. Yet the inherent drama of such a confrontation does not appear to have captured the world's imagination. News from Afghanistan has been scarce.

There are many reasons for this. The Afghan government has officially closed its doors to most of the major world media and to international humanitarian organizations, and the information it releases is dictated by the needs of official propaganda. The Pakistan-based Afghan resistance Parties, on the other hand, are hardly objective sources of information and are often at odds with each other as well. Independent investigation requires entering the country illegally from Pakistan, trekking for weeks over forbidding terrain and braving the dangers of a war without fronts. The largest group of victims consists of uneducated people, immersed in their own traditions, with no idea of how to tell their story to a foreign world.

What little news we receive comes from a handful of intrepid scholars, doctors and journalists who have taken the risk of "going inside," usually under the aegis of one of the resistance groups. Their reports, covering a variety of aspects of the Afghan conflict, have included numerous accounts of atrocities and other human rights abuses since the Soviet invasion of December 1979.

In September 1984, we went to the Afghan border—to Peshawar in Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province, and to Quetta in Baluchistan—to collect information about human rights violations in Afghanistan by interviewing some of the Afghan people who have sought refuge there. We had already interviewed Afghan refugees in the United States and Paris and had read extensively in preparation for our trip. Nothing, however, prepared us for what we were to see and experience in Peshawar.

The vast scale of the exodus—an estimated 4-5 million refugees in Pakistan and Iran, representing one quarter to one third of Afghanistan's prewar population—is immediately apparent in Peshawar, where the largest concentration of the more than 3 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan has settled. It is hard to imagine what Peshawar—always a colorful frontier town at the entrance to the Khyber Pass into Afghanistan—was like before this transfiguring, heartbreaking influx.

Everywhere there were Afghans, most of them Pashtuns who have the same language and appearance as the Pakistanis of the Northwest Frontier Province, but who are ill-suited to the passive life of the refugee. On the whole, they have not assimilated into Pakistani life. They are waiting—the women and children seeking food and shelter, the men seeking arms and support. Their goal is to return to Afghanistan, the only country they have known.

The refugees arrive in a steady procession. They come on foot over the mountains on journeys that often take a month or more. Their children and possessions are carried by horses, mules or camels; their caravans are helpless targets for Soviet bombers and helicopter gunships. They come from every province in Afghanistan, every walk of life. Some have settled in the refugee camps around Peshawar. Others, wounded by bombs, mines, shellfire or gunshots, are being treated in hospitals. Some have found homes and a purpose in Peshawar, working with one of the many Afghan political parties based there or with one of the relief organizations that are trying heroically to cope with the crisis. But most are just waiting, lost and unhappy, bewildered by the unexpected devastation of their lives and by what they have experienced.

We interviewed more than 100 Afghans representing a cross-section of Afghan society, old and young, men, women and children. We met with educated people from Kabul—professors, doctors, teachers, students, lawyers, former government officials—and with Afghanistan's leading poet in the Persian language, Ustad (master) Khalilullah Khalili. We spoke with villagers—farmers, shepherds, nomads—driven from their land. We visited hospitals where we met paraplegics and amputees, victims of anti-personnel mines left behind by retreating Soviet and Afghan forces or of the camouflaged plastic "butterfly" mines that are dropped from helicopters and intended to maim, not kill, the shepherd children and their flocks. We met with political leaders and resistance commanders, including the brother of the legendary Commander Ahmad Shah Massoud of the Panjsher Valley. We interviewed deserters—Soviet soldiers barely out of their teens, themselves victims of an unnecessary war. We even met a defector from the Afghan secret police, who described to us the inner workings of the KHAD (the Afghan secret police).

From our interviews, it soon became clear that just about every conceivable human rights violation is occurring in Afghanistan, and on an enormous scale. The crimes of indiscriminate warfare are combined with the worst excesses of unbridled state-sanctioned violence against civilians. The ruthless savagery in the countryside is matched by the subjection of a terrorized urban population to arbitrary arrest, torture, imprisonment and execution. Totalitarian controls are being imposed on institutions and the press. The universities and all other aspects of Afghan cultural life are being systematically "Sovietized."

It also became clear that Soviet personnel have been taking an increasingly active role in the Afghan government's oppression of its citizens. Soviet officers are not just serving as "advisors" to Afghan KHAD agents who administer torture—routinely and savagely—in detention centers and prisons; according to reports we received there are Soviets who participate directly in interrogation and torture. Moreover, the uncertain loyalties of the Afghans recruited into the army have apparently forced Soviet soldiers to take an aggressive military role. The Soviets have taken the lead in air and ground attacks on Afghan villages, looting, terrorizing and randomly killing Afghan civilians—including women and children—in a variety of unspeakable ways.

Just about every Afghan has a story to tell. Our interpreters, our guides, people we met accidentally, had personally experienced atrocities as great as those of the "victims" we interviewed. An Afghan doctor who had impressed us with his gentle kindness as he interpreted for us in a hospital for war victims had a sudden outburst as we were leaving. "What's the point of all this? People should know by now. There are no human rights in Afghanistan. They burn people easier than wood!" He went on to tell us that he had lost 42 members of his family under the present regime and had just learned that two had been burned alive a few weeks before.

Stopping one day on an impulse, we talked to a group of refugees camped by the side of the road, peasants who had arrived that morning from Ningrahar and Kunduz Provinces. The stories they told were stories that we were to hear over and over again: "The Russians bombed our village. Then the soldiers came. They killed women and children. They burned the wheat. They killed animals—cows, sheep, chickens. They took our food, put poison in the flour, stole our watches, jewelry and money." Two young women, encountered at random, had each lost five children in a recent attack. One of them, who had also lost her parents and sister, displayed the burns from bombings on the limbs of her remaining children, the three youngest, whom she had managed to take with her as she fled from her house when the troops arrived. "I don't know how the days become nights and the nights become days," she lamented, her eyes flashing in anger and desperation. "I've lost my five children. Russian soldiers do these things to me."

The strategy of the Soviets and the Afghan government has been to spread terror in the countryside so that villagers will either be afraid to assist the resistance fighters who depend on them for food and shelter or will be forced to leave. The hundreds of refugee families crossing the border daily are fleeing from this terror—from wanton slayings, reprisal killings and the indiscriminate destruction of their homes, crops and possessions. We were told of brutal acts of violence by Soviet and Afghan forces: civilians burned alive, dynamited, beheaded; bound men forced to lie down on the road to be crushed by Soviet tanks; grenades thrown into rooms where women and children have been told to wait.

While the terror has indeed desolated much of the countryside, it has failed to crush the resistance. None of the villagers with whom we spoke blamed the mujahedin for their troubles. How could they? The mujahedin are their husbands, sons, fathers, brothers. The resistance and the civilian population are inextricably entwined. "We need our people," a resistance commander told us. "But we are also responsible for them."

During our visit we received evidence indicating that the Soviet and Afghan governments are changing their strategy and now seem intent upon ending the exodus to Pakistan. Perhaps they are alarmed by the huge refugee population in Pakistan and the international attention it must inevitably attract. Certainly they are concerned by the support that the resistance finds in Pakistan—a chance to rest, organize, rearm and reenter, sometimes with foreign press, for the Afghan resistance has grasped the importance of the press in enlisting public support. We received reports that refugees on their way to Pakistan have been arrested by the Afghan militia or the KHAD, who turn them back, herding them towards their devastated villages or to the cities, already swollen with more than a million internal refugees. Those who persist in the trek to Pakistan increasingly risk attacks by bombers or the dreaded helicopter gunships. Along the arduous mountain trails used by refugee caravans are many tattered flags flying over hastily dug mass graves. We also heard reports that Afghan citizens must now carry identity cards and obtain written permission to travel, and that the authorities are confiscating the homes of those believed to have gone to Pakistan. During our visit, the Afgan Air Force bombed the public market in a Pakistan border town, killing dozens of Afghan refugees and Pakistani civilians, one of an increasing number of such attacks, signaling that Pakistan is no longer a secure refuge.

This tightening of control over civilians remaining in the countryside mirrors the totality of the rule that has been established in the urban centers of Afghanistan. Professionals and academics have been killed, arrested, censored or dismissed. Most of the Afgan intelligentsia is either in prison or in exile. University curriculums require study of the Russian language, Russian history and Marxist-Leninist philosophy. Book publishing and the press are under strict censorship. Tens of thousands of Afghan youths are being sent, sometimes against their will, to study in the USSR. Children of nine and ten are being trained in Pioneer groups to inform on their parents and infiltrate the resistance. State-controlled agents and informers watch every office and classroom. It is estimated that tens of thousands of people are now in Afghan prisons where they have been brutally tortured and subjected to vile conditions.

We interviewed a 21-year-old student who had been released from Pol-e Charkhi Prison in Kabul just two weeks before. His eyes were bloodshot, his body tense, as he nervously fingered his "worry beads" telling us that if we mention his name in print his father and brothers in Kabul "will be finished." After his arrest for distributing "night letters" protesting the Soviet invasion, he was subjected to routine torture—hung by a belt until he almost strangled, beaten until his face was twice its normal size, his hands crushed under the leg of a chair. He described an overcrowded prison cell with no windows, crawling with lice and with only one pot for a toilet. Others told us about prison cells with one toilet serving 500 people. Still others described cells with no bathroom at all, in which prisoners were forced to defecate in the room. Former prisoners told us about electric shocks, nail pulling, lengthy periods of sleep deprivation, standing in cold water and other punishments. Many prisoners have been summarily executed.

Nor are women spared, a source of special torment to Afghan men as well, whose code of honor requires them to shelter and protect their women from the outside world. We heard of mothers who were forced to watch their infants being given electric shocks, and of Afghan men who were held in torture chambers where women were being sexually molested. A young woman who had been tortured in prison described how she and others had been forced to stand in water that had been treated with chemicals that made the skin come off their feet.

We could feel his pain as an Afghan refugee, a former civil engineer from Kabul, described three women who were in the same prison as he: "In the night, many times, we could hear them crying. We did not know why—probably they were tortured. We could hear them crying many times."

Many of the crimes already discussed are violations of the Geneva Conventions. There are others as well, such as the deliberate bombing of hospitals and the summary execution of prisoners of war. While we did not investigate persistent reports of chemical warfare and other illegal weapons, we encountered the belief that the Soviets, at least at the start of the Afghan conflict, may have used Afghanistan as a convenient testing site for banned or experimental weapons.

Given the outrageous policies and practices of the Afghan government and its Soviet allies, it is no wonder that they have refused to allow any form of international inspection. A request by Helsinki Watch to send an official fact-finding mission to Kabul has not been granted. The International Committee of the Red Cross, after two unsuccessful visits to Kabul, has been forced to operate medical facilities from outside Afghanistan, taking wounded refugees from the border to Red Cross hospitals in Pakistan. As of this writing, the Afghan and Soviet governments have not agreed to cooperate with the Special Rapporteur on Afghanistan appointed by the U.N. Human Rights Commission. Only a few carefully selected foreign journalists have been permitted to visit Kabul and their visits have been strictly limited and controlled by the Afghan government. In September Afghan and Soviet authorities served notice on Western journalists investigating the war when Soviet troops seized in ambush a French television reporter, Jacques Abouchar, who had entered Afganistan illegally from Quetta. Referring to those who have been entering Afghanistan from Pakistan, Vitaly S. Smirnov, the Soviet Ambassador to Pakistan, warned that "from now on, the bandits and the so-called journalists acompanying them will be killed. And our units in Afghanistan will help the Afghan forces to do it."

To close the mountains Pakistan-Afghanistan border, if not altogether impossible, will be a monumental undertaking. Yet the Soviets have embarked on this course, not only to prevent the flow of arms to the resistance, but to impose a blackout on news from Afghanistan.

Some of the crimes that they are so desperate to conceal are revealed in this report.

DECEMBER 1984.●

COSPONSORING S. 237, S. 238, AND S. 239

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, once again I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of three important bills strengthening our criminal justice system.

S. 237 provides for a reasonable, good faith exception to the exclusionary rule in line with recent Supreme Court decisions. S. 238 abolishes some of the worst abuses of the habeas corpus process for reviewing State court criminal convictions. S. 239 establishes constitutional procedures for the imposition of capital punishment.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

The greatest benefit of S. 237 will be seen in the area of drug law enforcement and violent crime. A 1982 Justice Department study of the exclusionary rule in California shows that prosecutors rejected approximately 30 percent of all felony drug arrests because of exclusionary rule problems. In its 1983 Report to the Nation on Crime and Justice, the Justice Department states that 45,000 to 55,000 serious criminal cases were dropped because of problems with the exclusionary rule.

S. 237 provides a new rule to determine whether evidence obtained as a result of a search and seizure could be considered in a criminal case. Under this bill, if such evidence is otherwise admissible, it can no longer be excluded if the search and seizure was undertaken in a reasonable and good faith belief that it conformed to the requirements of the fourth amendment.

S. 237 provides, in general, that a showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant is prima facie evidence of the necessary reasonable good faith belief. The only exception is if the warrant is obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation. These provisions enact into statute law last year's Supreme Court decision in United States versus Leon, and extend the new rule to warrantless searches.

I commend the Senate Judiciary Committee for its review of 70 years of experience with the exclusionary rule. The committee is right to point out that this rule is not constitutionally required. It is a court-made rule that Congress is well within its authority to change. The committee has been careful to draft a bill that not only abolishes the worst abuses of the exclusionary rule, but also ensures that the rule will continue to exclude evidence seized illegally and without justification.

HABEAS CORPUS

The time has come to reform the law of habeas corpus. We must ensure that this important right fulfills its constitutional purpose of preventing the miscarriage of justice without frustrating justice.

Since the 1953 Supreme Court decision in Brown versus Allen, habeas corpus has been made routinely available in tens of thousands of cases never envisioned by the framers of the Constitution. At the time the Constitution was adopted, the writ of habeas corpus was used only to obtain an initial judicial determination on the lawfulness of detention. It could not be used, as it usually is today, by convicted criminals seeking additional Federal court reviews of final State court criminal convictions.

This dramatic departure from the original intent of the drafters of the Constitution has produced a serious overloading of court dockets. In 1981, 7,790 applications for habeas corpus were filed in the Federal courts by State prisoners. By 1983, that number had grown to 8,532.

The only thing to commend the vast majority of these cases, to quote Judge Learned Hand, "is the hardihood in supposing they could possibly succeed." The Justice Department reports that only 3 percent of these cases do result in relief of any kind.

To ease some of the burden these cases impose on our criminal justice system, S. 238 imposes a 1-year statute of limitations that would run from the time of the exhaustion of State remedies.

This bill prevents the use of habeas corpus with respect to matters that have been fully and fairly adjudicated in State courts. The benefit of this new provision is that, by enhancing the finality of State criminal adjudications, it will avoid duplication of judicial effort concerning claims that have already been fully and adequately considered.

To discourage frivolous petitions, S. 238 provides that such petitions submitted prior to the exhaustion of State remedies could be denied on the merits by Federal courts. Consideration of claims not raised at the State court level could also be barred so long as the State has already provided an opportunity to review those claims consistent with Federal law. These proposed amendments make similar changes in the law governing applications by Federal prisoners.

The reasons for supporting this legislation were well-stated by the Conference of Chief Judges in 1983. It would be, the judges said:

> A much needed step in restoring public confidence in the fairness and effectiveness of criminal adjudications and, thus, in respect for the criminal law.

I join in the judge's statement that:

> After an effort that has extended over more than a quarter of a century we are hopeful that Congress is at last in a position to enact these important reforms.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The third part of the Judiciary Committee's anticrime package is S. 239, a bill to establish a constitutional procedure for the imposition of capital punishment. This procedure is required by a series of Supreme Court cases starting with Furman versus Georgia in 1972. It is important to note that these cases never said that the death penalty itself is unconstitutional. They merely require legislative guidance before the death penalty can be imposed. S. 239 satisfies this requirement.

This bill authorizes the death penalty for four capital offenses: treason, espionage, offenses resulting in the death of another person, and the attempt to assassinate the President that either injures the President or comes dangerously close to killing the President.

This bill establishes a three-stage process. First, the Government, before the trial, must notify the defendant and the court that it intends to seek the death penalty and must set forth those aggravating factors that justify a sentence of death. Second, at the trial there must be one stage where the judge or jury can consider only the issue of guilt or innocence. Third, at a second stage in the trial, there must be a separate hearing on the question of whether the death penalty should be imposed. This hearing will normally be before the same jury that sat for the trial, or, if both parties agree, before the judge.

The key to this process is the statute's list of aggravating or mitigating factors. The mitigating factors include whether the defendant is less than 18 years old, is subject to serious mental problems or pressures, had a limited involvement in the crime, or was under duress. Aggravating factors will vary depending on the offense. For example, aggravating factors in cases involving murder include: repeated serious violent crimes by the defendant and commission of the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner, or for hire.

One of four threshold circumstances must be proven to exist in homicide cases. The bill provides that the jury must find that the defendant one, intentionally killed the victim; two, intentionally inflicted serious bodily injury that resulted in the death of the victim; three, intentionally participated in an act that he knew, or reasonably should have known, would create a grave risk of death to a person, other than one of the participants in the offense, and the victim died as a direct result of the act; or four, if the offense is an attempt to kill the President, the defendant engaged in conduct that resulted in bodily injury to the President or otherwise came dangerously close to causing the death of the President.

If the jury determines that at least one of these factors exists, it must determine by unanimous verdict, in light of all the evidence, whether the aggravating factors found to exist sufficiently outweigh any mitigating factors, or in the absence of any mitigating factors, whether the aggravating factors are sufficient to justify a sentence of death.

The defendant shall have a right to appeal the sentence of death and this review shall have priority over all other cases. In order to affirm the sentence, the appellate court must determine that the sentence of death was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or other arbitrary factors.

Mr. President, I have taken the time to set forth these details because we must never impose the death sentence lightly. The Constitution requires no less.

However, there are three arguments in favor of the death penalty that do justify its imposition. The first of these is retribution. People who commit capital offenses forfeit their right to life. As a matter of self-preservation, society has the right to impose the death penalty on those who commit the most heinous and intolerable crimes, those that actually threaten the foundations of society itself. As Senator McClellan said 10 years ago:

> What other punishment is "just" for a man, found to be sane, who would stab, strangle, and mutilate eight student nurses?
> What other punishment is "just" for a man who would invade the home of members of a rival religious sect and shoot to death men, women, and children, after forcing a mother to watch as her three young children were drowned before her eyes?
> What other punishment is "just" for a band of social misfits who would invade the homes of people they had never met and hack to death a woman 8½ months pregnant and her guests?

The second argument in favor of the death penalty is that it deters murder and other capital offenses. Although people will probably debate this point forever, the Supreme Court has said in Gregg versus Georgia, "there are carefully contemplated murders—such as murder for hire—where the penalty of death may well enter into a cold calculus" preceding the decision to act.

Finally, there are cases when the penalty of life imprisonment is simply inadequate because there is always the possibility that a particularly dangerous murderer will escape, or kill again in prison.

Murder today is up dramatically from the days before the death penalty laws were struck down. More than 19,000 murders are committed in this country every year.

I would like to use this opportunity to call on the legislature of my own State of New York to join the 37 States that have enacted legislation providing for capital punishment while satisfying the constitutional requirements set forth by the Supreme Court.

Each of these bills has been carefully drafted to ensure its constitutionality. Each is necessary to ensure that our criminal justice system operates more effectively to defend society against violent, career criminals.

Although each of these bills received the overwhelming bipartisan approval of the Senate in the last Congress, the House of Representatives was not given the opportunity to vote on any of them.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to approve these efforts as decisively this year, and to work to persuade the House leadership to submit them to the full House for a vote. If such votes are permitted, I am confident that these bills can become law in the present Congress.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

SENATOR MELCHER'S WELL DESERVED SOIL CONSERVATION AWARD

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, my senior colleague from Montana, Senator JOHN MELCHER, is receiving a well deserved reward today from the National Association of Conservation Districts. The NACD, at its 39th annual awards program, is presenting Senator MELCHER its distinguished service award for his outstanding contributions to soil conservation in this country.

From firsthand knowledge, I know JOHN MELCHER to be one of this Nation's staunchest supporters of American farmers and their right to a fair return for their efforts to provide consumers with a low cost, high nutritional food supply. His efforts are both legion and legendary.

The Nation's farmers and the soil they till are both dear to JOHN MELCHER; he realizes that we must protect both if we are to continue to enjoy an abundant food supply for generations to come. In order to do that, we must protect our soil now. To that end, Senator MELCHER has pledged and dedicated his energies.

It was his tenacious and sustained efforts that kept legislation before the U.S. Senate last year that would curtail sodbusting—the practice of plowing up fragile soil to plant crops. It's a practice that creates barrenness and dust bowl conditions, not one that returns healthy crops from good stewards of our soil.

Senator MELCHER's bill was designed to deny Government benefits to farmers who insist on taking fragile soil and planting it. The bill didn't prohibit them from doing so, but it prohibited them from gaining any Government support if they went ahead and plowed it up. "We're not telling any farmer he cannot cultivate a crop on his own fragile land," he explained at the time. "What we are saying is he can't do it and expect Federal farm program benefits."

And that's a fair approach and typical of how my colleague from Montana works.

Some years ago, one of our State's major newspapers had this to say about Senator MELCHER: "Montana's senior Senator is refreshingly frank. He's not only frank, [he] is also tenacious and sometimes even stubborn. The tenacious strain in MELCHER's nature may be one of the key factors in the American farmer eventually getting on a sound footing."

Yes, JOHN MELCHER does have a stubborn streak in him, and farmers and ranchers throughout our land can be thankful he does. Too often, those of us who represent rural America feel overwhelmed by our urban counterparts who don't seem to understand the importance of keeping farmers in business. It takes a stubborn man to keep up the pressure when something is as important as agriculture policy and practice.

I know that when debate begins again on new farm legislation, JOHN will be there, hanging tough on the issues that mean most to him and to America's heartland.

One of those issues is soil conservation. I can almost guarantee that he will be there with facts and figures to support his opinion that our soil—the Earth from which we get our food—is too precious to neglect.

The NACD has chosen well by naming Senator JOHN MELCHER as its 1985 recipient of their distinguished service award. He joins an equally distinguished roster or past recipients: Senator John Culver of Iowa, Jennings Randolph of West Virginia, and Herman Talmadge of Georgia; Congressmen W.R. Bob Poage of Texas and JAMIE WHITTEN of Mississippi.

Their names loom large on the horizon of this Nation's farming sector and will live long in the annals of U.S. agricultural history.●

WRONG SIDE UP

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, recently my friend George Engelter shared with me a book about his native State of North Dakota. One of the most interesting episodes in this history is a chapter entitled, "Wrong Side Up."

I urge my colleagues to take a moment to read why a Sioux Indian told John Christiansen that it was a mistake to plow the land * * * a mistake to turn the land "wrong side up."

It is the fascinating account of what happened when settlers entered New Salem, North Dakota, made the mistake of plowing the land better left for grazing and how they rectified the error a few years later.

It all happened 100 years ago, Mr. President. But even now some ill-informed farmers are plowing land that is unsuited to cultivation and the worst of it is that the Federal Government actually subsidizes this antisocial activity by offering crop subsidies. Hopefully, before this year is over, Congress will enact the long delayed sodbuster legislation which will withdraw Federal crop support for commodities grown on newly plowed fragile grasslands.

Mr. President, as my colleagues consider this crucial conservation issue, I hope they will take a few minutes to read how the residents of New Salem, ND, learned wise conservation practices a century ago. I ask that the chapter entitled "Wrong Side Up" be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

"WRONG SIDE UP"

A boulder on the south side of Highway 10 east of New Salem bears a bronze plate inscribed:

"Wrong Side Up. These words were spoken to John Christiansen on this spot in the spring of 1883 by a Sioux Indian: John was plowing under the prairie grass. Pondering this phrase made New Salem a successful dairy center."

When he was nineteen, John came from Schleswig-Holstein aboard a freight ship transporting hogs and cattle. "I can smell them stinkin' pigs and steers yet," he recalled when he was 88 and interviewed by the author of this book. He landed in Boston, took a train for St. Louis, Missouri. "But one month in that sweatin' country was plenty for me."

So John went north to Ripon, Wisconsin, and worked on a farm for $14 a month during the growing season. "In winter you was lucky you could get a place to work for your board."

He yearned for a farm of his own, but he realized he would never be able to purchase one with his meager earnings. Wisconsin farm land was then selling at $40 and $50 an acre.

Then he heard that the German Evangelical Church in Chicago was organizing a company of German immigrants to settle a colony in western Dakota Territory. John joined, paying the membership fee of $20 which entitled him to a lot in the proposed town of New Salem and the opportunity to homestead among kindred people.

The colonists, their families and all personal belongings crowded into half a dozen immigrant cars. No Pullman accommodations these, the travelers slept on double bunks of planks.

John, the youngest of the colonists, rode in a freight car with his team of horses, his wagon, hay and oats, food for himself, and property belongings to three friends. At Jamestown, when the train stopped, he bought a breaking plow from a farmer, and tied it to the top of his box car. He arrived in Mandan on April 4, 1883, and continued ahead of the immigrant cars scheduled to arrive a day later.

John's freight train came to a stop at "New Salem"— a town planned and platted by men in Chicago and existing only in the dreams and hopes of its future citizens, a town now of grass greening and pasque flowers lifting lavender cups to the spring sun.

On planks laid across to a cutbank, John led his horses from the car. The train then moved a short distance ahead and dumped the contents of John's car haphazardly on both sides of the track. In a matter of minutes the locomotive wheezed off toward the sun setting beyond the purpling hills.

John and his horses proceeded to the scattered belongings. It was cold. Snow still lay in large drifts in the coulees. Dark clouds came "over the hill where the schoolhouse now stands."

He tied his horses to loose wagon wheels. Darkness settled as he searched in vain for his tent. He sat down at last in a huddle of boxes to find shelter from the chill wind. As he considered that he was alone in the land of the Dakota Indian, he was startled by a staccato of dimsal howls sounding close by.

Recalling tales of the ferocious wolves of Europe, John shuddered and dared not fall asleep. At dawn the immigrant train arrived with the citizens of New Salem. It stopped beside John long enough for his three friends to get off, then steamed ahead to the next siding several miles distant where the immigrant cars were left for an entire day while the NP crew men constructed the New Salem siding.

This done, the immigrant cars were brought back to the new siding and here served as living quarters while the settlers built Immigrant House, 30 by 40 feet. Into this three-room dwelling, everybody moved and soon discovered other new colonists had also come to the prairie. Bedbugs from Minnesota lumber camps had stowed away on the pine boards and timbers.

The colonists next worked together to build a barn for their pastor, the Reverend Henry Gyr. The hayloft served as the clergyman's personal quarters, the first floor sheltered his five horses and one cow. "But the bedbugs, they lived on both floors."

And when, that same year, the first New Salem church was built, the colonists discovered that the imports from Minnesota woods were no heathen tribe, but faithful in observing the Sabbath. "We could see them crawling across the ceiling, coming down the walls."

During the first summer, the colonists scattered about on homesteads, erecting small frame shanties, and the industrious housewives vanquished the bedbugs.

Then a new problem faced the settlers. Water. They found no spring, nor running stream in the vicinity. So with spades the men dug a well 8 feet across and 40 feet deep which gave them a good supply of water.

Meanwhile, John got busy with his breaking plow, turning an acre of sod on each of about fifteen claims. He had the only plow, and earned $5 an acre for his work.

While thus engaged on his own homestead, he saw a strange small caravan coming down the old Keogh Trail. Two Indian families came, transporting their goods by travois.

John had never seen Indians before. When the two Indian fathers approached, John eyed them warily. Then to his surprise, one man said, "How, John!"

Why, this Indian knew his name! John became so excited by this that he answered, "How, John!" to the Indian. He did not know then that John was a customary form of address when an Indian spoke to a white man.

Slowly, with deliberation, the Indian man stooped and began to turn the sod back into its furrow, patting it carefuly into its original place and saying something over and over again in his own language. An Indian boy of about fifteen who had joined the group now translated for John, "He say, 'Wrong side up, wrong side up!' "

The New Salem settlers planted grain upon the acres of prairie turned wrong side up, and seven years of lean followed. Many settlers left in discouragement, and John often thought of what the Indian had said.

Perhaps he was wise, that Indian who knew nothing about white man's farming. Surely, though, he who had roamed the prairie all his life must know the land better than did the immigrant homesteaders.

There was a good crop the eighth year, but other lean years followed. Then the people of New Salem, hearkening to the words of the Indian, considered the grassy hills where the sod still lay right side up, and brought dairy cattle to graze there instead of turning more sod wrong side up. And a new prosperity followed which made New Salem one of the leading dairy centers of North Dakota.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 8:30 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 8:30 p.m. today.

The motion was agreed to, and at 6:28 p.m., the Senate recessed until 8:30 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. DENTON].

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, following the State of the Union Address, it stand in recess until 12 noon on Thursday, February 7, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS PROXMIRE AND BOREN ON TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders tomorrow under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators, for not to exceed 15 minutes each: the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the special orders on tomorrow, there be a period for morning business, not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following morning business tomorrow, it will be the intention of the leadership to turn to any executive or legislative items cleared for action—possibly the nomination of Lee M. Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. It is possible there might be a rollcall vote on that nomination.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FEBRUARY 18, 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. CON. RES. 12

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the Senate adjourns on Thursday, February 7, 1985, or Friday, February 8, 1985, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader, or his designee, in accordance with this resolution, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, February 18, 1985, and that when the House of Representatives adjourns on Thursday, February 7, 1985, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Tuesday, February 19, 1985, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after their respective Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this resolution, whichever occurs first.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever in their opinion the public interest shall warrant it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint a committee on the part of the Senate to join with a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives to escort the President of the United States into the House Chamber at the joint session to receive an address on the State of the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the resolution of the Senate of January 24, 1901, on Monday, February 18, 1985, immediately following the prayer and the disposition of the Journal, the traditional reading of the Washington's Farewell Address take place and that the Chair be authorized to appoint a Senator to perform this task.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Pursuant to the order just granted, the Chair appoints the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] to read the address.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-25)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 8:40 p.m. having arrived, the Senators will proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the joint session; and upon the conclusion of the joint session, the Senate will stand in recess until tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 8:40 p.m., the Senators, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms, Larry E. Smith; the Secretary of the Senate, Jo-Anne L. Coe; the Vice President; and the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND] proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear the address by the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan.

(The address delivered by the President of the United States to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress is printed in the proceedings of the House of Representatives in today's RECORD.)

RECESS

At the conclusion of the joint session of the two Houses, and in accordance with the order previously entered, at 9:43 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, February 7, 1985, at 12 noon.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 6, 1985:

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

William J. Bennett, of North Carolina, to be Secretary of Education.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

John S. Herrington, of California, to be Secretary of Energy.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Donald P. Hodel, of Virginia, to be Secretary of the Interior.

The above nominations were approved subject to the nominees' commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A REALISTIC PERSPECTIVE ON THE STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE FROM MESSRS. BRZEZINSKI, JASTROW, AND KAMPELMAN

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, the former National Security Adviser to President Carter, Dr. Robert Jastrow, founder of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies, and Max M. Kampelman, the recently designated head of the U.S. delegation to the arms control talks with the U.S.S.R., wrote a joint article "Defense in Space Is Not 'Star Wars'" which appeared in the New York Times Magazine on January 27, 1985. This comprehensive article calls for a more rational debate on the strategic defense initiative [SDI], places SDI in the context of realistic technical expectations, and outlines its true value for not only arms control but genuine nuclear weapons reduction. As I noted in an earlier entry, there is a great need for a rational debate on this issue (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, "Star Wars and ASAT: the Need for a Reasoned Debate," E3176-77). The following are excerpts from this most important article provided in the framework of a series of entries which I have made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the SDI from an arms control perspective.

Faith moves mountains. When it is in eternal religious values, faith is an indispensable strength of the human spirit. When it is directed toward political choices, it is often an excuse for an analytic paralysis.

Regrettably, our national debate over President Reagan's suggestion that the country develop a strategic defense against a Soviet nuclear attack is taking on a theological dimension that has no place in a realistic search for a path out of the world's dilemma. The idea of basing our security on the ability to defend ourselves deserves serious consideration. Certainly, the role of strategic defense was a major issue in the recent dialogue in Geneva between United States Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko on new arms-control negotiations.

The authors first underline the uncertainty of continuing to operate under the premises of offensively oriented mutually assured destruction [MAD].

For many years, our search for security has been restricted to designing offensive weapons to deter aggression through fear of reprisals. We must not abandon unclear deterrence until we are convinced that a better means is at hand. But we cannot deny that, for both the Soviet Union and the United States, the costs, insecurities and tensions surrounding this search for newer, more effective and more accurate nuclear missiles produce a profound unease that in itself undermines stability.

The conventional view is that stability in the nuclear age is based on two contradictory pursuits: the acquisition of increasingly efficient nuclear weapons and the negotiation of limits and reductions in such weapons. The United States is diligently pursuing both objectives, but the complexity of arriving at effectual arms-control agreements is becoming apparent as more precise and mobile weapons, with multiple warheads, appear on both sides. Unlike ours, moreover, many Soviet missile silos are reloadable, and thus the number of silos does not indicate the number of missiles, further complicating verification.

They point out that the Soviet strategic forces are overwhelmingly first-strike in nature.

We must never ignore the reality that the overwhelming majority of the Soviet strategic forces is composed of primarily first-strike weaponry. And given the large numbers of first-strike Soviet SS-17, -18 and -19 land-based missiles, no responsible American leader can make decisions about security needs without acknowledging that a Soviet first strike can become a practical option.

The Russians could strike us first by firing the reloadable portion of their nuclear arsenal at our missiles, the Strategic Air Command and nuclear submarine bases, and if the surviving American forces (essentially nuclear submarines) were to respond, the Russians could immediately counter by attacking our cities with missiles from nonreloadable silos and, a few hours later, with whatever of their first-strike reloadable weapons had survived our counterattack. They are set up for launching three salvos to our one.

The authors underline the major issues in strategic defense raised by the SDI.

The result is that weapons technology is shaping an increasingly precarious American-Soviet strategic relationship. For this reason, we urge serious consideration be given to whether some form of Strategic Defense Initiative (S.D.I.) might not be stabilizing, enhancing to deterrence and even helpful to arms control. To that end, we address the major issues in strategic defense from three points of view:

(1) The technical: Is a defense against missiles technically and budgetarily feasible?

(2) The strategic: Is a defense against missiles strategically desirable, Does it enhance or diminish stability? Does it enhance or diminish the prospects for arms control and a nuclear-weapons build-down?

(3) The political: What are the political implications of strategic defense for our own country and for our relations with our allies? What are the implications for the larger dimensions of our relationship with the Soviet Union? How do we seek the needed domestic consensus on a viable strategy?

They outline the present status and dynamics of missile defense technologies.

A great deal has been written about the state of missile-defense technology. Some experts say the technology sought is unattainable, others that it is merely unattainable in this generation. Yet the promise of the Strategic Defense Initiative is real. Some of the technologies are mature and unexotic. Their deployment around the end of this decade would involve mainly engineering development. Technically, these vital defenses could be in place at this moment were it not for the constraints accepted by the United States in its adherence to the antiballistic missile treaty of 1972.

With development and some additional research, we can now construct and deploy a two-layer or double-screen defense, which can be in place by the early 1990's at a cost we estimate to be somewhere in the neighborhood of $60 billion. A conservative estimate of the effectiveness of each layer would be 70 percent. The combined effectiveness of the two layers would be over 90 percent: Less than one Soviet warhead in 10 would reach its target—more than sufficient to discourage Soviet leaders from any thought of achieving a successful first strike.

The following section emphasizes the principal features of a realistic, intermediate-term SDI with no mid-course defensive layer, including estimated costs of a two-layered systems deployment.

The first layer in the two-layer defense system—the "boost-phase" defense—would go into effect as a Soviet first-strike missile, or "booster," carrying multiple warheads rises above the atmosphere at the beginning of its trajectory. This boost-phase defense—based on interception and destruction by nonnuclear projectiles—would depend on satellites for the surveillance of the Soviet missile field and the tracking of missiles as they rise from their silos. These operations could only be carried out from space platforms orbiting over the Soviet Union. Because they are weightless in orbit, such platforms could be protected against attack by heavy armor, onboard weapons and maneuverability.

After the booster has burned out and fallen away, the warheads arc through space on their way to the United States. The second layer of the defense—the terminal defense—comes into play as the warheads descend. Interception would be at considerable altitude, above the atmosphere if possible. This second phase requires further engineering, already under way, because interception above the atmosphere makes it difficult to discriminate between real warheads and decoys. In the interim, interception can take place in the atmosphere, where differences in air drag separate warheads from decoys. In either event, destruction of the warheads would take place at sufficiently high altitudes, above 100,000 feet, so that there would be no ground damage from warheads designed to explode when approached by an intercepting missile.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Of the two layers in the defense, the boost phase is by far the most important. It would prevent the Russians from concentrating their warheads on such high-priority targets as the national-command authority (the chain of command, beginning with the President, for ordering a nuclear strike), key intercontinental-ballistic missile silos or the Trident submarine pens, because they could not predict which booster and which warheads would escape destruction and get through. . . .

The boost-phase defense has still another advantage. It could effectively contend with the menace of the Soviet SS-18's, monster missiles twice the size of the 97.5-ton MX. Each SS-18 carries 10 warheads, but probably could be loaded with up to 30. The Russians could thus add thousands of ICBM warheads to their arsenal at relatively modest cost. With numbers like that, the costs favor the Russians. But a boost-phase defense can eliminate all a missile's warheads at one time—an effective response to the SS-18 problem. . . .

We estimate that the cost of establishing such a boost-phase defense by the early 1990's would be roughly $45 billion. That price tag includes 100 satellites, each holding 150 interceptors—sufficient to counter a mass Soviet attack from all their 1,400 silos; plus four geosynchronous satellites and 10 low-altitude satellites dedicated to surveillance and tracking; plus the cost of facilities for ground-control communications and battle management. . . .

Anyone who has read the recent debate on SDI and the upcoming arms control talks will appreciate the authors' discussion of the psychological barriers to consideration of alternative.

The authors incisively cite the increasing stakes for the United States in having to maintain a MAD posture and the uncertainly of achieving real arms control progress under this doctrine.

This is why there is currently such an emphasis on maintaining peace via the doctrine of deterrence based on mutual assured destruction, called MAD. But what does this mean in an age when weapons are becoming incredibly precise, mobile and difficult to count? In the absence of a miraculous breakthrough in arms control, the only possible protection within the framework of the deterrence approach is to stockpile more offensive systems. That is in part what we are doing. But how many of such systems will be needed in the likely condition of the next decade? If Soviet strategic forces continue to grow both quantitatively and qualitatively, our country will have to deploy, at enormous cost, probably no fewer than 1,500 to 2,000 mobile Midgetmen to preserve deterrance. How will they be deployed? Where? And at what cost? And will the Soviet Union and the United States be more or less secure with the deployment of such precise weaponry capable of effective preemption? The Soviet answer is clear: The Russians are busy enhancing the survivability of their leadership and of their key facilities by hardening, dispersal and deception.

The authors call for a new strategy of Mutual Security is virtually identical to the carefully assured defense [CAD] strategy, which I described in my RECORD entry "The Much Needed Strategic Transition: From Mutually Assured Destruction [MAD] to Carefully Assured Defense [CAD]" (E4337-39).

This second traditional alternative, mutual assured destruction, cannot be an acceptable, long-run option, although it is a necessary policy in the absence of an alternative, given the dynamics of weapons technology. Thus, a new third option, the Strategy of Mutual Security, must be explored as preferable. The combination of defense against space missiles with retaliatory offense in reserve enhances deterrence.

And it does not compromise stability, even if only the United States were initially to have such a strategic defense. The deployment of the systems described above would not give us absolute protection from Soviet retaliation against a possible first strike by us, a reasonable though misplaced Soviet concern. Furthermore, the Russians know we are not deploying first-strike counterforce systems in sufficient numbers to make a first strike by us feasible. In any case, one can be quite certain that the Russians will also be moving to acquire an enhanced strategic defense, even if they do not accept President Reagan's offer to share ours. Indeed, they are doing so now and have been for some time.

They suggest an avenue to ratcheting down offensive forces through incremental SDI deployment as Dr. Alvin Weinberg has also suggested (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD entry "The SDI and Gradual Build Down: a Modest Proposal for Rational Arms Control." (E4425-27).

As our strategic space-defense initiative expands incrementally, it should be realistically possible to scale down our offensive forces. Such a transition, first of the United States and eventually of the Soviet Union, into a genuinely defensive posture, with neither side posing a first-strike threat to the other, would not only be stabilizing but it would also be most helpful to the pursuit of more far-reaching arms-control agreements. Strategic defense would compensate for the inevitable difficulties of verification and for the absence of genuine trust by permitting some risk-taking in such agreements. This is another reason why strategic defense should not be traded in the forthcoming negotiations in return for promises that can be broken at any time.

An excellent summary of the status of the present Soviet anti-ballistic missile [ABM] capability and a history of the oscillating U.S.S.R. positions on ABM is also included.

The three authors follow with the excellent point that too much of the SDI debate has focused on criticisms of the relative probability of achieving a leakproof defense to protect cities without recognizing the deterrent quality of slightly leaky but, nevertheless, effective multitiered system.

They emphasize the refreshing opportunity which SDI presents to replace MAD by mutually assured survival and remind us of the clear responsibilities of the Executive to seek alternatives.

Arms control has been said to be at a dead end, and the stalemate has reflected an impasse in thought and in conception. Our present policy requires both us and the Soviet Union to rely on a theory of mutual annihilation based on a strategic balance of offensive weapons. The American approach has been to depend on deterrence alone and not on defending ourselves from Soviet offensive weapons, while the Russians have made it clear by their actions that they intend to defend themselves against our missiles. In any event, what is clear is that mankind must find ways of lifting itself out of this balance of terror. Mutual assured destruction must be replaced by mutual assured survival. Our safety cannot depend on our having no defense against missiles. The proper role of government is to protect the country from aggression, not merely avenge it. It is astounding that a President should be faulted for seeking a formula and an approach that will protect us from the continual threats and terrors coming from the volatile vagaries of adventurism and miscalculation.

Even if a perfect defense of our population should be impossible to achieve—and none of us can be certain of that—the leaders of our Government have a responsibility to seek defense alternatives designed to complicate and frustrate aggression by our adversaries. The very injection of doubt into their calculations strengthens the prospect of hesitation and deterrence. It may not be possible to destroy the world's ballistic missiles, but if we can return them to the status of a retaliatory deterrent rather than a preemptive strike we will have reduced the need for the existing large arsenal and thereby the threat of war.

The authors also place the SDI in the context of NATO-related issues.

They conclude with their view of the prospects for and benefits of systems deployment.

The concerns [about NATO] may be understandable, but will diminish with time and discussion. First of all, President Reagan's call for strategic defense brought the Russians back to the Geneva negotiating table. More important, however, it will become increasingly evident to our friends, as some of the confusion about the technology dissipates, that the ability of the United States to protect its missiles immeasurably strengthens our power to deter and thereby serves to protect our allies. Indeed, such a system is expected to be at least as effective against the SS-20's aimed at western Europe as it is against ICBM's. Finally, a development pulling the world away from the precipice of nuclear terror goes far to help create an encouraging atmosphere for dialogue and agreement, a vital prerequisite for peace.

In light of the above, we reach two basic conclusions:

(1) Developing a stabilizing, limited two-tier strategic defense capability is desirable and called for by the likely strategic conditions immediately ahead. Such a deployment would be helpful both in the military and in the political dimensions. It is a proper response to the challenge posed by political uncertainties and the dynamics of weapons development. The two-layered defense described here can be deployed by the early 1990's. Americans will rest easier when that limited defense is in place, for it will mean that the prospect of a Soviet first strike is almost nil.

(2) A three- or four-layer defense, using such advanced technologies as the laser now under investigation in the research phase of the Strategic Defense Initiative, may become a reality by the end of the century. If this research shows an advanced system to be practical, its deployment may well boost the efficiency of our defense to a level so close to perfection as to signal a final end to the era of nuclear ballistic missiles. A research program offering such enormous potential gains in our security must be pursued, in spite of the fact that a successful outcome cannot be assured at this juncture.

The current debate is necessary. There are many questions, technical and political, ahead of us. For the debate to be constructive, however, we must overcome the tendency to politicize it on a partisan basis. Our objectives should be to find a way out of the current maze of world terror. The President's initiative toward that end is a major contribution to arms control and stability. The aim of making nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete should be encouraged and not savaged.

I suggest to my colleagues that this article is must reading for any student of strategic defense policy inside or outside of the Congress.●

LAWLESS BEHAVIOR OF THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my outrage at the lawless behavior of the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services [HHS]. Mrs. Heckler has on at least three occasions refused to ban one or more nonnutritive food dyes. These dyes have been shown to cause cancer, yet they remain on the market when safe alternatives are available. Secretary Heckler has no statutory authority to reject valid FDA recommendations. No one has contested the validity of the FDA studies. I have written Mrs. Heckler to demand that she act as the law requires. I ask now that a copy of the letter be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my statement. Madame Secretary, why have you wantonly refused to enforce the law?

In 1960 Congress passed legislation requiring the FDA to investigate the safety of food dyes then on the market. Both the House and the Senate agreed that food dyes have no nutritive value. Therefore, if a dye were found to cause any harm, it was to be banned. In other words, food dyes were determined by Congress to provide no benefit which could outweigh any possible health risks. Thus, if a dye were found to cause cancer in man or animal, the FDA was to inform HHS which was to issue the appropriate order prohibiting its continued use. Congress gave the Government 2½ years to act.

Late in 1982, after more than 22 years of study the FDA determined that 6 different types of food dye were likely carcinogens. After this determination, the Secretary was duty-bound to ban each dye. Yet, for the last 2 years, she has baselessly refused to ban these purely cosmetic additives.

On February 1, 1985, once again, Mrs. Heckler claimed that her agency needed more time to prepare documents for the Federal Register. She has had over 2 years to act, and the agency has had 25 years to act.

Mrs. Heckler you are exposing every American to dyes which are known to penetrate the skin and whose effects are known to cause cancer when safe substitues are available. This unwarranted procrastination must end.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1985.

Mrs. MARGARET HECKLER,
Hubert Humphrey Building, Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC.

DEAR MRS. SECRETARY: I was chagrined to read in the February 1, 1985, Federal Register that you have once again put off making the decision to ban six different food dyes. The law is quite clear on this point, and your failure to act causes me great concern.

In 1960, the Congress passed the Color Additive Amendments to the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. At that time, Congress stated that the dyes in question here provided no benefit to the public which outweighed any possible health risks. Thus, after appropriate study, all doubts about the safety of a particular dye are to be resolved by banning the dye. To my knowledge, no one has challenged the appropriateness of the FDA studies undertaken with respect to these 6 dyes.

It is bad enough that the FDA took over 22 years to complete studies on the dyes in question. Now you have delayed the banning of the dyes for over 2 years.

I urge you to act now, Madame Secretary. The American people have paid for 22 years of studies and two years of delays. Further procrastination on your part will only augment the already high societal costs. Millions of people are needlessly exposed to the risk of cancer when there are readily available alternatives to these purely cosmetic dyes.

Sincerely,

EDWARD F. FEIGHAN,
Member of Congress.●

AUTOMOBILE GRAY MARKET ACT OF 1985

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation designed to put an end to the importation of cars which do not comform with U.S. safety and emissions standards. Known as the automotive gray market, the number of nonconforming vehicles has increased from less than 1,500 cars in 1980 to over 40,000 last year. It promises to escalate even more dramatically if nothing is done.

The automobile gray market is a gaping loophole in the effective enforcement of the Motor Vehicle Safety and Clean Air Acts. A National Automobile Dealers Association survey of approximately 400 of these vehicles shows that over 99 percent do not fully comply with U.S. safety and emission standards. In theory, DOT and EPA require that all of these vehicles be modified to meet Federal standards; this survey shows that the program is not working.

The gray market is also a trap waiting for the unwary consumer. The vehicles are imported into this country through a process outside of the established manufacturers' channels. The process seems simple: One merely imports a car and modifies it to meet Federal standards, completes the federally required paperwork, and the process is done. In actuality, this is an area where sharp practices thrive, from the mail order or storefront importer who takes a hefty deposit and then vanishes, to the importer who repaints a used car and sells it as new, to the modifier who charges several thousand dollars for a modification job which is done poorly or not at all. The modifications are often ineffective; at worst, they can be dangerous. The gray market has also made the United States a lucrative haven for stolen vehicles from abroad. These abuses, and many more, are outlined in an article which recently appeared in Autoweek magazine—December 31, 1984—which shows the result of a 6 month independent investigation.

Even when the vehicle is converted by a relatively reliable modifier, the consumer still meets with unpleasant surprises. Modification to meet Federal emission standards can adversely affect the performance of the vehicle. Authorized parts and service will be difficult to obtain, since gray market cars differ significantly from their authorized U.S. counterparts. Dealers often must refuse to service the car for fear of violating Federal tampering statutes and regulations, or because of the unavailability of English language manuals. The cars resale value can be significantly lower than the value of a comparable U.S. version, according to dealer reports. Also, the second buyer may not be advised of the true origin or condition of the vehicle.

In addition to the problems associated with safety, the cars also do not comply with our emission standards. A survey conducted on 31 cars by the California Air Resources Board indicated that their emissions can exceed the levels of other vehicles by over 300 percent for hydrocarbon emissions, over 400 percent for carbon monoxide and oxides of nitrogen emissions, and over 1,000 percent for evaporative emissions.

The taxpayers suffer as well from the importation of these automobiles. DOT, EPA, and Customs together spend millions of dollars in vain attempts to enforce the law. In DOT's case, the Gray Market Program diverts considerable funds from the agency's legitimate safety mission. Not only does it produce no safety benefit, but the NADA survey shows that the gray market is an actual step backward in safety protection. Effective enforcement would require extensive inspection and testing of each vehicle; it would be prohibitively expensive.

Tax revenues are lost by the Treasury as well. These cars often evade the gas guzzler tax, which could deprive the Treasury of approximately $50,000 in revenue in 1985 alone. They also evade the fuel economy laws and thus do not pay the civil penalties under the statute. At a time when our primary national goal is the identification of unnecessary programs and the diminution of the Federal deficit, the gray market loophole is ripe for elimination.

When this exception in the Safety Act was drafted over a decade ago, it was intended to provide members of the armed services with an alternative to a forced sale of their vehicle before returning to this country. Today, wherever they are stationed, these Americans can easily buy foreign models made for use in the United States. The problem which this exception was intended to address has disappeared. The Safety Act was intended to apply equally to all cars sold in the United States and it is time that this intention is fully carried out.

In closing, this bill provides a rare oppportunity to protect the consumer while trimming the Federal bureaucracy of an unnecessary program. We should not be spending our taxpayers' money on fruitless attempts to enforce an unnecessary exception to our safety laws. This bill has the support of the Nation's auto dealers, the imported auto industry, and State motor vehicle administrators nationwide. The proposal to close the automotive gray market loophole has previously received unanimous and bipartisan support in the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, the Senate Committee on the Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Energy and Commerce in the House.

ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED AUTOMOTIVE GRAY MARKET AMENDMENT

The automotive gray market proposal amends the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 to assure the continued legitimate importation of U.S. version motor vehicles produced by vehicle manufacturers, while at the same time making certain that the practice of conditional importation of motor vehicles under bond pending modification be ended inasmuch as this program is no longer necessary or justified.

AMENDMENT TO SEC. 102(5)

The present definition of the term "manufacturer" (Section 102(5)), which is the provision NHTSA relies on to permit the importation of noncomplying gray market vehicles for resale, would be amended so that only the original "manufacturer" or those who have express written authorization from the original "manufacturer" can be considered "manufacturers" for purposes of the Safety Act.[1]

AMENDMENT TO SEC. 108

Several changes in Section 108 are proposed.

First, new language would be added to Sec. 108(a)(1)(A) to prohibit the sale, offering for sale, or importation into the United States of a vehicle unless it both conforms to all applicable safety standards and is covered by the original manufacturers certificate of compliance. To import a noncertified vehicle into the United States would be deemed unlawful.

Second, the term "or importer" would be stricken from Sec. 108(b)(2) in order to close a potential loophole through which noncomplying vehicles would continue to be imported into the United States by "importers" acting as "manufacturers".

Third, major changes to Section 108(b)(3) would eliminate the importation of noncomplying vehicles under bond pending modification. Exceptions to this restriction would include—

a. Importation of noncertified vehicles for purposes of testing, research, investigations, training, competitive racing events, or national security.

b. The importation on noncomplying vehicles under bond in very limited situations necessary to meet unforeseen cases of extreme hardship would be permitted. In these few hardship cases, the vehicle would be modified after importation to comply with the safety standards applicable to the vehicle.

c. The importation of incomplete motor vehicles or motor vehicle equipment would also continue under the revised subsection (b)(3), but only if such vehicles or equipment are accompanied by a statement issued by the original manufacturer indicating the extent to which the incomplete vehicle complies with the applicable safety standards, as is now provided by manufacturers of incomplete vehicles under the multi-stage manufacturer regulations promulgated by NHTSA. There will be no significant increase in the paper work burden for importers of incomplete vehicles as a result of the proposed amendment. The amendment is necessary to avoid the importation of "knocked-down" vehicles—i.e., vehicles which are made to look incomplete by removing bumpers, windshields, lights, and other components. Under the amendment, only those vehicles which are accompanied by a statement issued by the first manufacturer of the incomplete vehicle would be allowed importation into the United States.

Fourth, subparagraph (b)(4) would be deleted and the existing subparagraph (b)(5) redesignated as (b)(4). This is necessary to eliminate a provision in existing law which could be interpreted by NHTSA to authorize gray market imports.[2]

[1] Existing legitimate multi-stage manufacturing operations would be permitted to continue with no additional burden placed on these businesses.

AMENDMENT TO SEC. 114

The certification label requirements of Section 114 would be amended so that it will not be possible for a gray marketer to issue his own certificate of compliance as an alleged distributor to a dealer. The amendment is necessary to prevent commercial importers for resale with no ties to the manufacturer of the vehicle from providing certificates of compliance to dealers or others so that they would be able to continue to sell noncomplying vehicles in the United States.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE FAIR TAX ACT

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, last week I was joined by a number of our House colleagues in reintroducing the Fair Tax Act. The Fair Tax Act seeks to reform the Tax Code by broadening the tax base and concurrently lowering the tax rates. The bill broadens the tax base by including many items that are presently excluded or sheltered from the income tax. The bill, by decreasing tax rates increases economic incentives and reduces economic distortions.

The Fair Tax Act addresses the complexity of both the individual and corporate income taxes. On the individual side, the bill includes a flat 14 percent tax rate for more than 70 percent of taxpayers. This would include individuals earning less than $25,000 a year and couples earning $40,000 a year. For those earning higher incomes, the bill provides for a progressive tax with rates of 26 percent and 30 percent. The bill also eliminates most deductions. The ones we retain, including home mortgage interest, State and local income and property taxes, charitable contributions and medical expenses beyond a certain threshold, would be worth the same to most taxpayers—14 percent in tax reductions for each dollar spent—regardless of income level. Thus, as the marginal tax rate increases, you don't have people scampering around to find deductions to reduce their taxable income. Decisions will be made solely on an economic, not tax, basis.

On the corporate side, the bill provides for a flat corporate tax rate of 30 percent. In addition to several other changes, it provides for a new depreciation plan that simplifies the current system and applies it to a wider range of industries. Perhaps most important is the removal of the vast portion of the tax underbrush that has favored investments in many areas that are inefficient and unproductive.

There are several things the Fair Tax Act doesn't do. It wasn't designed to raise any more money than the current system. It doesn't redistribute the tax burden among various income classes nor does it disturb the existing ratio between business and personal taxation. It will provide a tax cut for most taxpayers—approximately 70 percent—at the expense of those who currently are most sophisticated in taking advantage of our Tax Code.

Since the adoption of the Tax Code in 1916, it has burgeoned from 17 pages to more than 2,000. Along with the regulations and various other ancillary material, the Code and its supporting documents amount to more than 10,000 pages—more than 33 feet of shelf space. We have so riddled the Code with preferences, exceptions, and deductions, that the tax system doesn't make economic sense or tax sense anymore. Through the years the Code has become a system that makes citizens distrust one another and their Government. When that point is reached, you have to begin to question whether you've got the kind of system you want.

The Tax Code, while built on a sound foundation, is a sad structure that needs to be demolished—we need to reform the Tax Code upon its sound foundation. The system is beginning to crumble under its own weight. When people ask us to address their problems by simply grafting on yet another new tax preference, they fail to recognize that they're actually worsening our general situation. Consider our efforts to create a level playing field for business in recent years. First we tried to smooth out disparities among various profitable businesses. Then we went a step further by giving tax benefits to businesses that weren't profitable. It is an endless process. With the fair tax, we reverse course and simply begin with a flat field, instead of adding still more cumbersome mechanical devices to jack up sections of the field that are already hovering well off the ground.

Whenever I try to come up with a logical explanation of our current tax system, I find myself turning, not surprisingly, to a journalist, George Orwell, and his analysis of a system where all were equal, but some were a bit more equal than others. So it is with our tax system. All are equal in that we use the same forms and obey the same laws. But some are more equal because they have expert tax counsel, or capital gains or new storm windows.

Real tax reform and the simplification of the Tax Code will be difficult. But it's hard to envision a time or a circumstance more conducive to reform than now—with major proposals coming from both sides of the aisle and with a reelected President who has expressed strong interest in reform. This year, 1985 is the year to take the giant and necessary steps to revamp the antiquated Tax Code.

The American people have lost faith in the Tax Code and have come to view it as unfair. If we can restore faith in the way the Government collects taxes, the public's faith in their Government and its programs may be restored as well. As elected officials, we are keenly aware that the people's faith in us is at stake as well. Tax reform will be difficult for all of us; but it is something we must not shrink from if we are to seek to serve the greater interests of the country.

FACT SHEET ON THE FAIR TAX ACT OF 1985

This legislation will make the federal income tax system simpler and fairer and the economy more efficient. It will reduce tax rates and eliminate most existing deductions, credits and exclusions. It also will raise revenues approximately equal to those collected under existing law without changing the tax burden for any income group.

SUMMARY OF KEY PROVISIONS

For individuals

A simple, progressive tax with three rates: 14 percent, 26 percent and 30 percent.

About 80 percent of all taxpayers will pay only the 14 percent rate. The 26 percent rate will apply only to individuals with adjusted gross incomes exceeding $25,000 and to couples with adjusted gross incomes exceeding $40,000. The top rate of 30 percent will apply only to individuals with adjusted gross incomes over $37,500 and couples with adjusted gross incomes over $65,000.

An increase of the personal exemption from $1,000 to $1,600 for taxpayers and spouses ($1,800 for a single head of household) and an increase in the standard deduction from $2,300 to $3,000 for single returns and from $3,400 to $6,000 for joint returns. A family of four could earn up to $11,200 before receiving their first dollar of taxable income.

Repeal of most itemized deductions, credits and exclusions except those generally available to most taxpayers. Retained will be the $1,000 exemptions for dependents, the elderly and the blind; deductions for home mortgage interest, charitable contributions, state and local income and real property taxes, payments to IRAs and Keogh plans and employee business expenses; exclusion of veterans benefits, Social Security benefits for low and moderate income persons and interest on general obligation bonds. The personal exemptions and itemized deductions will apply in most cases only against the 14 percent rate.

For corporations

A tax rate of 30 percent.

Repeal of most existing tax deductions, credits and exemptions that distort investment decisions.

A new depreciation system that doesn't favor one type of asset over another.

TECHNICAL EXPLANATION

The legislation significantly reduces tax rates and broadens the base of the individual and corporate income taxes by eliminating most tax preferences. It also smooths out the rate schedule of the tax and sharply reduces "bracket creep" and the "marriage penalty". The changes are designed as if they were to take effect in 1985 and they are approximately revenue and distribution neutral with respect to tax liability in that year. Transition questions will require that some tax preferences be phased out gradually rather than changed abruptly. However, to establish lower rates and a broader tax base as the direction of federal tax policy, 1985 serves as the baseline for all the analysis.

Individual income tax structure

For about 80 percent of individuals, the income tax is a uniform 14 percent tax on taxable income (the tax base). Taxable income is net of personal exemptions and either the standard deduction or the allowable itemized deductions. The personal exemptions are $1,600 per taxpayer (i.e. $1,600 on a single return and $3,200 on a joint return) and $1,000 per dependent. Single heads of households receive an exemption of $1,800. The extra exemptions for the elderly and blind continue at $1,000. The zero bracket amount (standard deduction increases to $3,000 for single returns and $6,000 for joint returns ($3,000 for separate returns of married persons).

For upper income taxpayers, the regular 14 percent income tax is supplemented by an additional progressive tax (surtax) of 12 percent and 16 percent on adjusted gross income in excess of $25,000 for single returns and $40,000 for joint returns. Only about 20 percent of all taxpayers are subject to this surtax. The combined effect of the 14 percent base tax and the surtax is a top marginal tax rate of 30 percent.

The personal exemptions and itemized deductions retained in the Fair Tax apply only against the 14 percent base tax. The rate schedule is as follows:

AGI	Combined surtax (percent)	Tax rate (percent)
Single returns:
Below $25,000	(1)	14
$25,000 to $37,500	12	26
Over $37,500	16	30
Joint returns:
Below $40,000	(1)	14
$40,000 to $65,000	12	26
Over $65,000	16	30

[1] No surtax.

For married persons filing separately, the tax brackets are half of the joint return tax brackets.

Corporate tax structure

The corporate income tax rate is set at a uniform 30 percent of taxable income thus eliminating graduation in corporate rates.

Base broadening measures

A. Changes affecting individuals and unincorporated businesses:

1. The exclusions for income earned abroad by U.S. citizens, residents or government employees (secs. 911 and 912) are repealed.

2. Seven year amortization for reforestation expenditures (sec. 194) are repealed.

3. Five year amortization for pollution control facilities (sec. 169) is repealed.

4. Expensing of tertiary injectants (sec. 193) is repealed, instead, these costs will be written off over 2 years.

5. A new depreciation method is provided for equipment and structures. Under the proposal, equipment is divided into 6 classes based on its ADR midpoint. An open ended account will be established for each asset class and each class will be given a class life. Each year taxpayers write off a percentage of the balance in the account computed using the class life and 250 percent declining balance method. Additions to each account will be made each year for purchases of assets in that class and subtractions will be made for dispositions of assets and for that year's depreciation deduction. Structures will be put into the sixth asset class. The asset classes and depreciation rates for equipment are as follows:

ADR midpoint:	Class life
Under 5	4
5.0 to 8.5	6
9.0 to 14.5	10
15 to 24	18
25 to 35	28
Over 35 and structures	40

For example, equipment with an ADR life of 10 years will be in the 10-year class. Thus, the first year's write-off will be 25 percent of the cost (2.5/10=.25), the second year's write-off will be 18.75 percent (25 percent of 75 percent and so forth.

This plan is designed so that the present value of depreciation deductions are approximately equal to the present value of economic depreciation at a 10 percent discount rate.

6. Percentage depletion (secs. 613 and 613A) and expensing of intangible drilling costs for oil, gas and geothermal wells (sec. 263(d)) are repealed. Instead, there is a new system of capital cost recovery. Under this system, intangible drilling costs and those costs currently recovered through the depletion deduction will be written off under the same method applicable to equipment in the 10-year class. All cost incurred with respect to dry holes will be deducted when the well or property is abandoned.

7. Limits on qualified pension plans. (sec. 415) are reduced from $30,000 on defined contribution plans and $90,000 on defined benefit plans to $20,000 and $60,000 respectively, and indexing of those limits is repealed.

8. The finance lease property rules (sec. 168(f) are repealed and the pre-1981 law is restored.

9. The regular investment tax credit (sec. 46(a)(2)(B) is repealed.

10. The research and development credit (sec. 44F) is repealed.

11. The credit for rehabilitation of buildings (sec. 46(a)(2)(F)) is repealed.

12. The business energy tax credits (secs. 46(a)(2)(c), 44D and 44E) are repealed.

13. All individual farms with gross receipts of more that $1 million and all farm syndicates will be required to use accrual accounting and to capitalize pre-production period expenses and cannot use the expensing provisions for soil and water conservation expenditures (sec. 175), fertilizer (sec. 180), or land clearing (sec. 182).

14. Individuals with AGI above $100,000 would have to cover 90 percent of their current year's tax liability with estimated or withheld tax payments.

15. Income averaging (sec. 1301) is repealed.

16. The child care credit (sec. 44A) is converted to a deduction for purposes of the base tax but not the surtax. The deduction is allowed to non-itemizers.

17. The political contribution tax credit (sec. 41) is repealed.

18. The exclusion of Tier II Railroad Retirement benefits is repealed.

19. The exclusion for interest on cash value life insurance (sec. 804(a)) is repealed. Life insurance policyholders will include in gross income an amount equal to the increase in the cash surrender value of their policy during the year plus policyholder dividends received plus the "term insurance" value of insurance protection during the year minus the premiums paid. Insurance companies will provide policyholders with this information.

20. The exclusion for scholarship and fellowship income in excess of tuition (sec. 117) is repealed.

21. The deduction for second earners (sec. 221) is repealed because the new rate schedule sharply reduces the "marriage penalty".

22. The elderly tax credit (sec. 37) is repealed.

23. The general exclusions for interest and dividends (secs. 116 and 128) and the exclusion for reinvested public utility dividends (Sec. 305(e)) are repealed.

24. Expensing of interest and taxes paid during the construction period of a building (sec. 189) is repealed and instead these costs are subject to a 10 year amortization.

25. The residential energy credit (sec. 44C) is repealed.

26. The deduction for 60 percent of net long-term capital gains (sec. 1202) is repealed and the distinction between short and long-term capital gains is eliminated.

27. The individual minimum tax (sec. 55) is repealed. Since the legislation eliminates most of the preferences currently subject to the minimum tax, this provision is no longer needed.

28. The exclusion for unemployment compensation benefits (sec. 85) is repealed.

29. The exclusions for employer provided child care (sec. 129), education assistance (sec. 127) and group legal services (sec. 120) are repealed.

30. For purposes of computing the surtax (but not the base tax), a deduction would be allowed for all interest to the extent of investment income. For the base tax, itemized deductions would be allowed for all housing interest, and the itemized deduction for other interest would be limited to investment income.

31. The tax exclusion for employer provided premiums on group term life insurance (sec. 79) is repealed.

32. The tax exemption for industrial development or housing bonds issued after December 31, 1984 (secs. 103(b) and 103A) is repealed.

33. Rapid amortization of low-income housing rehabilitation (sec. 167(k)) is repealed.

34. The itemized deduction for medical expenses (sec. 213) is limited to the excess over 10 percent of adjusted gross income.

35. The present exclusion for up to $125,000 of gain on the sale of a house by a person age 55 or over (sec. 121) is retained for the base tax but not the surtax.

36. The deduction for adoption expenses (sec. 222) is repealed.

37. The deduction for state and local income and real property taxes is retained but the deduction for all other state and local taxes (sec. 164) is repealed.

38. The exclusion for employer provided premiums on group health insurance (sec. 106) is repealed.

39. Indexing of the personal exemptions and the tax brackets (sec. 1(f)) is repealed because the new rate structure will greatly reduce the problem of "bracket creep".

40. Trusts and estates would be subject to a flat 30 percent tax on taxable income in excess of $100. As under present law, a deduction would be allowed for distributions.

Changes affecting corporations

1. A new depreciation method is provided for equipment and structures. Under the proposal, equipment is divided into 6 classes based on its ADR midpoint. An open ended account will be established for each asset class and each class will be given a class life. Each year taxpayers write off a percentage of the balance in the account computed using the class life and 250 percent declining method. Additions to each account will be made each year for purchases of assets in that class and subtractions will be made for dispositions of assets and for that year's depreciation deduction. Structures will be put into the sixth asset class. The asset classes and depreciation rates for equipment are as follows:

ADR midpoint:	Class life
Under 5	4
5.0 to 8.5	6
9.0 to 14.5	10
15 to 24	18
25 to 35	28
Over 35 and structures	40

For example, equipment with an ADR life of 10 years will be in the 10-year class. Thus, the first year's write-off will be 25 percent of the cost (2.5/10=.25), the second year's write-off will be 18.75 percent (25 percent of 75 percent) and so forth.

This plan is designed so that the present value of depreciation deductions is approximately equal to the present value of economic depreciation at a 10 percent discount rate.

2. Percentage depletion for minerals (sec. 613) and expensing of mineral exploration and development costs (secs. 616 and 617) are repealed. Instead, there is a new system of capital cost recovery whereby exploration and development costs are deducted under an open account system based on 6 asset classes. These 6 classes are the same as those for equipment. Mines will be assigned to one of the 6 asset classes based on the expected useful life of the mine (using the same system that assigns equipment to each class based on its asset depreciation range (ADR) midpoint).

3. Percentage depletion (secs. 613 and 613A) and expensing of intangible drilling costs for oil, gas and geothermal wells (sec. 263(d)) are repealed. Instead, there is a new system of capital cost recovery. Under this system, intangible drilling costs and those costs currently recovered through the depletion deduction will be written off under the same method applicable to equipment in the 10-year class. All costs incurred with respect to dry holes will be deducted when the well or property is abandoned.

4. The income of controlled foreign subsidiaries of U.S. corporations is subject to tax.

5. The preferential taxation of Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISC) (sec. 991) (now FSC) is repealed and previously deferred DISC income is recaptured over a 10-year period.

6. The deduction for bad debt reserves of financial institutions in excess of their actual experience (secs. 585 and 593) is repealed.

7. The exclusion for contributions to a maritime construction fund is repealed.

8. The finance lease property rules (sec. 168(f) are repealed and the pre-1981 law is restored.

9. The regular investment tax credit (sec. 46(a)(2)(B)) is repealed.

10. The credit for possessions corporations (sec. 936) is repealed.

11. The research and development credit (sec. 44F) is repealed.

12. The credit for rehabilitation of buildings (sec. 46(a)(2)(F)) is repealed.

13. The business energy tax credits (secs. 46(a)(2)(c), 44D and 44E) is repealed.

14. The employer stock ownership credit (sec. 44G) is repealed.

15. For corporations, the deduction for charitable contributions is limited to one-half of such contributions. Thus they will receive a 15 percent tax benefit for charitable giving.

16. All corporate farms with gross receipts of more than $1 million and all farm syndicates will be required to use accrual accounting and to capitalize pre-production period expenses and cannot use the expensing provisions for soil and water conservation expenditures (sec. 175), fertilizer (sec. 180), or land clearing (sec. 182).

17. For taxpayers using the completed contract method, the 3-year exception is deleted and a "look-back" method, imposing interest charges on deferred tax liability, is implemented.

18. The alternative capital gains rate for corporations (sec. 1201) is repealed.

19. The exemption for credit unions (sec. 501(c)(14)) is repealed.

20. Expensing of magazine circulation expenditures (sec. 173) is repealed. Instead, these costs will be amortized over 10 years.

21. Expensing of tertiary injectants (sec. 193) is repealed. Instead, these costs will be written off over 2 years.

22. The exclusion of income attributable to a stock-for-debt swap (sec. 108) is repealed.

23. Upon liquidation, a corporation will recognize gain on all appreciated assets (secs. 336 and 337).

24. 7-year amortization for reforestation expenditures (sec. 194) is repealed.

25. 5-year amortization for pollution control facilities (sec. 169) is repealed.

26. Expensing of interest and taxes paid during the construction period of a building (sec. 189) is repealed and instead these costs are subject to a 10-year amortization.

27. The corporate minimum tax (sec. 56) is repealed. Since the legislation eliminates most of the preferences currently subject to the minimum tax this provision is no longer needed.

28. The tax exemption for industrial development or housing bonds issued after December 31, 1984 (secs. 103(b) and 103A) is repealed.

29. Rapid amortization of low-income housing rehabilitation (sec. 167(k)) is repealed.●

THE CRISIS IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, last weeks announcement of a record international trade deficit of $123.3 billion should send us a clear message. America is losing the trade war. For the fourth straight year, we have fallen farther and farther behind. Unless Congress, the President, American business, agriculture and labor begin to act immediately to address this crisis, we may fall so far behind that all possibility of success will disappear.

Several factors account for our trade deficit. Unquestionably, the Federal debt has a large impact. It has driven the value of the dollar to unprecedented heights. While that may benefit the American tourist looking for bargains at Harrods, it is a disaster for American exporters and the hundreds of thousands of working people in this country whose jobs depend on international trade. Our overvalued dollar raises the price of American products in international markets, while foreign products become less expensive in the United States.

I believe our No. 1 priority must be to reduce the Federal deficit. No long-term economic expansion can be generated while it remains so high. That is why I am so thoroughly disappointed with the budget sent to us yesterday by President Reagan. Rather than instituting a freeze on Government spending, the President proposes to massively increase Government spending—particularly in defense spending. I continue to believe that the tough medicine of an across-the-board freeze is our best hope of bringing the deficit into line and reordering our spending priorities. A spending freeze that affects every part of the budget, including defense, entitlements and discretionary domestic spending can save over $250 billion over the next three years. That savings can go a long way toward reducing interest rates and bringing the value of the dollar back to a reasonable level.

Reducing the Federal deficit alone, however, will not enable America to regain its position in international trade. Too many of our trading partners are taking advantage of our national commitment to free and open trade. Too many of them are competing unfairly. Too many of them have erected barriers against our products while flooding our shores with theirs. Too many of them are granting massive subsidies to their own industries while placing import restrictions on the products and goods we seek to sell to them.

The United States needs to take a tougher stand. We need to negotiate stronger trade agreements, agreements that will not put our industries, our farmers, and our workers at such a terrible disadvantage. We need to insist that our trading partners open up their markets to our products to the same extent as we have opened ours to them. And we need to be willing to retaliate if they refuse to do so.

Congress can also take steps to increase the opportunity for American companies to enter the export field. In the coming months, as we debate the Export Administration Act, we should make an effort to eliminate ineffective redtape that hinders many companies from exporting. We need to examine restrictions that we have placed on some technical products. And we should attempt to streamline the safeguards that are needed to prevent the exportation of technology involved in national security.

Increasing international trade and our economic competitiveness in a rapidly changing world will not be a simple task. It will involve long-term planning and a clearer perception of the problems our exporters face in foreign markets. I believe we are ready to accept that task. The current trade deficit is simply unacceptable. For it to continue on its current course would be a disaster for the American economy and the American way of life. Americans know that, and it is time for us to recognize it as well. Now is the time to act.●

REPEAL METRIC CONVERSION ACT

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, ever since Canada began its move to the metric system more than a decade ago, ordinary Canadians have put up fierce resistance to the change. In fact, opposition has now intensified to the point that the Canadian Government has been forced to rethink its policy on metric altogether. On February 1, the Mulroney government announced the retreat from forced conversion.

The prospects of conversion to metric here in the United States set off furious debate in Congress back in the 1970's culminating in the passage of the Metric Conversion Act of 1975. Far from mandating conversion, however, the act set no timetable for conversion and stressed that any change was to be completely voluntary. Nevertheless, the Commerce Department and other agencies have seized it as a justification for initiating conversion activities, giving the erroneous impression that it is U.S. policy to convert.

We can put a stop to this heavy-handed push toward metric in the United States by repealing the confusing and unnecessary Metric Conversion Act.

I invite my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring legislation, H.R. 436, to achieve that objective.

A February 1 report by the Associated Press on Canada's decision to retreat from mandatory conversion follows:

CANADA BACKS AWAY FROM "HEAVY-HANDED, INSENSITIVE" METRIC PUSH

TORONTO.—Canadians who wouldn't touch metric measurement with a 3.048-meter pole have forced the government to retreat from a decade-long effort to require them to think in meters, liters and millimeters.

Michel Cote, consumer-affairs minister in the Progressive Conservative government of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, announced the new policy in Parliament: gallons, pounds and inches are legal again.

From now on, the government will encourage the transition to metric, but will scrap laws punishing merchants who insist on keeping the old weights and measures.

"Canadians feel, and we agree, that compulsory metric-only is a heavy-handed and insensitive approach," Cote said.

"As a government we favor metric conversion. We believe that metric is here to stay," he said. "But we also believe that the changeover must be eased for those individuals and businesses which are having difficulty adjusting to it."

Retailers will still be required to show "a reasonable metric presence," Cote said. What is "reasonable" will be different for small butcher shops than for giant supermarkets, but the details haven't been worked out.

Visitors will still see highway signs in kilometers rather than miles, and will hear weather reports predicting temperatures in Celsius and measuring snowfall in centimeters. Only the metric system is taught in schools.

Yardsticks are a different matter. Canadian football fields are still marked off in yards.

The metric system was adopted in Canada in 1976 by agreement of all three political parties in Parliament, and was presented as a tool to expand Canadian exports by conforming to world standards.

But as enforcement of regulations began to get stricter, opposition grew to what many people thought was government meddling. Opponents pointed out that more than two-thirds of Canadian exports go to the United States, which is showing no haste in moving to metric measurements.

Jack Halpert, a Toronto gas-station owner, became a national figure when he was taken to court for selling gasoline by the gallon.

"I guess I'm responsible for wiping out forced metric," Halpert said.

Two years ago, 37 Conservative members of Parliament opened their own station selling gas in gallons, daring the Liberal government of Pierre Elliott Trudeau to prosecute, which it never did.●

REAGAN'S PROPOSED BUDGET CUTS TO THE ARTS

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, Hooray for Hollywood. The year 1985 marks the 20th anniversary of the National Endowment for the Arts. Nancy Reagan has been named the honorary chairman of an anniversary committee chaired by Ronald Reagan's Hollywood pal, Charlton Heston.

The main thrust of this committee is to increase private support for the arts, although this type of fundraising is usually channeled to established arts organizations and institutions. How ironic that this administration provides this superficial commitment while at the same time rejecting the all-out support for the arts. The administration is drastically cutting the very program whose anniversary it is celebrating.

The National Endowment for the Arts has traditionally provided the largest single source of support for the arts. While it does not have the capacity to provide complete funding to anyone, it does award 5,000 or more grants annually to artists and nonprofit arts groups around the country.

This amount would be reduced to approximately $3.5 million for the entire State if the Reagan budget is approved.

The National Endowment for the Arts fiscal year 1985 appropriation is $163,660,000. The President is requesting a cut of 11.7 percent to $144.5 million for fiscal year 1986. Again, this figure is down from the $163.7 million actually appropriated by the Congress last year.

The major impact of these proposed cuts will be felt in the areas of music programs, dance programs and musical theater—including opera.

This is a small program, proportionately minute to the total budget—0.19 percent of the total Federal budget fiscal year 1984. What we have to ask ourselves is what impact the requested cuts might have on the quality of arts in this country and whether the grant recipients' lost revenue can be replaced by private donations?

All segments of our society should take part in the experience of creating. Art should not be conceived by, controlled by, or experienced by only one class of people as too often it has been in the past. Livingston Biddle, former head of the National Endowment for the Arts, stated, "Among the many investments the Federal Government makes in America, the endowment gives one of the great returns to all levels of income and education." In my own city of Cleveland, OH, many talented children have been able to participate in these cultural programs. The endowment has given the opportunity to many to develop a creative outlet and an opportunity to enhance their talents. It has given many young people an avenue for fostering their dreams of success.

The fostering of the arts in our society is not just an esthetic issue but an extremely important social one.

If only the political world could be more creative and see what artists have to contribute to the society as a whole. Too often there is a misconception to think of the process of making art as something impractical and beyond it all. Contrary to this myth, Mr. Speaker, artists are extremely competent and caring people and have great creative resources to offer the world, especially in the nurturing of the spirit and soul of this country's self-image and values.

Mr. Speaker, after all is said and done what is left in terms of a society's history, of the history of the world? It is only arts that are left. Without art, would we have any idea of what the past was like—the civilizations of the ancient Greeks and Egyptians? Art is the record of mankind, what man feels about his world.

Today we are competing in such an industrialized and technological society that we have concentrated all our efforts on developing the science of the mind at the expense of the creation of the heart.

In enacting appropriations legislation for fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984, the Congress has consistently rejected the Reagan administration's proposals to make large reductions in the Arts and the Humanities programs.

I sincerely hope that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will continue to exercise sound judgment and reject these types of cuts which could prove disastrous to the arts. Let us stop making cuts in a social program that is really a quality of life issue, providing enrichment of the spirit to countless Americans.

Mr. Speaker, the small amount of money needed for the arts is a minute investment for the lasting legacy of our people. We should reject any attempt to cut the budget in the area of the arts for now and for the future. A true sign of a civilization is how lofty its arts flourished. Let us not reject the noble side of our great people.●

OAKWOOD VILLAGE INDIAN BINGO

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about the procedures involved in the proposed designation of 77 acres of Oakwood Village, OH, as Indian trust land. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is currently considering the request of an Oklahoma-based tribe which intends to use the land for a high-stakes bingo hall. The bingo would be exempt from State bingo laws limiting payoffs on the land. Frankly, I am concerned that the Bureau of Indian Affairs may rubberstamp the proposal without considering the implications of their action.

The issues involved in creating Indian trust land are not limited to Oakwood Village. They are issues which the Federal Government must resolve before approving or disapproving actions that undercut State laws. Public hearings, providing an opportunity for community representatives, State and local officials to present their views, should be required. I have written to the Secretary of the Interior expressing my concern about the Oakwood Village proposal, and I intend to work with my colleague Congressman UDALL, chairman of the House Interior Committee, to develop guidelines to regulate the designation of Indian trust land.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert the text of my letter to Secretary Clark in the RECORD.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, January 18, 1985.

Mr. WILLIAM CLARK,
Secretary, Department of the Interior, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY CLARK: As you are aware, a proposal to designate seventy-seven acres of land in trust for the Miami Indians in Oakwood Village, Ohio, is being considered by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. For the last year, I have been vocal in expressing my concern about the process used to effect such a designation of private property as Indian Trust Land.

I am writing to urge you to halt any consideration of this proposal or similar proposals throughout the nation until you have formally proposed and adopted regulations under which the grant of Indian Trust Land will be considered. I have also contacted Congressman Morris Udall, Chairman of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, to request a thorough Committee review of the issues surrounding the designation of land held in trust for Indian tribes. I have asked that particular attention be given to such action where the express purpose of the land designation is to provide a loophole to allow bingo games which existing State law will not permit. It is my intention to support and assist Congressman Udall in this effort.

The issues involved in creating land in trust for Indian tribes are not limited to Oakwood Village, Ohio. They are issues which the federal government must resolve before determining a policy by which to consider such requests. This policy should include public hearings which allow private citizens as well as state and local elected officials to be heard. We must also consider the effect that the designation of such land, which is intended for a use contrary to state and local laws, will have on the enforcement of such laws. The result of any regulations or legislation must conform to a public policy which is consistent with the goals and statutes of federal, state and local governments.

I hope I will have your complete cooperation to halt the consideration of these proposals until clear guidelines are established.

Sincerely,

EDWARD F. FEIGHAN,
Member of Congress.●

THE FAIR TRADE IN FERROALLOYS ACT

HON. CLARENCE E. MILLER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today, I and my colleagues Mr. REGULA, Mr. STOKES, Mr. APPLEGATE, Mr. KASICH, Mr. WISE, Mr. MOLLOHAN, Mr. STAGGERS, Mrs. LLOYD, and Mr. MCEWEN, are introducing the Fair Trade in Ferroalloys Act. The only way to prevent the loss of what remains of the domestic ferroalloy industry, which now has an import penetration of 60 percent, and to protect our national security interests is to provide the industry with some form of systematic import relief targeted at the unfairly low pricing of imports. The most effective and least market intrusive method is the break-point duty which the Fair Trade in Feroalloys Act would provide.

Ferroalloys are essential to our military preparedness and industrial strength, because iron, steel, stainless steel, superalloy, and aluminum products cannot be made without the use of chromium, manganese, and silicon ferroalloys and metals. Steel could not be cast, forged, or rolled without ferromanganese. Chromium, as an alloying element, gives steel oxidation resistance to high temperatures and resistance to corrosive gases, liquids, and solids. All stainless steels and superalloys contain over 10 percent chromium. Ferrosilicon is an important iron inoculant, steel deoxidizer, and alloying element in high performance electrical steels. Silicon as a metal is an important additive to aluminum to promote fluidity and strength and is also the raw material for silicone chemical production. Without ferroalloys we could not make missiles, tanks, military aircraft, machine tools, or silicon chips, and could not build powerplants, chemical plants, or modern hospitals.

The American ferroalloy industry is recognized as one of the most modern, efficient, and technologically innovative in the world, but it cannot compete against unfair, often subsidized, imports. In 1968 ferroalloy imports made up about 16 percent of the domestic market; by 1977 it had risen to about 40 percent; and today import penetration stands at 60 percent. Ferroalloys are imported from 35 different countries with the top exporters being the Republic of South Africa, accounting for 30 percent of imports, France, Brazil, Norway, and Yugoslavia. Even the Soviet bloc countries such as the U.S.S.R., Poland, and Romania are exporting ferroalloys to this country. Some exporters, especially those outside of Western Europe and Japan, have taken advantage of lower costs which result from minimal pollution control and other regulatory requirements and from inexpensive labor. Other exporters have often benefited from subsidies, as successful countervailing duty cases against Brazil, Spain, and South Africa have demonstrated. Some exporters have sold material at prices that seem to have been uneconomically low if measured against the cost of production, and this has resulted from an apparent strategy of achieving market penetration on the basis of price. Moreover, because American duties on ferroalloys are lower than those of other major world markets; that is, European Economic Community and Japan and because the United States has no nontariff barriers, the American market has become the most attractive market in the world for exporters.

What has the ferroalloy industry done to stem the tide of these unfair imports? The ferroalloy industry has pursued vigorously a number of traditional routes to import relief such as actions under the escape clause and anitdumping laws. Despite some victories, these actions have not reversed the current loss of producing capacity, now at only one-half of 1978's capacity, because they have been piecemeal approaches to a highly integrated problem. While these remedies are particular and focused on short periods of time, the ferroalloy industry's crisis results from imports from several countries whose low prices are caused by varied factors. In addition to the obvious administrative and legal limitations of these laws, they are also expensive to pursue. The ferroalloy industry has limited resources with sales of under a billion dollars a year, major losses over the past few years, and a workforce of just 3,800 which is less than half of the 1979 figure. The industry's problems simply will not be solved by the application of these trade laws.

The industry has also used section 232 of the Trade Act of 1962 which provides relief based on national security criteria. This case was filed in 1981 and it took until 1984 for a final decision to be made by the administration. Despite an obvious clear connection between a viable domestic ferroalloy industry and the protection of our national security interests, this petition was surprisingly denied.

The only way to protect the Nation's powerful security interest in preserving this essential industry is to provide it with some form of systematic import relief targeted at the low pricing of imports. The most effective and least market-intrusive form of relief is the break-point duty which the Fair Trade in Ferroalloys Act would provide.

The operation of the break-point duty is simple. If imports enter the United States with a duty-declared value below the product's break point or fair price, they pay a duty equal to the difference. The fair price will be determined by the Secretary of Commerce by taking into account the production costs of U.S. producers with efficient facilities and operations. This calculation can readily be made from an objective model of production inputs—raw materials, power, labor, indirect costs, and so forth—to determine a fair amount that competitive producers should charge. One important feature of the bill is that it does not just add break-point duties, but substitutes them for ad valorem duties on ferroalloy imports. By eliminating these current duties, only those ferroalloy imports which are priced below the break point will pay any duty at all.

By focusing on the low import prices that have caused the ferroalloy industry's life-threatening crisis, the break-point duty offers the minimum intrusion possible to achieve effective relief. It will neither require the market allocations and administrative difficulties of quotas nor force all imports to pay added duties regardless of how fairly they may be priced, as would a tariff increase. Instead, by applying only to imports below a fair price, the remedy permits all competitors—U.S. producers and imports—to compete vigorously within the parameters of the fair price. As a result, prices will closely approximate the level that would be obtained if foreign producers abided by the rules of the free trade and free market system. I emphasize that break points will not protect any inefficient domestic producers. If an American producer is less efficient than its competitors and thus its costs exceed the fair price, the producer will not be able to compete effectively at the break-point level. I might add that this legislation will have a very minimal impact on the U.S. economy, because the resulting increase in ferroalloy prices will amount to only a fraction of one percent of the sales of user industries.

The break-point duty is nothing new to the world ferroalloy market. The European Community imposes similar restrictions on major ferroalloy imports. Moreover, this form of relief was used in this country from 1978 to 1982 under the escape clause for high carbon ferrochrome. The ferrochrome relief worked until inflation eroded the meaning of the break point; but my bill provides protection against the effects of inflation by having the break point recalculated once per year.

This bill is essential to saving what is left of the ferroalloy industry and protecting our national security needs, because without major import relief, this country will lose the ability to produce ferroalloys and will be unable to respond in a time of national emergency. The industry has shrunk from 29 to 17 plants and is currently operating at just 60 percent of that reduced capacity. The trend of increasing ferroalloy imports has continued into 1985, and I foresee no change in this situation. Only a strong domestic ferroalloy industry can prevent our dependence on unreliable foreign imports, decrease the need for extremely expensive stockpiles, and reduce the present threat to our national security. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to cosponsor the fair trade in ferroalloys bill.

The text of the bill follows:

THE FAIR TRADE IN FERROALLOYS ACT

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This act may be cited as the "Fair Trade in Ferroalloys Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) ferroalloys are products which impart distinctive qualities to steel, specialty alloys, iron, and aluminum and are essential to the production of those products;

(2) the economic health and national defense of any modern industrial nation rest on its having a secure supply of ferroalloys, and the United States can assure that supply only if it maintains the capacity to produce a significant portion of its needs domestically;

(3) the domestic ferroalloy industry has suffered from the unremitting pressure of low-priced imports for many years, and consequently the industry has suffered massive losses and its capacity has dwindled in recent years;

(4) imports have caused this result not because of any superiority—since the American industry is as technologically modern and efficient as any in the world—but rather because of artificial advantages afforded by non-free-market pricing policies, by subsidies, and by other policies of foreign governments;

(5) the application of existing trade laws has not prevented imports from causing the severe decline of the industry;

(6) unless effective import relief is promptly forthcoming, the industry will soon shrink to where it will be able to supply only a small portion of the needs of the Nation;

(7) such a result would gravely damage the national security and the economic and international interests of the United States;

(8) the fair price tariffs enacted by this Act would neutralize the artificial advantages which foreign ferroalloy producers obtain from non-free-market pricing policies, subsidies, and other policies of their home governments;

(9) the fair price tariffs enacted by this Act would thereby preserve the essential capacity of the Nation to produce these critical materials; and

(10) by simultaneously eliminating all tariffs other than the fair price tariffs provided herein, this Act would eliminate all barriers to the free competition in the United States markets by sellers of fairly priced imports of ferroalloys.

SEC. 3. AMENDMENTS TO TARIFF SCHEDULES OF THE UNITED STATES.

(a) Items 606.22 through 606.30, 606.35 through 606.44, 606.50, 632.18, 632.30, 632.42, and 632.86 of part 2 of schedule 6 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) are amended by striking out all rates of duty specified therein (whether in Column 1, Column 2 or the LDDC column) and by inserting in lieu thereof "Fair price differential".

(b) The headnotes to part 2 of schedule 6 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) are amended by adding at the end thereof the following new headnote:

"5. (a) For purposes of this part, the term 'fair price differential' means, with respect to any article, the amount equal to the excess, if any, of—

"(i) the fair price of such article, over

"(ii) the duty declared value of such article (including cost, insurance, and freight) at the United States port of entry.

"(b)(i) For purposes of this headnote, the term 'fair price' means, with respect to an article, the sum of—

"(A) the amount determined by the Secretary of Commerce to be the average cost incurred by producers in producing a like article in the United States at technologically efficient facilities, plus

"(B) an amount prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce with respect to that like article for general expenses and profit.

"(ii) The amount prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce under (b)(i)(B) of this headnote shall not be less than the amount determined with respect to a like article under section 773(e)(1)(B) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1677b(e)(1)(B)) at the time such amount is prescribed under (b)(i)(B) of this headnote.

"(iii) By no later than the earlier of December 31, 1985, or the date which is 90 days after the date of enactment of this headnote, and by December 31, of each year thereafter, the Secretary of Commerce shall determine, and publish in the Federal Register, the fair price for articles of the kind provided for in each of items 606.22 through 606.30, 606.35 through 606.44, 606.50, 632.18, 632.30, 632.42, and 632.86.

"(iv) The fair price determined under (b)(iii) of this headnote shall apply during the calendar year that succeeds the calendar year in which the determination is made.".

(c) The fair price differential, as defined in headnote 5 of part 2 of schedule 6 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202; as added by subsection (b); shall apply to all imports of any article provided for in any item specified in subsection (a), whether that article is a product of a country designated as a beneficiary developing country under the Generalized System of Preferences (pursuant to title V of the Trade Act of 1974) or of any other country.

SEC. 4. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption after the earlier of December 31, 1985, or the date which is 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act.●

ENGLISH AS THE U.S. OFFICIAL LANGUAGE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues' support of a constitutional amendment to establish English as the official language of the United States.

As an American citizen who spent a career on diplomatic assignment in the culturally rich nations of Latin America, I can appreciate the beauty of the Spanish language and the necessity of being fluent in the native tongue of a foreign land. The Spanish language plays a key role in virtually every aspect of a country such as Mexico—whether it be a business transaction, political debate, education, religious ceremony or everyday chatter. It represents the distinct culture of a country: Its history, its music, and its lifestyle.

Here in the United States, English plays no less a role in our national heritage. Our Founding Fathers spoke English, our Constitution was written in English and our entire national history has been recorded in English. Today, an American citizen without a thorough understanding of English could be left out of the mainstream of the American economy and political process. In short, that citizen would be condemned to a second-class citizenship.

That is why I believe a constitutional amendment establishing English as the official language of the United States is needed.

In my view, an immigrant's own language and national culture need not be abandoned or even suffer during the process of converting to the English language. Instead, the language and culture can and should be preserved through the family unit. But outside the family, where the Nation's business is conducted, the English language should prevail.

In America, opportunity speaks English. We should continue to encourage the teaching of different languages after our children have mastered English. But we cannot afford to isolate groups of Americans from the primary language that has played a vital role in the building of the strongest, freest, and best government in the entire world.

Immigrants seek a better life in the United States because of what we have so proudly built—a nation that truly offers more to its people than any nation on Earth.

But in order for a person to take advantage of the many opportunities that are available in the United States, a knowledge of the English language is a necessity.

It is little wonder that the prestigious 20th Century Fund concluded one of its major studies of education with this finding:

Anyone living in the United States who is unable to speak English cannot fully participate in our society, its culture, its politics.●

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOVIET JEWRY YEAREND REPORT

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the policies that the United States has pursued to encourage human rights have not been as effective as we would like them to be or as they should be. In the late 1970's, Soviet officials first crippled the Soviet Jewish emigration movement when the numbers of Jews allowed to emigrate began to decline. In 1984, Soviet authorities strived to paralyze the Jewish emigration movement further. Soviet Jewish emigration dropped to an all time low of 896.

A new stepped up Soviet campaign to erase Jewish culture has begun. Disruption of their lives and harassment by authorities are not new to the tens of thousands of refuseniks waiting to emigrate. The latest attempt to eradicate Jewish culture from Soviet society, however, is new. Hebrew teachers and the most active political activists were singled out, arrested, and imprisoned on trumped up charges.

The leadership of the Soviet Jewish emigration movement may disappear if these Hebrew teachers and activists are eliminated. Soviet television recently aired a crude documentary on Jews in the Soviet Union mentioning their anti-Soviet tendencies and association with Zionists. This film represents not only an upsurge in anti-Semitism, but also a continuation of the Stalinist mentality of equating any allegiance to Judaism or Israel as an act of treason possibly punishable by death. If refusenik leaders are to weather this new Soviet storm, they will need our support and commitment to their cause.

Knowing of my colleagues' concern and support for human rights, I would like to bring to their attention an informative yearend report on Soviet Jewry prepared by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry. The report follows:

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOVIET JEWRY—SOVIET JEWRY: THE LEGACY OF ANDROPOV

HIGHLIGHTS OF 1984 DEVELOPMENTS

With the coming to power of Soviet President Konstantin Chernenko, there were high hopes in the West for a positive change in the policy of Yuri Andropov that would see increased Jewish emigration to Israel. Optimism in this area was based in part upon Chernenko's close association with former Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev, during the era when Jewish emigration peaked.

These expectations, however, were not met. On the contrary, 1984 was a bleak year dominated by harassment and a new wave of arrests and persecution. At the same time, the movement for a renewed Jewish religious and cultural life grew, indicating that Soviet Jews are continuing to draw strength and hope from their Jewish heritage, despite tremendous adversity.

WAVE OF NEW ANTI-JEWISH TRIALS

The most notable and serious development affecting Soviet Jewry in 1984 was a concentrated and systematic attack on Hebrew teachers. Since mid-July, continuing harassment against Hebrew teachers and cultural activists culminated in a wave of searches, threats and arrests, suggesting a blatant attempt to crush the determination of a younger generation of Jewish activists. Four of those arrested were sentenced to prison and labor camps on trumped-up charges. Their real "crime" was their active struggle to secure the right to emigrate to Israel or to live as Jews, without discrimination, in the USSR.

On November 19, Yakov Levin, a Hebrew teacher from Odessa, was sentenced to three years in a labor camp for allegedly "circulating false materials which defame the Soviet State and social system." As evidence, the court was informed that Levin possessed copies of Leon Uris' novel, "Exodus," and writings by the Zionist leader Vladimir Jabotinsky, which predated the 1917 Revolution and the creation of the Soviet State.

Levin's intended father-in-law, Mark Nepomniashchy, was himself subsequently arrested in connection with Levin's investigation and charged with the same crime. The net was further tightened when Yakov Mesh, a long-time friend of Levin's, was charged with "refusing to give testimony" and "resisting arrest." Mesh was hospitalized, pending his trial, as the result of abdominal and liver injuries sustained during a brutal beating received at the prison where he was originally held.

On December 10, Iosif Berenshtein of Kiev was sentenced to four years for allegedly "resisting arrest." He was arrested on November 12, while in nearby Novograd Vilinsky to answer allegations of economic crimes made against his aunt, in connection with the purchase of a gravestone. That complaint was weak and was dropped, but Berenshtein remained incarcerated. Upon his arrival at the prison, Berenshtein was placed in an isolation cell with two hardcore criminals. The move was seen by friends as a way of stigmatizing Jewish activists, and to cloak the arrest as one on criminal rather than political or religious grounds. The inmates attacked him and, using broken glass, inflicted serious injury to his eyes. As a result, he may be permanently blinded in one eye.

Leningrad activist Nadezhda Fradkova was sentenced to two years on the charge of "parasitism." Fradkova had been periodically confined to a psychiatric hospital since April 1983, because authorities insisted that "she must be suffering from hallucinations since she insists on receiving an exit visa for Israel."

Yuli Edelshtein of Moscow was sentenced on December 19 to three years in a labor camp, on a charge of "drug possession," stemming from a search of his apartment in which officials claim to have found opium. The arrest was the forerunner of a series of libelous allegations in the press linking Judaism with drug use. During several house searches, local authorities confiscated and defaced religious artifacts under the guise of a drug investigation.

Commenting on one such search another Jewish cultural activist, Dan Shapira, declared that "these provocations are extremely primitive and are probably an exercise to see how much pressure can be exerted on us. Even Hitler did not start to destroy the Jews immediately; only when he began to understand that no one in the free world would protect them."

As the year drew to a close, three other activists were expected to go to trial, including Aleksandr Kholmiansky, one of Moscow's leading Hebrew teachers. Kholmiansky was arrested while visiting Estonia in July, and detained on a charge of "hooliganism." Authorities later elevated the charge to alleged "weapons possession," based upon a search of the home Kholmiansky shared with his parents, in which they claim to have found a gun and ammunition.

The accelerated judicial action against the Hebrew teachers is seen as a concentrated effort to destroy the remnants of Jewish education and culture in the USSR. While these seven Jewish activists and their families are the most obvious victims of the latest campaign, allegations surrounding their cases represent a threat for all Soviet Jews, with the real purpose being an indictment of Judaism. Soviet authorities are painting a picture to the public at large of a "Jewish underground," characterized by possession of weapons and drug abuse.

Prior to these new attacks, three other Jewish activists, Aleksandr Cherniak, Aleksandr Yakir and Zakhar Zunshain, had been jailed. Fourteen other Prisoners of Conscience (POCs) remained incarcerated, including Anatoly Shcharansky, who was transferred to Perm Labor Camp to serve the remainder of his 13-year term (to 1990) and was reported hospitalized in December. Iosif Begun's wife, Inna, was notified that her husband, a founder of the Hebrew language effort who had already served two terms of internal exile in Siberia and is now in a labor camp, will be refused visitors until the end of 1985.

While nine Jewish Prisoners of Conscience were released upon completion of their terms in 1984, none received their exit visas for Israel. The total number of Jewish Prisoners of Conscience now stands at 22.

EMIGRATION

The rate of Jewish emigration reached a nadir, for the 1984 total of 896 was the lowest recorded in a single year since 1970. The monthly rate declined to fewer than 100 Jews. This reflects the Soviet policy shift begun in 1980, when newly-imposed restrictions sharply limited the number of Jews able to apply for family reunification. The 1984 total, which is less than two percent of the 1979 peak year emigration figure of 51,320, suggests that the Soviets have now effectively closed the gates. These gates had previously been opened for over 260,000 Soviet Jews who were allowed to emigrate in the last 14 years.

The reduction in the number of Jews granted exist visas left an estimated 20,000 "refuseniks" stranded. This figure is a conservative estimate, since it accounts only for those Jews who submitted formal applications to leave for Israel and received official refusals. The figure does not include those who have been arbitrarily denied even the right to apply for exit permits, those who have applied but received no official answer from the authorities, or those who choose not to publicize their plight for fear of reprisals.

Jews categorized as refuseniks were increasingly treated as outcasts from Soviet society. Separated from their families and from Israel, they have been forced to wait indefinitely for permission to leave with no assurance that they will, in fact, ever receive it. Over 120 families are known to have waited more than 10 years. Following the submission of their applications to emigrate, most refuseniks are routinely dismissed from their jobs and forced to take menial jobs or risk criminal prosecution on charges of "parasitism." Other forms of harassment have included the expulsion of their children from colleges and universities, military conscription selectively applied as a punitive measure, defamatory and anti-Semitic attacks in the media, arbitrary arrests, and the confiscation of personal property, with little or no effective means of legal recourse.

To counter Western criticism of its emigration policies, Moscow claimed that "all the Jews who wanted to leave have already done so." With the formation of a public "Anti-Zionist Committee" in 1983, the Soviet Union created a convenient mouthpiece for promoting this fiction and defending official policies. The Committee and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs continued to use the media to promote the claim that the process of family reunification had ended.

According to the Committee, Jews are no longer interested in emigrating, although available statistics indicate that more than 350,000 have begun the emigration process.

ANTI-SEMITISM

The tight policies aimed at Jewish emigration were accompanied by an escalation of efforts to isolate and intimidate Jewish activists. At the same time that it was becoming impossible to leave, it was also becoming virtually impossible to live as a Jew within the Soviet Union.

Scores of private Hebrew teachers were warned by the police and the KGB to stop teaching Hebrew or be severely punished, although the private teaching of other languages is permitted. In many cases the homes of teachers were systematically raided and Hebrew materials confiscated. Private seminars on Jewish history and culture were also repressed and forcibly dispersed. In general, the authorities seemed bent on pursuing policies aimed at the total obliteration of any vestiges of Jewish religious and cultural identity, and the forced assimilation of Soviet Jews.

The public Anti-Zionist Committee continued to spearhead a virulent anti-Semitic campaign in the Soviet media. This campaign, thinly disguised as anti-Zionism, featured scurrilous attacks on individual Jews, Judaism, the Jewish people and the State of Israel. In October, Committee Chairman David Dragunsky held a press conference to reiterate propagandist claims that Zionists and Nazis collaborated during World War II. He alluded to a "deal between the Zionists and Hitler" and, in a bizarre turnabout, blamed them for "launching the war and the policy of genocide." Ignoring the annihilation of six million Jews, and the arrests of known Zionists by the Nazis and by the Stalinist regime, Dragunsky charged that the motivation for the alleged conspiracy was the "removal of capital belonging to the big Jewish bourgeosie from Germany to Palestine."

Within a month, an hour-long documentary on Leningrad television equated refuseniks with anti-Soviet behavior, alleging they are coerced by "outsiders" to continue their emigration activities.

Several well-known Leningrad Jews, including Lev Shapiro, Yakov Gorodetsky, Iosif Radomyslsky, and Aba Taratuta, were publicly identified as "Zionists who are nurtured by gifts they receive from the West." Ignoring the fact that they, as well as others, were fired from their jobs after applying for exit visas to Israel, it was alleged that they "refuse to do productive work, preferring to do manual labor and live on gifts." The broadcast, aimed at dissuading Jews from seeking repatriation to Israel, concluded that life in Israel is terrible. It interspersed footage of demonstations by Jews and Arabs, and warned the Soviet people to "beware of the dangers of Zionism."

Other themes touted by the Anti-Zionist Committee and given widespread media coverage included the equation of Hebrew teachers and Jewish cultural activists with spies, criminals and traitors, the alleged role of Jewish capital in Western military industry, and the "Zionist" influence in the Western media.●

WHERE DID JOHNNY GO?

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a poem which I am including in the RECORD. This poem was sent to me by City Councilman Bill Mitchell of San Diego and it deals with the pain and memories of losing a loved one to war. I, as a Vietnam veteran, saw friends fall in combat and know what their families went through. As elected officials we should take every opportunity to honor those men and women who have made the ultimate sacrifice for our country.

WHERE DID JOHNNY GO?

We raised him all those years.
Experienced laughter and shed some tears.
Showed him all of what to do.
And most of what he knew.
Where did Johnny Go?
He traded in his blue jeans for the U.S. Marines.
The boy became a man,
and war sent him to a foreign land.
We're so proud.
He shouted out loud.
And "wanted to protect his country," he said.
Now, in far off Beirut Johnny is dead.
But, Where did Johnny Go?
Nobody seems to know.
A knock at the door.
The officer gently reported and said that he didn't know any more.
The news reported instead.
"He had no bullets, and they were all dead."
One of the proud marines.
He lived only to his teens.
And knows what it means to give his life for a friend.
They taught him to give for his country.
His life isn't gone.
His memory lingers on with his dad and his mom.
And among those who loved him.
Does his Country know the price that was paid?
And in final rest his body was laid?
Because of the war,
Their son, Johnny, won't be home anymore.
Except as they send him;
A hero to us all, a buddy, and a friend.
The pain, the memory, the love of a soul that lives in our hearts, the scars, the marks.
The loved ones just want to know.
"Oh, why did Johnny have to go?"●

DEATH OF FRANK MONGELLI

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am sad to say that one of the most respected union officials along the east coast has passed away. Frank Mongelli, vice president of the Seafarers Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship in Piney Point, MD, died last month at the age of 72. Frank was instrumental in founding this unique school which has helped thousands of young men and women develop skills which lead them to productive employment as seafarers.

Frank was a good friend of mine and was unfailingly cheerful no matter how difficult a task might prove. A member of the Seafarers Union for over 40 years, this Brooklyn born and raised son became a true advocate of the life at sea. His school became one of the finest maritime training centers in this country.

Frank began his career as an ordinary seaman and rose through the ranks to become a bosun. During World War II he served on the ships that delivered critical supplies to England. After the war Frank played a major part in helping the Seafarers Union clean up the New York waterfront. He risked his life numerous times in those hectic days as the unions fought successfully to rid the waterfront of racketeers.

We used to tease Frank quite often that his physical resemblance to the actor James Cagney would have served him well in those early days of his career.

In the early 1960's Frank was asked to turn an abandoned naval base into a maritime training school. He took to this task like a true convert and within months the abandoned base was a functioning school and shortly thereafter these first graduates, many of whom could barely read or write when they entered the classroom, graduated with honors. Throughout his lifetime the graduates from this school were the greatest joy in Frank's life.

I know that many Members serving here have reason to know how productive this school has become. It is a fitting memorial for the man who brought it all about.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include the article about Frank's death which was published in the Log, the official publication of the Seafarers Union.

The article follows:

FRANK MONGELLI IS DEAD AT 72

Frank Mongelli, one of this Union's most trusted and dedicated officials, died at his home in Valley Lee, Md. Jan. 11. He was 72 years old.

At the time of his death, he was vice president of the Seafarers Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship in Piney Point, Md. One of the founders of the school, Mongelli was instrumental in helping thousands of young men and women develop a new direction and skills to lead richer and more rewarding lives.

A member of this Union for more than 40 years, Frank participated in nearly all of its major beefs and organizing drives. He was known for his physical courage, his loyalty and the leadership qualities that he displayed when asked to take charge of a situation.

Mongelli made major contributions to the development of the American-flag merchant marine. He was incredibly gracious. He made sure that everyone who came to the Lundeberg School felt good about themselves, the SIU and the maritime industry.

He was the embodiment of this Union's commitment to education and human dignity. In many ways, Mongelli's most valuable contribution to the school was the example that he set with his own life.

He overcame poverty and early obstacles to become the head of one of the finest maritime training centers in the country. He never forgot where he came from: "Hell's Kitchen" and the streets of New York. He often said that his first real break in life occurred when he joined the SIU in 1940.

He helped carry supplies to England during World War II. He began his career as an ordinary seaman and rose through the ranks to become a bosun.

Mongelli played a major part in helping this Union clean up the New York waterfront during the 1950s. He risked his life more than once so that our membership could work in a safe and rewarding atmosphere.

He started sailing at a time when seamen were treated as second class citizens. He lived to see the day when they were respected members of the community.

Like many of the people who built this Union—Harry Lundeberg, Paul Hall, Frank Drozak—Mongelli had a dream: that seamen could overcome the oppression and exploitation that they were subjected to on the waterfront. That could only be accomplished, he realized, through education and trade unionism.

When Paul Hall conceived the idea of building the Seafarers Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship more than 20 years ago, he turned to Frank Mongelli to transform that dream into a reality.

When the Seafarers first bought the Harry Lundeberg School, it was nothing more than an abandoned naval base. For several months, Mongelli and his devoted wife, Liz, lived alone on the base. Frankie assembled a team of SIU stalwarts, and they began to renovate abandoned buildings and tore down rotting piers.

The school slowly took form. Within several months, the base was functional. A training program was established.

Mongelli set a tone for Piney Point. Because of his early experiences, he understood that young people need discipline and love. He gave the trainees who came through the school equal doses of both.

Many of the young men and women who came to the Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship had little reason to hope for a bright future. Many came from poor or broken families. Others could barely read or write.

Thanks to Frank Mongelli, these people left the school with something priceless: a choice. They now had the tools to make a decent living. They could upgrade, or improve their educational skills. They had hope.

To Frank Mongelli, the Union's motto—the Brotherhood of the Sea—was more than just words. It was something that he lived—something that he honored even in death.

His funeral was held at the auditorium of the new hotel, which was fitting for someone who gave everyone connected with the SIU a place that they could call their second home.

His casket sat beneath pictures of Paul Hall, Andrew Furuseth and Harry Lundeberg. There was an SIU button on his lapel.

President Frank Drozak delivered the eulogy.

Drozak praised Mongelli for the life that he had lived and for the things that he had done for the Union. His voice was thick with emotion for the good friend that he had lost.

It was revealed at the funeral that the county commissioners of St. Mary's had issued a proclamation praising the contributions Frank Mongelli had made to Maryland, the maritime industry, and the education of the young.

Some 60 miles away, at the headquarters building, flags flew at half mast.

He was the first SIU member to be buried at the Seafarers Haven Cemetery. This resting place was something that he had long planned: a place for seamen to be buried so that they could be with their own.

He was carried to the gravesite by the young trainees he loved. He was buried under a brilliant blue January sky.

Hundreds of friends came to pay their last respects.

Nearby was the Farm that he had developed with his own hands, and the Alcohol Rehabilitation Center that he had helped establish.

In the distance, clearly in view, was the Seafarers Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship, glistening on the banks of the St. George's River.●

CALLING FOR THE RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY IN CHILE

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, over the past 5 years, military juntas in Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Uruguay, and Brazil have been replaced by elected civilian governments. Chile is the most prominent exception to this promising trend.

After more than 11 years of military dictatorship, thousands of Chileans, led by the Catholic Church, the labor movement, and the democratic political opposition, have joined to demand that Gen. Augusto Pinochet restore democracy to Chile.

President Pinochet, however, has resisted the democratic aspirations of the Chilean people. He has failed to follow the democratization process outlined in the Chilean Constitution adopted in 1980, and on November 6, 1984, he imposed a state of siege. Under the state of siege, press censorship has increased, the right of assembly has been restricted, more than 8,000 people have been temporarily detained, and over 600 have been internally exiled without due process.

The state of siege, which was scheduled to expire on February 4, has been extended for another 90 days. To protest Pinochet's extension of the state of siege, the Reagan administration has informed the Chilean Government that it will abstain from an Inter-American Development Bank vote on a $130 million loan to Chile. The administration should be commended for this action, for the U.S. abstention on Chile's loan request sends an important message in support of democracy and human rights to the Pinochet government.

The restoration of democracy requires not just the lifting of the state of siege but the resumption of a dialog between the Chilean Government and the democratic opposition and an immediate end to human rights violations by the Pinochet government. In recent years, according to Amnesty International, the military Government of Chile has practiced a pattern of arbitrary detention, political imprisonment and systematic torture, all designed to intimidate possible political dissent into silence. The violence of the Pinochet regime has not been confined solely to Chile, as demonstrated by the military government's responsibility for the September 1976 killings of Orlando Letelier and Ronni Moffitt in the streets of Washington, DC.

The Chilean people want democracy reestablished in their country. To demonstrate U.S. support for the Chilean people in their desire for a return to democratic rule, a bipartisan group of 53 Members of the House have joined me in introducing a resolution calling upon the U.S. Government to continue to deny all military assistance and to deny nonhumanitarian assistance to Chile until its military government returns Chile to democracy.

I urge my colleagues to join me and the original cosponsors of this legislation, Mr. BARNES, Mr. PORTER, Mr. LEACH of Iowa, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. KOSTMAYER, Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. BERMAN, Mr. BONIOR of Michigan, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. CROCKETT, Mr. DELLUMS, Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota, Mr. DYMALLY, Mr. EDGAR, Mr. EDWARDS of California, Mr. FAUNTROY, Mr. FEIGHAN, Mr. FOGLIETTA, Mr. FORD of Michigan, Mr. FRANK, Mr. GARCIA, Mr. GEJDENSON, Mr. HALL of Ohio, Mr. HAWKINS, Ms. KAPTUR, Mr. KASTENMEIER, Mr. LANTOS, Mr. LEHMAN of Florida, Mr. LELAND, Mr. LEVINE of California, Mr. MACKAY, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. MILLER of California, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MOAKLEY, Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut, Ms. OAKAR, Mr. OBERSTAR, Mr. OWENS, Mr. PENNY, Mr. RANGEL, Mrs. SCHNEIDER, Mr. SEIBERLING, Mr. SOLARZ, Mr. STOKES, Mr. STUDDS, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. WALGREN, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. WOLPE, in supporting this effort to restore democracy to Chile.

H. CON. RES. —

Whereas over the past five years, military, juntas in Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Uruguay, and Brazil have been replaced by elected civilian governments, but in Chile, the government of General Augusto Pinochet has hindered the restoration of democracy in that country;

Whereas on Novermber 6, 1984, the Pinochet government imposed a state of siege that has resulted in increased press censorship, greater restriction on the right of assembly, and the temporary detention of more than 8,000 people and the internal exile of more than 500;

Whereas the imposition of press censorship and the extensive arrests of opposition political figures during the state of siege impair the movement toward democracy in Chile;

Whereas Amnesty International has noted that in recent years there has been a marked deterioration in the human rights situation in Chile, demonstrated by a consistent pattern of arbitrary detention, political imprisonment and killings, and systematic torture;

Whereas Amnesty International, the International Commission of Jurists, the United Nations Human Rights Commission Ad Hoc Working Group on Chile, the United Nations General Assembly, and the Organization of American States Commission on Human Rights have stated that the regime of Augusto Pinochet has violated basic human rights and political freedoms in Chile since the 1973 military coup in that country;

Whereas the restoration of democracy requires, as a first step, a lifting of the states of siege and emergency in Chile, a dialogue between the Government of Chile and the democratic opposition, and an immediate end to human rights violations by the Pinochet government; and

Whereas the Chilean people want democracy re-established in their country, and the United States is in full sympathy with the deeply-felt desires of the Chilean people for a return to democratic rule: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress—

(1) supports the Chilean people in their efforts to end the military dictatorship and bring about the peaceful restoration of democratic institutions and human rights in Chile; and

(2) calls upon the Government of Chile to negotiate with the democratic opposition for a return to democratic rule.

SEC. 2. Until Chile returns to its long tradition of democratic procedures and institutions and of respect for internationally recognized human rights—

(1) the United States—

(A) should continue to deny any and all direct and indirect military assistance (including cash sales) for the Government of Chile, and

(B) should cease any and all joint military-related activities (including joint military exercises) with the Government of Chile;

(2) the United States should deny all forms of economic assistance to Government of Chile;

(3) the Overseas Private Investment Corporation should comply with the human rights requirements of section 239(i) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 by not issuing any additional investment insurance pursuant to its 1983 agreement with the Government of Chile; and

(4) as mandated under section 701(f) of the International Financial Institutions Act, the United States should oppose all loans and grants to Chile by international financial institutions such as the Inter-American Development Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the International Development Association, unless such assistance is specifically directed to programs which serve the basic human needs of the people of Chile.●

COURAGE NEVER QUITS: JOSEPH DAVID PISTANA, 1964–1985

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the ancient Roman dramatist Plautus wrote:

Courage is the best gift of all; courage stands before everything. It is what preserves our liberty, safety, life, and our homes and parents, our country and children. Courage comprises all things: a man with courage has every blessing.

A man of such blessing was Joseph David Pistana, who was a resident of Centerville, OH, and an intern in my Washington office.

On January 10, 1985, Joe died at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute in Boston. Joe's death followed a 2-year-long bout with cancer that never shook his basic optimism, deep sense of purpose, or courage.

Joe was born on May 7, 1964, in Bloomington, IN. From his boyhood days, Joe spoke of his life ambition to attend the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. To achieve that goal, he became an honor student at Centerville High School, from which he graduated in 1982. He demonstrated his leadership by serving as president of the marching band and participating in numerous other student organizations. His creative side showed through his musical ability and his performance in school productions.

Joe's diligence paid off when I appointed him to the West Point class of 1986. The class motto could have been Joe's own creed: "Courage Never Quits."

A year ago, Joe took a leave from school for treatment at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Because the treatments did not take all his time, in May, Joe volunteered as an intern in my office. At first he performed routine filing and clerical duties. However, later he performed more important duties, including arranging tours and other constituent services.

Joe filled the office with his cheer and good nature. He executed his duties with a soldier's precision; yet at the same time he showed understanding and sensitivity. He still considered service to be his highest calling, and this showed in every task he undertook.

One constituent, the wife of a naval officer stationed in Virginia, worked with Joe in arranging tours for guests staying at her house. So moved was she by Joe's courtesy, she wrote to me:

Not only is Joe's telephone personality most pleasant, he is also wonderfully thorough and efficient. His efforts helped ensure a memorable experience for my guests . . . and for me, too.

Joe was fully convinced that his fight with cancer would be like every other battle he had fought and won. His confidence in the future was never daunted. However, when his condition failed to respond to chemotherapy and grew more threatening, he was concerned that the Army would offer him a medical discharge.

Last year, shortly before he left for further treatment in Boston, he wrote a letter to Lt. Gen. Willard W. Scott, Jr., superintendent of West Point. In the letter, Joe reaffirmed his own faith, and sought to assure the general of his continued ability to serve his country as an Army officer:

SIR: I have wanted to attend West Point for as long as I can remember. Spawning from an intense interest and fascination in history, especially military history, I resolved that the Academy was the best route to pursue to reach that personal goal of obtaining a commission in the U.S. Army. Now, I wish to strongly reaffirm my desire to remain as a cadet at the United States Military Academy and serve as an officer in the United States Army.

Since my hospitalization, I have undergone an extensive amount and variety of treatments and operations in the effort to eradicate my cancer. I have suffered many difficult times on the road to recovery, but I have never lost faith in the eventual successful completion of my treatment. During moments of particular hardship, I frequently think of my Class of 1986 motto, "Courage Never Quits." When my class chose this simple phrase during my plebe summer, I had no idea the significance that these words would assume in my life as my rallying point to persevere in my battle to conquer cancer. I choose to fight, and with the continuing support from West Point, I shall return. Though I may occasionally suffer setbacks in my medical progress, I always maintain the will and the belief that this is a war that I can win. I will endure any hardship or suffering that will give me the chance to live a long and prosperous life. I will win because I still have many unfulfilled goals that I am resolved to accomplish.

I had the opportunity and the pleasure to travel from Washington to Philadelphia for the Army/Navy Game, and I experienced a rush of happiness as I marched onto the field with my company that was unsurpassed except for the stunning defeat handed to Navy. The Army Team and the 12th Man scored a magnificent victory that day, and I look forward to the day when I will have achieved that personal victory of my own that will allow me to return to the Corps of Cadets. I have already made plans to see another Army victory at the Cherry Bowl.

Once again Sir, I thank you for your support of my status, and I respectfully request that you maintain your faith in me as I maintain it in myself.

Beat Michigan State, Sir!

Joe is the son of Mr. James J. Pistana of Georgetown, KY, and Mrs. Judy M. Wenzler of Centerville. In addition to his parents, he is survived by two brothers, Jay and Jeffrey. I join my staff and Joe's family, friends, and fellow cadets in mourning the loss of a fine young American whose courage still lives in those who were inspired by his faith.●

PROMOTING HOME CARE AS AN ALTERNATIVE TO INSTITUTIONALIZATION OF ELDERLY FAMILY MEMBERS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would provide an important impetus for the establishment of alternative living arrangements for our elderly citizens who either live alone or are forced into unnecessary institutionalization and for their families who wish to support the dependent relative in the home.

Presently, approximately 11 percent of the Nation's population is over 65. The number of elderly living alone has increased substantially. Additionally, the number of elderly living outside the extended family has changed drastically. Twenty-two years ago, 46 percent of those over 65 lived with their children. By 1975, this figure had dropped to 18 percent.

The number of institutionalized elderly has also risen, due to a variety of variables. By the year 2030, there will be 55 million persons over the age of 75 in our country, representing 22 percent of the total population. It is critical that we now consider alternatives to traditional delivery modes of health care and social services to this population. The continuum of care for this population—which should be the core of any long-term care system that we develop in this Nation—should assure both access and choice to all those in need of dependent care.

My bill provides for a $500 tax credit to those families who maintain an elderly dependent in their home for over one-half of the taxable year. The availability of a tax credit would ease the major obstacle—cost—that many families face in caring for elderly family members.

Studies have shown that it is generally the family, not Government, that provides the most care for the elderly. The Health Care Financing Administration has estimated that between 60 and 80 percent of the care received by the impaired elderly is provided by family members or friends who are not compensated. In addition, information from the field clearly points to the family as the preferred provider of services to the elderly. However, I must underscore the fact that we still fail to have a rational, long-term care policy in this country that eliminated the institutional bias in our current federally financed programs.

At present, Medicaid is the largest single provider of long-term care services. This program pays for over half of our national, long-term care bill as compared to 1.3 percent being paid for by private insurance and 2 percent by Medicare. With over 1 million residents of nursing homes today relying on Medicaid to finance their health care and housing needs, we must recognize that we are talking about a significant share of our dependent care population.

Increasing the attractiveness of home care would also reduce nursing home costs, especially after 1972 when intermediate care facility care was added to the benefit package. By 1975, this change alone resulted in ICF care exceeding skilled nursing care and a concurrent doubling of the Medicaid long term care bill to $4.3 billion. Today, Medicaid expenditures in this area have again doubled since 1975 as a result of added factors: Rising costs of care as compared to number of recipients; elimination of provisions for family supplementation of nursing home payments and SSI provisions which reduce benefits to beneficiaries living with each other.

Providing a $500 tax credit for home care expenses would be an important first step to implement a national policy of long term care. This bill cannot, however, be viewed as an isolated proposal. There must be efforts made to promote comprehensive policies that assure a continuum of care of elderly citizens.

We are beginning to receive substantial evidence of the need for both home care alternatives specifically, as this bill would provide, as well as the value of community based, long term care services now being provided on a piecemeal basis through both Medicaid as well as the Older Americans Act. A 1980 study by HCFA noted that between 3.6 to 7.8 million individuals may be receiving services from family and friends—or may be in need of such services, but are making due on their own.

Further evidence will be provided to us through assessments of the Medicaid home and community-based waivers authorized under section 2176 of the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981.

Since October 1981, 44 States have received waivers for a period of 3 years, which allow States to provide important community based, long term care services. Congressional and HCFA review of these waivers is critical to any rational, comprehensive effort to expand home care alternatives and implement a national, long term care policy.

If no preferred living arrangements can be provided for our ever-growing elderly population, these individuals will be forced into living arrangements not of choice—with the possible resultant loss of health status and emotional well-being.

As an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I have joined with my colleagues to encourage alternatives to institutionalization and help alleviate the problems faced by many families today in seeking to care for their elderly family members. Passage of this bill would be an important first step and I urge my colleagues to join with me in this timely effort on behalf of not only our Nation's elderly, but all our families.●

LASPAU: 20 YEARS OF ACHIEVEMENT

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to bring to the attention of the 99th Congress and our Nation the 20th anniversary of the Latin American Scholarship Program of American Universities [LASPAU]. Since its founding, LASPAU has provided inspiration and support for education throughout the Americas.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on the floor of the House of Representatives on many occasions about the interests and concerns of the citizens of the Eighth Congressional District. I am proud to commend to the attention of my distinguished colleagues a brilliant article by Lewis A. Tyler, executive director of LASPAU, in which he discusses this outstanding organization's remarkable record of achievement.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF LASPAU

(By Lewis A. Tyler)

Since its founding in 1964, the Latin American Scholarship Program of American Universities (LASPAU) has made its mark by supporting the development of universities in Latin America and the Caribbean, a mission that has molded the organization's services, relationships, and identity. Although LASPAU's services now address more than the hemisphere's faculty-development needs, having broadened in scope to include cooperation with public institutions as well, the organization's shape and purpose today are still a direct consequence of its original mission.

"Twenty years of service to education in the Americas," the phrase used here to mark LASPAU's anniversary, only begins to suggest the remarkable role this organization has played in advancing institutional development during the past two decades. Originally created by half-a-dozen individuals in Cambridge, New York City, and Bogotá as a vehicle for providing bright, deserving young Colombians with undergraduate schooling in the United States, LASPAU quickly embarked on fifteen years dedicated to facilitating the development of university teachers, researchers, and administrators.

Today the organization finds itself with services of unparalleled quality and a capacity to meet the variety of educational and training needs now emerging from the diversity of institutional development contexts included in the collective entity, Latin America and the Caribbean.

Recognition for the success of this twenty-year venture which many give to LASPAU alone, must also be assigned to those institutions from which LASPAU derives its very existence. In addition to the Latin American and Caribbean institutions that have sponsored and employed LASPAU Scholars over the years, LASPAU collaborates primarily with two government agencies, the United States Agency for International Development (AID) and the United States Information Agency (USIA), whose resources have aided LASPAU for most of its two decades, and with universities in the United States that have welcomed more than 3,000 LASPAU Scholars during the program's history.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

LASPAU's principal sponsors, AID and the USIA, have complemented each other's work by sharing support for LASPAU's services. AID, however , is almost wholly responsible for converting LASPAU into a permanent organization with well-defined goals, objectives, procedures, policies, and systems. Early on, in 1966, AID established an exclusive relationship with LASPAU, which it maintained for ten years, until 1975.

During this period, when AID's and LASPAU's interests coincided in a common purpose, faculty development, their collaboration provided graduate-education opportunities to nearly 1,500 men and women from 164 universities throughout Latin America and the Caribbean. This partnership also allowed LASPAU to elaborate the skills and systems that support its services and to develop the collaborative institutional relationships that characterize its work in the hemisphere. In sum, ten years of collaboration created the recognition that LASPAU and AID were reliable resources for faculty development.

In the mid-seventies, shifting development priorities led AID to direct its resources away from universities to activities and projects aimed at improving the quality of life for the "poor majority," and 1975 saw the end of LASPAU's exclusive relationship with AID. Now, contractual relationships with USAID missions, which know LASPAU's history of providing cost-effective expert services, enable LASPAU to support educational activities in 13 Latin American and Caribbean countries. These contracts call for selection and administration of participants from ministries, research institutes, extension agencies, private voluntary organizations, and universities.

In 1975, the Fulbright Academic Exchange Program, realizing the efficacy of LASPAU's concept of faculty development, enlisted LASPAU's services—evaluation and selection of candidates, placement in academic programs, English-language training and orientation, academic monitoring, and financial administration. Now under the auspices of the USIA, Fulbright-LASPAU focuses a portion of Fulbright's resources specifically in university development, reinforces LASPAU's fundamental mission, and widens access to advanced study in fields like the arts and humanities, education, and the social sciences.

Fulbright-LASPAU affords opportunities for short-term, non-degree study too, in contrast with the master's-level emphasis of most LASPAU-administered programs. This joint program has allowed LASPAU to establish working relationships with Fulbright posts and commissions, and to deliver faculty-development services to 21 countries in the Latin American and Caribbean region.

UNIVERSITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

The concept that established LASPAU in 1964 still prevails today. This organizing principle, that the costs of a scholarship be distributed among the entities that share in the scholarship's benefits, is clearly visible in the role the United States academic community has played in LASPAU's success. Universities in the United States have contributed the equivalent of about $25 million in tuition waivers, scholarships, and other forms of financial assistance to the more that 3,000 LASPAU Scholars, concrete evidence of their outstanding commitment to international education. Balancing and reinforcing that commitment, however, have been the now well-established benefits of receiving well-selected, well-funded international students whom LASPAU carefully matches with the specific academic characteristics of particular U.S. institutions.

The commitment of these North American universities cannot be measured solely in financial terms however. Each school has always welcomed LASPAU Scholars as professionals whose presence reflects a very special objective: contributing to the development of sister organizations in the hemisphere. This commitment, an explicit part of the LASPAU Scholars' appeal to U.S. institutions, also contains a corollary benefit, establishing the cross-cultural ties among scholars that are the hallmark of international educational exchanges.

INSTITUTION IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Beginning in 1964 with ICETEX, Columbia's educational credit agency and a cofounder of LASPAU, institutions in Latin America and the Caribbean have played an integral role in building LASPAU. National science foundations, ministries, educational credit agencies, agricultural development institutes, training centers, universities, and others have expertly performed functions that complement those carried out by the United States government agencies and universities.

These functions include: identifying candidates capable of using advanced training to further their institutions' development; continuing Scholars' salaries to help pay their living costs during their studies; covering the costs of English-language training and orientation; and employing returning Scholars in positions that take advantage of their new skills. In return for these commitments, the Scholars' home institutions have also reaped the benefits of applying resources culled from so many differing sources and, often, of taking part in further exchanges with the international academic community.

The foundations built by these three sets of institutions, working in concert with LASPAU, may find their fullest expression in the achievements and later careers of LASPAU's 3,000-plus Alumni, an issue LASPAU is now reexamining in its second Alumni Survey, an in-depth follow-up to the first, which was carried out under a grant from the State Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs (now part of the USIA). A complementary view of this program's effects may also emerge from two other sources, both of which will appear in this and future issues of the Informativo. The first, a series of Occasional Papers, will explore changes in Latin American and Caribbean universities over the last two decades.

The initial paper in this series, an overview of changes in university governance and structure, follows this article. Others, primarily case studies describing and analyzing changes in the practice of specific disciplines and particularly in research, teaching, and extension, will appear in subsequent issues. Rounding out these views will be articles on the U.S. university-LASPAU partnership, which the Informativo will also publish. By these and other means, LASPAU plans to mark its "Twenty years of service to education in the Americas" that institutions throughout the hemisphere have sustained.●

ACIR MEMBERSHIP LEGISLATION

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to expand the membership of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. I am pleased to be joined in this effort by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCGRATH], the prime sponsor of similar measures in prior years, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations and Human Resources.

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations [ACIR] is a federally supported, bipartisan, independent body established in 1959 to monitor the operation of the American Federal system, to study and report on intergovernmental issues, and to recommend improvements for the functioning of the system. It is clear from the legislative history that ACIR was intended to be a genuine interlevel body, not an agency dominated or controlled by any one level of government. Over its 25-year history, the composition of the Commission has remained at a constant level of 26 members: 3 U.S. Senators, 3 U.S. Representatives, 3 Federal executive branch officials, 4 Governors, 3 State legislators, 4 mayors, 3 county officials, and 3 private citizens.

This membership arrangement has proven successful in the past. However, as the Federal system has continued to evolve, it has become increasingly clear that two key participants in the intergovernmental system are not adequately represented on ACIR: local school board officials and township officials. Consequently, the measure I am proposing today would add two seats to the Commission designated for representatives from these two groups. Both new members would be selected in a similar manner to existing ACIR members—appointed by the President from a list submitted by their respective associations, in this case the National School Boards Association and the National Association of Towns and Townships.

There are several sound reasons for including these two additional members on ACIR. Local school boards are policymaking bodies, have broad interests, and expend approximately $130 billion per year. They provide direct services to a very large portion of the population and perform many of the same functions as general units of government, such as transportation services, provision of nutrition services, and oversight of construction projects. School boards are affected by an array of Federal and State Government decisions in countless areas.

Similarly, townships provide a wide range of essential services to their citizens. They are general-purpose units of local government as defined by the U.S. Census Bureau. Townships are structurally different from cities and counties and tend to be rural and small. Townships like school boards, are affected by voluminous Federal and State decisions in numerous areas.

Inclusion of these two members on ACIR would acknowledge the changes that have taken place in our Federal system over the past 25 years and provide a more representative intergovernmental panel. School board officials and township officials would make significant contributions to the deliberations and recommendations of ACIR. I urge my colleagues to join us in endorsing this reasonable expansion of the Commission.●

CRITIQUE OF THE WAR POWERS ACT

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, the current edition of the New Republic magazine carries an important article by Mr. John Silber, president of Boston College and a member of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America.

Mr. Silber offers a devastating critique of the War Powers Act and the shameful conduct of Congress over the years in attempting to redirect Presidential foreign policy. As Mr. Silber points out, Congress should provide leadership, not politically motivated second guessing, and critics on both the right and the left acknowledge that our foreign policy has suffered from congressional efforts to share policymaking with the President.

Foreign policy is sure to play an important part in our congressional agenda this year. I ask that Mr. Silber's article be submitted to the RECORD and ask each and every one of my colleagues to read it before we blunder through another year of intervention and confrontation with the President over the conduct of his foreign policy.

CAN WE AFFORD THE WAR POWERS ACT?

PRESIDENTIAL HANDCUFFS

Since the Vietnam War, U.S. forign policy become a matter of constant and embittered controversy, not merely between the party in office and its opponents, but within parties. No president, however farsighted and decisive, can now conduct an effective foreign policy. Increasing challenges to American interests in Central America and elsewhere, and the War Powers Act and other congressional restraints on the executive branch, have created a dangerous whipsaw which renders our foreign policy erratic and ineffective.

Nicaragua, dominated by Cuba, and apparently determined to emulate the Cuban example of totalitarian government, military aggressiveness, and subservience to the ambitions of the Soviet Union, has embarked upon a policy of militarism—a course that threatens the Nicaraguan people as well as the peace and security of the isthmus. Nicaragua provides a safe haven for Salvadoran terrorists and radio facilities to coordinate their attacks; and it participates in the Soviet-Cuban spy network blanketing Central America and the Caribbean. Nicaragua is training an army far larger than any other in Central America, and threatens peaceful countries such as Costa Rica and Panama. The leaders of both of these countries told the Kissinger Commission they believe that if the Nicaraguan buildup continues, they will be attacked within a few years.

Yet it was the United States—not Nicaragua, not Cuba not the Soviet Union—that was condemned by the World Court in 1984 over the mining of Nicaraguan harbors. The United States was charged with helping Nicaraguan insurgents mine Nicaragua's harbors, and was found to be violating international law. The regular and flagrant violations of international law by the Soviet Union and its surrogates are well known, yet the Soviet Union, which has never acknowledged the court's jurisdiction, goes unpunished. Indeed, the majority of the judges who decided against the United States are from countries that do not accept its jurisdiction.

In dealing with the problem of restraining power without destroying it, the framers of the Constitution made the president the commander in chief of the nation's armed forces. Congress shares in the determination of foreign policy, but the president is responsible for its conduct. Abraham Lincoln conducted the opening stages of the Civil War as an executive act. After the attack on Fort Sumter, he gave Congress 80 days to assemble, but in the interim he called up the militia, blockaded southern ports, raised an army of 300,000 volunteers, and suspended habeas corpus. It is doubtful that he could have gotten most of these actions approved by Congress, although when Congress met, it tacitly approved his faits accomplis.

This separation of powers remained in place until the close of the Vietnam War. Ever since the War Powers Act of 1973, the separation of powers has been compromised. The provisions of this act deprive the president of the authority to back his diplomacy with military action short of declared war. Confronting challenges of the sort posed by the Nicaraguan government and the Salvadoran guerrillas, the president has three choices, all bad: (1.) to do nothing; (2.) to ask for a declaration of war; or (3.) to try to find his way through a thicket of legal restraints that inevitably give rise to accusations of illegal conduct. President Reagan rejected the first two options when faced with the situation in Nicaragua; and the whipsaw has caught him on the third. It would catch any president.

To understand why, under the prevailing circumstances, any president will be ineffective in the conduct of foreign policy, we must understand how the president's essential freedom of maneuver has been restricted by a series of laws, amendments, and continuing resolutions that transfer responsibility for the conduct of foreign policy, especially its military aspects, to a deliberative body. The constitutionality of many of these measures has yet to be thoroughly tested: it should be.

The War Powers Act, passed over the veto of President Nixon in 1973, was a drastic response to the continuation of the Vietnam War. Presidents Johnson and Nixon had tried to conduct a full-scale war as if it were a police action, an error in which Congress was complicit. The effects of the act, perhaps unforeseeable in 1973, have now become manifest. In a world filled with subversion, terrorism, and shifting geostrategic pressures, Congress must be consulted, "in every possible instance," on the deployment of our military forces. Troops may not be deployed outside the United States without immediate reports to Congress. The president may not, without approval from Congress, keep troops more than 90 days in any area where hostilities are ongoing or imminent. The difficulty in deciding whether hostilities are imminent or ongoing is obvious. Without a specific act of Congress, the president will always be open to the accusation that he is defying the law.

This means that by doing nothing Congress can force the president to withdraw troops within 90 days; short of declaring war, Congress must pass a bill announcing on what terms U.S. troops will be allowed to remain; in areas of foreign policy and military action where secrecy is often essential, publicity has become mandatory. Military considerations have thus become political issues. The president must now consider, not the efficacy of his actions, but the reaction of Congress to them. By limiting the president's ability to deploy U.S. forces, Congress essentially took upon itself the control of crucial military actions.

The War Powers Act has been joined by a host of other restrictions on the president's power to act. Various amendments to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 have sharply restricted the kinds of security assistance to countries whose human rights records do not meet our standards, even if such assistance is in our national interest, and even if the denial of such assistance leads to the abrogation of all human rights. Had these amendments been on the books in 1942, they would have ruled out all lend-lease assistance to the Soviet Union. For example, it is illegal under the act to provide antipersonnel bombs to the Salvadoran air force. The Salvadorans must buy these weapons elsewhere or use expensive and inappropriate U.S.-made anti-tank rockets against guerrilla fighters, who do not move about the Salvadoran countryside in compact units.

Our room for non-military action is also jeopardized. The Foreign Assistance Act prohibits us from assisting in the development of police activities in other countries. It thus keeps us from helping Costa Rica to strengthen its security forces, which are technically policemen rather than soldiers. Similarly, the act keeps us from assisting with legal reforms in El Salvador.

The Clark Amendment of 1976 was an early milestone in making the covert overt: it forbids the president to provide "assistance of any kind" that would promote, "directly or indirectly," the "capacity of any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual to conduct military of paramilitary operations in Angola" without submitting detailed plans to the Congress. The effect of the Clark Amendment was to give free play to Castro in Angola, who was not similarly restrained by a Cuban legislature. Cuba's ability to send its forces to Africa and anywhere else in the world with impunity is an extension of the Clark Amendment.

The Boland Amendment of 1982 further restricted the president: it specifically forbade him from assisting any group for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Nicaragua. The tangled web of legal and constitutional issues that this has created was revealed in its full confusion in 1983 when the House debated the covert-overt issue and made this topic a major item for newspaper and television reports.

But perhaps most damaging to an effective foreign policy has been Congress's unwillingness to recognize that secrecy can be essential in the conduct of international affairs. This results in an inescapable contradiction. When the details of our covert support for the Nicaraguan rebels are the subject of editorials in the newspapers and debated in Congress, we are forced to conduct our foreign policy by oxymoron: we must be either overtly covert or covertly overt. Either position leaves us open to tendentious criticism and to prosecution under international law. The Nicaraguans, while covertly supporting terrorists in neighboring countries, at least have the sense to deny it.

There is an inherent ambiguity in the current Central American situation that Congress and the American people must accept. Is pressure on the Sandinistas designed to move them toward the democratic government which they promised the Organization of American States and their own people in 1979, or to overthrow them? Is it designed to force them to stop supporting the insurrection in El Salvador and elsewhere in Central America, or to overthrow them? How do we pursue the one objective without taking steps that might achieve the other? If we put pressure on the Sandinistas, how do we know that it is enough to change their policy, but not enough to bring them down? The answers are inherently uncertain, but that is not reason not to act. The president cannot conduct foreign policy by oxymoron.

None of this is to argue that Congress should not help determine our foreign policy, or that it should not be consulted and informed on the actions taken by the executive branch. The objectives of our foreign policy must be an expression of our national will. But this requires that Congress provide leadership rather than politically motivated second-guessing, and that foreign policy be decisive, flexible, coherent, and resourceful. The current situation is deficient in each of these regards. There is always the temptation of doubting the president when he undertakes a course of action that is, in the short run, unpopular. But leadership requires looking beyond the next election and pursuing a course that is, in the longer run, in the national interest.

To require, in the absence of a declared war, that the president clear the detailed implementation of foreign policy with Congress denies him a wide range of tools needed for the effective conduct of diplomacy. The result of this policy may well be national suicide, since we in effect say to our enemies that we cannot draw a line and hold it unless they land on our beaches, and that there is consequently almost no limit to how far they can go.

The rise of Nazi Germany provides a clear parallel to the rise of the Soviet presence in the Americas. Hitler made himself master of Europe by small increments. At each step, the Western Allies refused to stop him. Hitler cannot be blamed for thinking that he could take Poland without opposition, for nothing in the behavior of Britain and France had suggested that they would draw a line and fight a war to defend it. Rather, whenever he stepped up to the line, Neville Chamberlain, the British prime minister, would erase it and draw a new one. When the Allies finally demanded that Hitler stop, it required World War II to enforce their demand.

The Soviets similarly probe to see where or whether we will draw the line. They have, for example, bit by bit discovered that we will tolerate a major Soviet offensive capability in Cuba, including squadrons of MiGs, a well-equipped Soviet combat brigade, an intelligence network, and a major submarine base. All of this violates the 1962 understanding between John Kennedy and Nikita Khrushchev that ended the missile crisis. The Soviet Union withdrew its offensive weapons and promised an end to Cuban aventurism if the United States would not invade Cuba. The conditions to which the Soviets and the Cubans agreed have been incrementally violated, without U.S. response. Even before the passage of the War Powers Act, our reluctance to proceed militarily against Soviet proxies in our hemisphere has led to their increasing presence. The act exacerbates the problem. If we do not repeal the act and remove the other restrictions on the effective management of foreign policy, we may find the Soviet Union willing and able to wage covert war in Central America or Mexico, at such a level of intensity that the refugees problem in the United States becomes catastrophic.

This is not inevitable. The Soviet Union and its proxies are led by realists in the use of power. Castro responded cautiously to our liberation of Grenada, and the extremist government of Suriname, immediately after the invasion of Grenada expelled its Cuban advisers. Had the administration submitted legislation for the invasion of Grenada, Congress would still be debating it, and while we dithered about what to do in Grenada, the Cubans would have so reinforced their military presence on the island that it would have taken major military action and the loss of many more lives to remove them.

Not the least of the bad legacies of the Vietnam War is the extent to which Lyndon Johnson's compromised attempt to defend the imperfect democracy of South Vietnam against the totalitarianism of North Vietnam has come to be regarded as the model of what happens when the executive is free to implement foreign policy. This catastrophic event has purged the national memory of other examples. Harry S. Truman promptly supported South Korea in 1950. Johnson himself took resolute action, in concert with the Organization of American States, by sending Marines to the Dominican Republic in 1965 to protect democracy. In the two decades since, power has changed hands in the Dominican Republic without violence. Any president should be free to be as resolute as Truman and Johnson were. We have, through the War Powers Act and through the amendments that have followed it, institutionalized Neville Chamberlain as the model for American presidents. If we remember what Chamberlain's policies led to, we may yet decide that it is time to reverse this disastrous trend.●

PEAS ON A KNIFE WITHOUT THE AID OF HONEY

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the frigid winter temperatures gripping many parts of the country, including my own State of Michigan, bring into sharp focus the need for sound energy policy which promotes an adequate supply of energy resources at a price the average consumer can afford. My good friend and Michigan colleague, Congressman JOHN D. DINGELL, who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has been intimately involved in shaping energy policy and making sure that the complex labyrinth of energy-related regulations remains unobstructed.

At a recent speech before the Fifth Annual Natural Gas Conference on January 28 in Washington, DC, Congressman DINGELL minced no words in letting natural gas industry representatives know that:

The Natural Gas Policy Act is alive and well and, what's more, working better than anyone expected of so complex a statute.

My good friend admonished the industry that any attempt to amend the Natural Gas Policy Act could result in:

Additional amendments—decontrol, freeze, rollback, recontrol, enhanced recovery, et cetera—which will create the same old problems of trying to put peas on a knife without the aid of honey.

I commend my colleagues to read the entire text of Congressman DINGELL's address. Its just plain practical advice.

The address follows:

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN D. DINGELL, FIFTH ANNUAL NATURAL GAS CONFERENCE, JAN. 28, 1985

Good morning. As I have said many times over the past four years, the Natural Gas Policy Act is alive and well and, what's more, working better than anyone expected of so complex a statute.

During the 97th Congress it was my goal and, happily, my success to avoid opening the NGPA. As I said exactly four years ago tomorrow, "there are compelling reasons for not reopening the NGPA." That was in remarks before the Federal Energy Bar.

My major endeavor, together with such collegues as Phil Sharp, Dan Rostenkowski, Toby Moffett, and a majority of all Members of the House was to see to it that the newly-arrived Reagan Administration did not deregulate natural gas prices through back door approaches to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. That effort, too, was successful.

During the 98th Congress, which ended at the beginning of this month, our efforts were somewhat different. Many of you in the industry came together and found one area of agreement: that there should be legislation on natural gas, but that was the only area.

I must say, little attention was paid to some of the reasons why, on January 29, 1981, I suggested that reopening the NGPA would be a mistake. The overriding concern I had was that different suggested changes would have different impacts—not only between the major segments of the industry and its consumers, but also between individual participants within the various segments.

One comment I made four years ago was, "any significant degree of deregulation would jeopardize certain gas sales contracts." At the time, many thought that all producers would support total deregulation, including the Administration. However, it turned out that many independent producers realized that any decontrol at the wellhead would certainly be accompanied by "market-out" provisions which would abrogate their contracts. This one factor, probably more than any other, contributed to the downfall of the President's proposed bill.

As the speaker who preceded me—my good friend Senator Johnston—can surely remember, the Administration bill bounded out of the Senate Energy Committee on an 11 to 9 vote—with no recommendation. Following that, the full Senate gave an overwhelming 28 votes for passage of that legislation.

Another central concern I raised four years ago was that there was a need to provide some market-ordering when decontrol of substantial quantities of gas occurred on January 1, 1985. The challenge I foresaw was "to establish a link between the price sensitivity of retail gas customers and wellhead prices." I said that, unless such market-ordering could be achieved by industry alone, or by the FERC, then it might have to be achieved through legislation. The possible actions I cited at the time may be worth repeating:

Provide a market kickout provision for distributors in pipeline service agreements.

Make pipelines common carriers and let distributors negotiate directly with producers.

Establish the principle that pipeline customers are third party beneficiaries of pipeline-producer supply contracts.

Implement marginal cost pricing at the pipeline level.

Establish an incentive rate of return for pipelines which is tied to purchased gas costs.

Eliminate minimum bill requirements in pipeline-distributor contracts.

Eliminate take-or-pay requirements in producer-pipeline contracts.

Outlaw indefinite price escalator provisions such as those which peg wellhead prices to oil prices.

Accompany wellhead price deregulation with end-use deregulation whereby gas would be sold to those end users who were willing to pay the highest price for it.

It is surprising how many of these things have occurred, even without legislation. Most have resulted from industry renegotiation and other actions, and some have come from FERC. Many, of course, were embodied in the legislation promoted on the House side by Phil Sharp, who did a fantastic job of trying to piece together a fair and workable substitute, which almost made it.

I would return again to what I said in 1981, and again in 1982, 1983 and 1984, and that is that the Natural Gas Policy Act worked—and is now working—far better than any of us involved in that year-long marathon of a Conference in 1978 could ever have expected.

Decontrol has occurred which affects almost half the gas produced in this country. But the seven years we allowed in the NGPA for industry to adjust to decontrol seems to have been more than adequate in most instances.

At present, my primary concern is that the FERC fully and faithfully carry out its responsibilities to keep a close watch on the natural gas market and to assure that it functions smoothly without rude price shocks or supply problems in any area of the country.

To that end, as many of you know, I have commenced some oversight, by raising a series of questions with the FERC and many of the interstate pipelines. It is too early to share any of the results of that investigation, since much more remains to be done in the coming months. At appropriate times during the investigation we will, of course, make various materials public, and I will do this in close cooperation with both Mr. Broyhill and Phil Sharp.

There still is a need for a shake-out in the gas industry, but I believe ordering that market will be best achieved by industry itself, with the help of the FERC.

I know a number of you are contemplating promoting legislation to repeal of incremental pricing and the Fuel Use Act, and perhaps some restrictions on imports of Algerian gas. Some, also, may be thinking about mandatory contract carriage.

On this score, I would give you the same admonition I gave four years ago: there still is no consensus on the details of natural gas legislation—even on these limited issues. For instance, the very people most supportive of repealing incremental pricing and the Fuel Use Act are the self-same individuals most strongly OPPOSED to contract carriage. Similarly, those who WANT contract carriage will simply not stand for repealing incremental pricing and the Fuel Use Act in the absence of mandatory carriage.

The severest cautionary note I would add here is that, even if a number of you COULD agree on those four so-called simple issues, and I strongly doubt you could, do not expect to go through the legislative process unscathed. If legislation is promoted, there WILL be additional amendments—decontrol, freeze, rollback, recontrol, enhanced recovery, etc.—which will create the same old problems of trying to put peas on a knife without the aid of honey.

Thank you.●

ARM HERE TO STAY

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, although the number of adjustable rate mortgage underwritings has declined with the drop in interest rates, the ARM is definitely here to stay. Federal Home Loan Bank Board Chairman Ed Gray has rightly called the ARM's the key to the survival of the thrift industry, and during the last few years of high interest rates, ARM's were the only way that millions of Americans were able to afford their own home.

Granted, there have been abuses. Last year, the Housing Subcommittee of the Banking Committee explored unsound ARM underwriting practices, such as so-called teaser rates, and possible remedies to those abuses. As a subcommittee, we concluded that an informed public is the best way to guard against ARM abuse, and called upon Federal regulators and industry representatives to form a task force to develop a public information brochure on ARM's. I believe the brochure that task force produced, as well as similar documents put out by the Mortgage Bankers Association, Fannie Mae and others have helped safeguard the public from unsound ARM's. Second, as the industry has become more familiar with the ARM, uniform sound underwriting has prevailed.

Despite these developments, ARM's are sure to come under attack in this Congress, just as they were attacked in the 98th Congress. I feel it is important for my colleagues to understand the necessity of ARM's in today's financial climate, the benefits that consumers stand to gain through ARM's and why ARM's should not be subject to statutory restrictions. Recently, Mr. James Montgomery, chairman and chief executive officer of Great Western Savings, gave a talk on adjustable rate mortgages in which he tackles ARM criticism head on. He gives a cogent explanation of why the ARM is necessary and why negative amortization—a widely misunderstood component of some ARM's—should remain unfettered. Great Western was a leader in developing the adjustable rate mortgage, and I hope my colleagues will take the time to review Mr. Montgomery's speech, which I submit for the RECORD.

REMARKS BY JAMES F. MONTGOMERY, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD AND CHIEF EXECUTIVE, GREAT WESTERN SAVINGS—TENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

I am very pleased to have the opportunity to address this distinguished group on a subject that has been extremely important to me for most of my years in the savings and loan business—the adjustable rate mortgage.

First, a little history. I remember being a relatively young person in the savings and loan business when we first went under savings rate control in 1966. My reaction at the time was that artificially created rate ceilings on our deposits might cause us, as an industry, to become a bit complacent and not quite as "lean and mean" competitively as we had been in the past.

Borrowing short and lending long under a federal regulatory umbrella made me nervous, frankly, and in 1968 at old United Saving and Loan Association, Woodie Teague and I began a program of variable rate mortgage lending. We were essentially all by ourselves in that program until 1970, when it became competitively difficult, if not impossible, for us to continue. But my feeling for the need for variable rate mortgage lending never diminished. When I went to Great Western in 1975, we, along with many others in California, entered into variable rate mortgage lending in a major and successful way.

I think there are many similarities to that time period and today. We are now in the process of offering a new, much more flexible product into the marketplace—the adjustable rate mortgage. However, in 1975, the variable rate mortgage, which was quite limited in its variability, was much more of a breakthrough for its time than the ARM is today. One important similarity, which I want to stress today, is the tremendous number of misconceptions and prejudgments about both the old VRM program and today's ARM. In 1975 I heard that the variable rate mortgage wouldn't be accepted in the marketplace, and we proceeded in the most competitive real estate market in the country to convert 60% of Great Western's loan portfolio from fixed rate to variable in about 3½ years. In the midst of that very successful conversion, we were told by the skeptics that, while the public was accepting the VRM, they didn't really understand it—and "wait until you try to increase rates—that's when they will tear your buildings down." We did raise rates. Unfortunately. We had to raise rates in the years between then and now a total of 10 times, which was the maximum number of increases that were allowed in the VRM. While our borrowers didn't like to have their rates increased, they understood, because we were raising rates one-quarter of 1% every 6 months at a time when market rates were increasing much more dramatically. They didn't like it, but they understood, and our buildings are still intact.

I was also told, and there is a particular similarity here, that the variable rate mortgage wouldn't sell in the secondary market. That has a familiar ring to it, doesn't it? That is another prejudgment that turned out to be totally false. We sold hundreds of millions of dollars of VRMs in the secondary market. As a matter of fact, we offered the buyers of loans the option of acquiring a variable interest in VRMs or a fixed-rate participation. We had takers of both types but, needless to say, our happiest buyers were those who bought the variable rate participation.

That old VRM, with its severe limits, was not variable enough, but I can tell you that Great Western was considerably better off during the difficult times of the late 1970's and early 1980's as a result of that program.

Now, in this era of almost total deregulation, we, for the first time, can offer a really flexible mortgage which has been labeled the "adjustable rate mortgage." For the first time, many of us have been able to design a loan, rather than have it created by the political process. That's a mixed blessing, of course, because it produces a variety of instruments in the market and considerable confusion. But there are some very intelligently constructed ARMs in the marketplace today, and I think ours is one of them. We have again done a successful job of marketing the new ARM and, by this year-end, Great Western will have 60% of its assets again in a restructured mode, this time in a period of less than 3 years. That is, 60% of our assets by this year-end will either be adjustable rate mortgages or short-term investments.

Nowithstanding that success, I am again hearing the chorus of prejudgments and misconceptions about the ARM. There are more comments about the flaws of the various programs in existence than there is discussion about a fundamental point. That is, the intelligently constructed ARM is the only logical way for a mortgage portfolio lender to operate in an era of true deregulation. We should focus more on that very fundamental fact. But, in view of all of the discordant notes that are regularly played about the ARM, let's focus for a moment on the current round of misconceptions in the hope that we can put them to rest.

Misconception No. 1: The feature of the adjustable rate mortgage which allows a borrower to voluntarily limit his change in monthly payment is anti-consumer. This is by far the most important misconception, and those of us who really understand ARM lending have an important responsibility to correct the record. So-called negative amortization is the most important consumer benefit in the ARM. What it really means is that, if the interest rate on a mortgage increases faster than one's ability to absorb changes in his or her monthly payment, he or she may voluntarily limit the change in monthly payment and have interest added on a regular basis to the mortgage until either interest rates subside or another anniversary of monthly payment change comes around. Why is that anti-consumer? Many of our borrowers, when given the choice, elect to have their monthly payments increased to a point that negative amortization does not occur because they don't like the idea of their mortgage getting larger, even temporarily. This is the point that is so important—the decision is totally within the borrower's control.

Maybe to fully understand the reason for this confusion, we should go to misconception No. 2.

Misconception No. 2: Is that a 2% annual cap on ARM is less than a 7½% cap. I am amazed at the sloppiness by even some of our learned members of the academic community, in discussing ARMs, who routinely mix the terms "percent" and "percentage points." We talk about a 2% annual interest cap, which is common in a lot of mortgages, when we really mean a 2 percentage point annual interest cap. A 2 percentage point interest increase in a year, which would bring a 10% mortgage to 12%, is really a 20% increase in interest and, if negative amortization is not allowed, it's a 20% increase in the monthly payment. A 7½% increase in monthly payments, which exists in our mortgage instrument, means that at a borrower's option at the end of the year, a monthly payment of $100 can only be increased to $107.50 a month. If that sounds basic and elementary, I apologize. But I have attended a number of meetings around the country where these terms are freely interchanged in a haphazard way, and the misunderstanding that exists is quite significant.

I attended a meeting of some members of our industry involving some of our federal alphabet friends and others to discuss something within the past year called an "exemplary mortgage." I was asked to comment on this "exemplary mortgage." My reaction was that I think someone has found a way to break both borrower and lender in the same year. While that did not endear me to the group, I felt it was not an outrageous statement. This particular "exemplary mortgage" would allow a 2 percentage point per year change in interest rate but prohibit negative amortization. My point was that a 2 percentage point interest change in a year's time might not be enough to protect the lender from wild swings in his cost of funds. But a 20% increase in a borrower's monthly payment might well cause foreclosure.

Let's contrast those numbers to the Great Western mortgage—and when I say Great Western mortgage, it is the basic instrument used by many other major lenders, particularly here in California. Our interest rate, which is tied to the cost-of-funds index (which we will discuss in Misconception No. 4 in a moment), can change once a month, and it can change 5 percentage points over the life of the mortgage. Monthly payments, however, change only once a year and, at the borrower's election, the payment change can be limited to 7½%. How did we pick 7½% for a payment change? At the time we created the Great Western ARM, we were in double digit inflation. We said, "If the inflation rate is 10%, let's back off 25% from the rate of inflation to a 7½% change in monthly payment, so that this has a high degree of likelihood of being within our borrower's annual change in income." Indeed, we are currently considering an ARM with a lower annual payment cap, because the rate of inflation is lower. This reflects our philosophy that, in the deregulated world, the lender must cover unexpected changes in his cost of funds—which may be dramatic—but the borrower cannot afford surprises in his or her monthly payment. So any payment changes must be clearly within one's ability to pay. It makes sense. Our borrowers understand and accept it, and I will be most distressed if members of the academic and regulatory communities (who perhaps have never made a mortgage loan) are successful in significantly altering the terms of what I consider to be the most sensible quid-pro-quo between borrower and lender yet developed.

Misconception No. 3: Adjustable mortgage loans, with their specter of future payment shock, represent serious actual and potential delinquency problems. We went through this dialogue with a number of consumer advocates in the 1970's about the variable rate mortgage, conjuring up hypothetical situations in which mass foreclosures would result from the rate increases in the VRM. The worst case scenarios, by the way, generally did not contemplate a 20%-plus bank prime rate. So what happened? We had the 20%-plus bank prime rate and we didn't have serious foreclosure problems with the variable rate mortgage.

Notwithstanding that experience, we hear the doomsayers predicting mass delinquency and foreclosures with the ARM. What are the facts? While our experience is limited to only three years and $8 billion in adjustable rate mortgages at Great Western, we have excellent collection and delinquency experience. Indeed, the ARM segment of our portfolio has a delinquency rate of ¼ of 1%—the lowest of any segment of our loan portfolio. What part of our portfolio has the highest delinquency ratio? That is the loan that was most commonly used after deregulation and just before the ARM was introduced. That is, the fixed-rate loan with a 30-year amortization schedule, all due and payable in 7, 5, or even 3 years.

I said that people are concerned about payment shock in the ARM. I also said that we have a 7½% limit on the monthly payment change in the Great Western mortgage. (Our loan, by the way, provides for no change greater than 7½% for the first 10 years of the loan.) There is no payment shock possible with the Great Western ARM. Let me tell you what payment shock is. That is a fixed-rate loan with a 30-year amortization schedule all due and payable at the end of 5 years, with no assurance of refinance in an uncertain interest rate environment. That, my friends, represents real payment shock! And, if you think about it, if the ARM is reduced or eliminated, that will be the only type of mortgage written by portfolio lenders. I think we have learned that making fixed-rate loans with a 30-year amortization schedule that really lasts 30 years is called "bet the company." We know, by the way, of some who have made that "bet the company" gamble in recent years and lost the bet.

Misconception No. 4: There are many acceptable indices for the ARM but, clearly, the least acceptable is a cost-of-funds index. I have been fighting this particular nonsense since the late 1960's and through the '70's. And we are still fighting it today—even though there are clearly more variable and adjustable mortgages written tied to a cost-of-funds index than all other indices combined.

Let me tell you why I think it is good. What a lender is trying to do with an adjustable mortgage is develop and maintain a reasonable spread between the price of his finished product and the cost of his raw materials. The difference with a mortgage loan is that, when we invest a group of dollars at a certain raw material cost in 1984, we must be prepared to leave those dollars invested in a mortgage until well past the year 2000—knowing that the cost of those dollars will be variable on almost a daily basis. We need to vary the yield on the mortgage loan in which we invest those funds. What more sensible index to choose than the cost-of-funds over the entire life of this contractual arrangement?

I worry about tying my adjustable mortgages to an index which may have an historical correlation to my cost of funds, but which may operate differently in the future. I would hate to tie my adjustable mortgages to an index that is declining when my cost of funds is rising. Of course, that could never happen. We could never have a time when T-bill rates, for instance, are going down significantly when my cost of funds is rising. Or, maybe we could. Maybe, in fact, that is just what is happening now.

We found another practical reason why the cost-of-funds index works at Great Western, based on several years of experience with borrowers. In the past, when we have raised rates on VRMs and ARMs, and people called our Loan Service Department to inquire about the increase, the dialogue went something like this: "Why did you raise my mortgage rate?" The answer is simple, "Because our cost of money went up." People may not like this, but they understand it, because it is logical. If our Loan Service people had to say something like, "because the Moody's composite bond index went up," I suspect the conversations would be considerably longer and more difficult, and we would need a much larger Loan Service staff. Yet, after all these years, I still see the cost-of-funds index maligned. We haven't been shaken from our commitment to this index before, and we certainly won't be this time around.

Misconception No. 5: The adjustable rate mortgage won't work in a secondary market, particularly one tied to a cost-of-funds index. Here an examination of the statistics might indicate that the doom-sayers are, indeed, correct. Very few California mortgages tied to a monthly change in a cost-of-funds index are being sold in the secondary market. However, one must ask, is that the buyer's fault or the seller's fault? As a potential seller of ARMs, I can tell you that we are reluctant to sell them. Once we put an ARM in our portfolio with an acceptable spread over the cost-of-funds index, we are reluctant to get rid of it. I can tell you this, however. Sam Lyons, who runs our mortgage banking activities, tells me that the loan in greatest demand today in the private secondary market is the ARM tied to a monthly cost-of-funds index. Lots of demand in the marketplace, but very little supply. I guess for the same reason I want to make them, people want to buy them.

I will leave the rest of the misconceptions about the ARM for other speakers at this conference, and I'm sure we'll hear some.

I do appreciate the opportunity to share my views with you. I think it is particularly appropriate that this conference features a full discussion of what I consider to be a most important subject—not only as it relates to the health of our industry, but the viability of housing in the United States.

Thank you very much.●

BALTIMORE GAS & ELECTRIC CO. COMMENDED

HON. MARJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, for more than a decade, a nuclear powerplant has been in operation on the shores of the Chesapeake Bay in Maryland. The Baltimore Gas & Electric Co. deserves commendation for the virtually trouble-free performance of this facility and I was pleased to note that the Capital, the daily newspaper published in Annapolis, has taken the chance to extend congratulations to the management of this public utility which has quietly and efficiently become part of Maryland's mode of pleasant living. I am glad to insert the following editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time.

BG&E DID WELL AT CALVERT CLIFFS

Other than being a professional punching bag, there are few tougher positions to handle than being a local utility. Baltimore Gas & Electric Co. certainly takes its share of knocks, generally with good will and a kind of patient tolerance.

Apropos of absolutely nothing, we would simply like to take a few words to note that BG&E has successfully completed and run for 10 years a nuclear power plant at Calvert Cliffs.

The plant has not damaged the Chesapeake Bay, it has not affected the environment, it supplies a large proportion of the state's power and it was completed at a rational cost on a rational schedule.

Considering what has happened to other utilities all over the country it seems to us that BG&E deserves a pat on the back for some foresight, for competent management and for doing something right that a lot of people couldn't do right.

George McGowan is the company's president and Bernie Trueschler is the current chairman. Thanks, fellows. A nuclear power plant on the Chesapeake Bay that causes no trouble, works well and didn't bankrupt anybody many not sound like much of an achievement to some. We think it deserves recognition.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, most of us are aware that the President has proclaimed February 1985 as "Black History Month," to call to the attention of all Americans the crucial and vital role played by black Americans in the formation of our national character.

The concept of "Black History Month" is one which all of us in Congress can embrace, for too few Americans are aware of the manner in which every aspect of our lives have been affected by the contributions of outstanding black men and women.

The first blood shed in the long struggle for American independence was shed by the leader of the group that precipitated the "Boston Massacre," a black man named Crispus Attucks.

The first electric streetlights in a metropolitan area, New York City, were installed under the supervision of a black man, Lewis H. Latimer, assistant and associate of Thomas A. Edison.

The U.S. flag was first placed at the North Pole by a black explorer, Matthew A. Henson.

The nurse who founded the Underground Railroad and who did so much to raise money for the Union cause during the Civil War was a black woman, Harriet Tubman.

The second American woman poet to have her works published was a black woman who lived in colonial times, Phillis Wheatley.

The first Secretary of Housing and Urban Development was a black man, Dr. Robert C. Weaver.

In addition, blacks such as Jesse Owens and Jackie Robinson in the field of sport, Sidney Poitier and Harry Belafonte in the field of entertainment, and Dr. Ralph Bunche in the field of diplomacy, did much to break down long-outdated racial barriers and to provide role models for young people of all races and creeds to emulate.

Mr. Speaker, the President has asked that, during the 59th annual "Black History Month," we especially reflect on this year's theme, "The Afro-American Family: Historical Strengths for the New Century."

I am asking that the President's proclamation of "Black History Month" be read into the RECORD at this point, and urge all of our colleagues to join with me in calling to the attention of all Americans the significant contributions made by blacks to the American experience:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC.

NATIONAL AFRO-AMERICAN (BLACK) HISTORY MONTH FEBRUARY 1985

On February 1st we begin the Fifty-Ninth Annual Black History Month, a national celebration of the role of Black Americans in all segments of life in this nation and of Black culture around the globe.

This year's Black History Month theme, "The Afro-American Family: Historical Strengths for the New Century" reflects my belief that if families are strengthened, other social ills will be lessened. It is in the home that we learn respect for authority, the importance of protecting the weak, a sense of honor, and justice.

If families are the building blocks of society—then society has a great stake in sound families. That is why black families throughout this great nation can be a powerful, organizing theme for America's social policies.

It is a very special privilege for me to call on the people of the United States to join in this important time of exploring, learning, appreciating, and saluting all that Black Americans have done to help build our country.

REMEMBERING FRED WILSON

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the passing of a very special man in my community of Queens: Mr. Wilfred Wilson. Known to all of us as Fred, he devoted over 30 years of his life to building a better life for his family and neighbors in Rochdale Village. In the eyes of the community, Fred represented all that was good about leadership. He was concerned for the people, he wanted better education, better housing and jobs for all. Fred worked hard to ensure that concrete foundations were in place so that future generations of our community would enjoy these advantages. He took pride in leaving a legacy, his beloved cousin and the present district leader, Juanita Watkins. For her presence meant that his hard work will continue for years to come.

I would like to include now for the RECORD, Fred Wilson's obituary as written by his family.

OBITUARY

Wilfred Wilson born in Harlem on November 30, 1929, to Siefert and Winifred Wilson.

Early in his life, his family moved to 231 West 116th Street, New York City, where he spent his childhood and early adulthood.

Fred attended P.S. 10, Cooper J.H.S., Commerce H.S. and the City University of New York. During the years, Fred was a faithful and active member of All Souls Church and served as an altar boy.

Fred enlisted in the U.S. Army serving for over three years, rising to the rank of Corporal and was honorably discharged in August of 1953. He worked for the N.Y. Herald Tribune, and rose in the ranks, eventually becoming Production Supervisor. He stayed with the Tribune for 22 years until the paper folded.

Fred was united in marriage to Currin Jones, September 11, 1955. To this union was born, two beautiful children: Cheryl Renee and Eric Jay. Shortly after the family relocated at Rochdale Village. He became involved in the leadership of the community. Fred was on the Board of Directors of Rochdale Village, Inc., President of Rochdale Village Black Society, member of the Council of Black Elected Democrats, member of the PTA, the Concerned Cooperators, etc. He belonged to the Pride of Jamaica Lodge 217.

Not only did he participate actively in the electoral process but he spent many a day and night helping his dear cousin Juanita Watkins get elected as District Leader.

Respect grew in the eyes of his friends, neighbors, fellow workers and politicians to the point that in 1972 Fred became District Leader in his own right. From there he moved onward and upward remaining District Leader for 12 years. He had an organization that truly could be said to represent the rainbow coalition.

Early friendships included: former Secretary of State, Basil Paterson; former Manhattan Borough President, Percy Sutton; Councilman Archie Spigner; Assemblywoman Geraldine Daniels; Queens Democratic County Chairwoman, cousin and confidante, Juanita Watkins; City Clerk, David Dinkins and the Honorable Donald Manes.

People from near and far, upstate and downstate in Washington and New York respected and sought out his wisdom and knowledge. He was able to span the gap between races, religious and sexes. He was a real human being.

As Fred prospered in his career, he became Deputy City Clerk in charge of the Queens Marriage Bureau and second in command to City Clerk David Dinkins.

During the late hours of his life in the hospital, Fred was ministered to by Rev. Floyd Flake, Father William Galer and the Rev. Roderick R. Caesar, Jr., Pastor of the Bethel Gospel Tabernacle. He was very receptive, Psalms 32:5 is the final end: "I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." God is Good.

Fred was blessed with a beautiful grandson, Paul Montgomery—"he was the light in Fred's eyes and the hope that springs eternal."

Wilfred Wilson, dearly known as "Fred" is survived by his wife; his two children; son-in-law; his grandson and beloved father; a host of relatives and friends.

No one will ever forget this man nor can anyone ever fill his shoes. He left an indelible mark on all of us which is to be treasured and remembered with the fondest memories.

May he rest in peace forever. We will never forget his everlasting contributions to our community. To his wife, his children, son-in-law, his grandson, and father and friends and relatives. I would like to say that I am enriched by knowing him and shall never forget our work together.●

SOLAR ENERGY RESEARCH INSTITUTE

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of Colorado's Sixth Congressional District, I am proud to include the Solar Energy Research Institute among my constituency.

SERI is the Federal Government's lead laboratory for solar energy research and the preeminent center of excellence for worldwide solar research.

The caliber of research at SERI has attracted some of the finest solar scientists in the world to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

At a time when we still depend too heavily on foreign imports to satisfy our energy needs, it is reassuring to know that there are individuals dedicated to the task of developing alternative sources of energy so that our country may be assured of a balanced and mixed energy supply.

I recommend to you an article detailing SERI's mission and some of its accomplishments.

SOLAR ENERGY RESEARCH INSTITUTE

The Solar Energy Research Institute (SERI) was established by Public Law 93-473, the Solar Energy Research, Development and Demonstration Act of 1974, as the national center for federally sponsored solar energy research and development. The Institute began operations in July 1977 and is a government-owned, contractor-operated federal laboratory for the Department of Energy (DOE). SERI is managed for DOE by the Midwest Research Institute (MRI), of Kansas City, Missouri, a not-for-profit laboratory that conducts research in physical, biological, engineering and related social sciences for a wide range of industrial and governmental clients.

SERI's mission as approved by the Department of Energy in April 1982 is: To be the Nation's primary federal laboratory for solar energy research and to perform functions assigned by the Department of Energy in research, development, and testing. SERI carries out its mission by conducting and coordinating solar research and technology development which private industry cannot reasonably be expected to undertake. This work advances scientific understanding and establishes a sound technological base, enabling the private sector to make well-informed choices among technology options.

The Institute has sharpened and focused the range and scope of its activities at several points in its lifespan to accurately reflect an appropriate federal solar research and development role. SERI works closely with DOE's Office of Conservation and Renewable Energy in targeting its efforts on development of those renewable-technology areas judged to have the highest potential for significant contribution toward meeting the Nation's energy requirement over the long term.

SERI's activities complement and support the solar energy research activities and roles of other federal laboratories, universities, and industry. The Institute is working to strengthen its interactions with these organizations to ensure that solar energy is competitive in the world energy marketplace and then made available through private industry for the benefit of consumers.

Research activities at SERI are carried out under the guidance of three major research divisions and a research support division: Solar Electric Conversion Research, Solar Fuels Research, Solar Heat Research, and Research Support. Activities within these divisions support ten solar DOE program areas: photovoltaic energy, wind energy, alcohol fuels, biomass research, solar energy storage, solar thermal energy, active heating and cooling, passive heating and cooling, building energy research and development, ocean energy and solar technical information.

An additional program thrust in Basic Energy Sciences, in support of the DOE Office of Energy Research, is integrated into the appropriate area of each of the Institute's three research divisions.

PHOTOVOLTAICS

Perhaps the most exciting advances in solar energy research have occurred in the field of photovoltaics. The most used and most technically developed solar cells are single-crystal silicon types. However, the high cost of present photovoltaic systems has generally limited terrestrial applications to small-scale, remote operations. Photovoltaic arrays can be purchased for about $8-10 a watt, about six times the cost of conventional systems. At SERI, the goal is to perform research with the potential of reducing the cost of solar cells to less than $1.00 per watt. This reduction would make photovoltaics competitive with more conventional sources of electricity. There are perhaps 10,000 installations around the world powered by photovoltaic cells, most of them in remote areas.

Various alternatives to the single-crystal silicon cell are being explored at SERI. Some researchers are concentrating on producing silicon in a more cost-effective way; some are working to improve the performance of innovative cell concepts; and others are seeking new materials or processes to bring cost down still further.

The greatest potential may be in the area of polycrystalline thin-film solar cells, which offer material conservation, simplified film-growth techniques, and use of inexpensive substrates. A thin-film cell of copper indium diselenide developed at the Boeing Aerospace Company under subcontract to SERI has achieved an efficiency of more than 11 percent and recently was recognized by Industrial Research Magazine as one of the 100 most significant technological advances of the past year. As proof of SERI's success in technology transfer, Boeing has formed a joint venture with another private company to fabricate thin-film solar cell modules for commercial markets.

Another area with great potential is the amorphous silicon research project managed by SERI. Amorphous silicon can absorb 90 percent of usable solar energy in only a micron thickness. It can also be produced at lower temperatures, and deposited on low-cost substrates. Economic studies indicate that amorphous silicon modules could be cost-effective for residential applications at efficiencies of eight percent. During the past year, Chronar Corporation, under subcontract to SERI, achieved 6 percent efficiency for an amorphous silicon, thin-film module with an active area of 107 square centimeters.

WIND ENERGY

Wind Energy is an abundant renewable source of clean mechanical and electrical power. In the early 1970's, the nation's increasing dependence on imported fossil fuels led to renewed investigations of the feasibility of converting wind into useful energy. Wind has the potential to be one of the first renewable energy options capable of producing significant amounts of electric power at reasonable cost. This potential is underscored by the increasing number of wind machine manufacturers, as well as the rapidly increasing utility interest in wind energy.

In late 1984, SERI's wind energy program merged with the Department of Energy's Small Wind Energy Conversion System program and facility at Rocky Flats south of Boulder, Colorado. The combined group, known as the DOE Wind Energy Research Center, is part of the SERI organization. Its mission includes research and testing of a wide variety of machine sizes with the objective of making them more efficient and affordable as a source of clean electric power.

SOLAR FUELS AND CHEMICALS

In the United States, about 24 percent of our energy is consumed in the form of transportation fuels. Alcohol fuels can be substituted for petroleum, and alcohol can be made from biomass. Cost-effective processes to produce such fuels and the high-efficiency systems to use them could make renewable fuels a supplemental option not only in the United States but throughout the world. Methanol and ethanol are octane-rich, can be easily mixed with gasoline, and can be used in existing internal-combustion engines.

SERI's work with methanol engines centers on running a vehicle to demonstrate the advantages possible by dissociating methanol prior to combustion. Researchers have modified a standard American car to convert liquid methanol from the fuel tank to hydrogen gas at the engine. Road and dynamometer tests have revealed enhanced fuel economy and significantly lower exhaust emissions.

Agricultural residues—the inedible, unharvested portions of food crops—along with the wastes from the pulp and paper industry, and other forest products industries, are a potential biomass source. However, until recently, these resources have been largely ignored. A SERI-invented gasifier may help put them to use as ingredients in the manufacture of methanol. The oxygen high-pressure gasifier converts biomass such as agricultural wastes, wood, or municipal wastes into synthesis gas for the manufacture of methanol or ammonia. It is the first gasifier designed especially for methanol production from biomass. A private firm in the United States has announced plans to market scaled-up versions of this design capable of converting 100 tons of wood a day to methanol for less than conventional costs and at substantially improved efficiencies.

SERI also performs research in basic photoelectrochemistry, artificial photosynthesis, and photobiology. This research is expected to pay off in the form of the direct conversion of sunlight by chemical and biological systems into stable high energy chemicals suitable for use as transportable, storable fuels.

SOLAR THERMAL CONVERSION

Thermal energy is one of the most versatile forms of energy. It can be used to heat buildings and to process products in industry. Heat energy can also be converted into chemical or electrical energy.

The high initial cost of solar systems generally has limited widescale application of all solar thermal systems. Early system development has led to system costs of about $6000–$8000 per kilowatt which is about four times the cost of conventional systems. SERI's solar thermal research goal is to significantly reduce the cost of solar-derived thermal energy so that private industry will proceed with research, development and implementation of solar thermal technology.

Various approaches are being pursued. One of the most promising areas is heliostats and concentrators, since they represent about half of the system costs. Research in stretched membrane concepts and materials development such as silver polymer films for reflectors offers the potential for significant cost reduction.

The greatest potential may be in fully utilizing the unique and beneficial aspects of the solar spectrum. SERI researchers are exploring ways to effectively utilize the shorter wavelength portion of the solar spectrum for direct conversion to fuels and chemicals while using the rest of the energy as heat. Other research is seeking new processes and materials which are beneficially affected by high concentrated solar flux.

OCEAN ENERGY

The ocean has the potential to deliver significant amounts of electrical energy or energy-intensive products to reduce the nation's dependence of nonrenewable energy through the indirect conversion of the solar energy incident on its surface. Temperature differentials of approximately 20°C exist between the surface and 1000-meter depth. These thermal gradients can be used to produce energy. A working fluid such as amonia or sea water is cycled through a mechanical system that exposes it in sequence to warm and then cold water. The warm surface waters vaporize the fluid which is pressurized and expanded through a turbine to produce electricity.

SERI is the federal government's lead laboratory for R&D in advanced ocean energy conversion systems, heat and mass transfer research, and management of the open-cycle Ocean Thermal Energy Conversion (OTEC) research program. Open-cycle OTEC is an advanced ocean energy technology with potential for high payoff, since it eliminates or reduces the requirements for heat exchangers—the source of significant costs and reliability concerns in potential hardware. Fresh water can be produced as a byproduct of electricity generation in open cycle, which uses sea water as the working fluid, and thus can produce additional revenue for operating plants.

A major SERI accomplishment has been the testing and evaluation of a vertical spout evaporator concept that is more than 70 times more effective than a conventional tube and shell heat exchanger in producing steam for an open-cycle OTEC system. This development also was recognized in 1984 by Industrial Research Magazine as one of the 100 most significant technological advances of the year.

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

As its research progresses, the Institute, through a variety of activities, makes the resulting scientific and technical knowledge available to industry, state and local governments, and appropriate private sector audiences. These ongoing efforts are collectively referred to as "technology transfer" and are an important part of all research undertaken at the Institute.

SERI emphasizes personal interactions as the most effective strategy for fostering the diffusion of new technology; these include collaborative research with universities and industry, hosting of guest researchers, presentation of professional papers, and participation in scientific and technical colloquia. Other important technology transfer media are technical publications—reports, papers, books, newsletters—and R&D subcontracts. These activities are dispersed throughout the Institute and form a strong base from which technology transfer can occur.

SERI has assembled the largest group of professionals in the world to work on solar energy-related projects. Included in this diversified staff are scientists, engineers, architects, computer specialists, lawyers, and communicators. Selected from backgrounds in industry, academics, and other government agencies, this staff of approximately 500 people provides a coordinated team approach to the challenging, multifaceted problems of solar energy research and development.●

ARMS CONTROL AMNESIA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, with the recent return to the negotiating tables in Geneva by the United States and the Soviet Union, cries from all quarters are raised in support of this arms control proposal or that negotiating position. It must be kept in mind, however, that the purpose of these negotiations is to enhance U.S. and hence international security through an effective and verifiable agreement which leads to lower levels of arms on both sides.

Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, Dr. Fred Ikle, has commented in various committees here in the Congress on the impact of the return of strategic defense to the forefront of discussions on U.S. nuclear strategy. His experience and expertise in this field are well-known, and I highly recommend the following commentary on "arms control amnesia" to my colleagues:

[From the Journal of Social, Political and Economic Studies, Summer, 1984]

ARMS CONTROL AMNESIA

(By Fred Ikle)

EDITOR'S INTRODUCTION

In a nationwide television address that startled the nation on March 23, 1983, President Reagan said in part:

"Let me share with you a vision of the future which offers hope. It is that we embark on a program to counter the awesome Soviet missile threat with measures that are defensive . . . What if free people could live secure in the knowledge that their security did not rest upon the threat of instant U.S. retaliation to deter a Soviet attack; that we could intercept and destroy strategic ballistic missiles before they reached our own soil or that of our allies? . . .

"Would it not be better to save lives than to avenge them? . . .

"My fellow Americans, tonight we are launching an effort which holds the promise of changing the course of human history. There will be risks, and results take time. But with your support I believe we can do it."

Response to this address from the American public was powerful—and more positive, according to the White House, than to any previous Reagan speech. After 15 or more years of deepseated and intensifying apprehension about the Soviet Union's huge buildup of nuclear weapons, many Americans had come to the alarming realization only in very recent months that they and their families have literally no defense against Soviet missiles once they are launched. Increasingly desperate to escape from this nuclear dilemma, they welcomed and heartily encouraged President Reagan's announced determination to mount an effective defense. Following are the remarks of Dr. Fred Ikle, U.S. Undersecretary of Defense for Policy, delivered at a Washington banquet commemorating President Reagan's so-called "star wars" address.

A year ago today, President Reagan launched a renaissance in American thought on preserving peace in the nuclear age.

For far too long, some high priests of nuclear strategy have preached the policy of "mutual assured destruction." This "MAD" policy, which was crystallized in the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972, derives from the theory that, if both the United States and the USSR leave themselves and their civilian populations entirely undefended, neither will launch an attack on the other for fear of devastating retribution. Until recently, the advocates and authors of MAD have convinced themselves and other policymakers that MAD remains the most effective deterrence available, even though the Soviet arms buildup has been massive in recent years. This ideology, however, holds several false dogmas.

One of these dogmas has it that President Reagan's initiative on ballistic missile defense would overturn the principles of deterrence that have worked throughout the nuclear era. Not true. The ideologues must have amnesia.

For the first five years of the nuclear era we had a nuclear monopoly; we did not have mutual deterrence through a threat of mutual destruction.

For the next ten years of the nuclear era, we maintained extensive defenses to protect North America from Soviet attack. Again, we had not adopted a policy of mutual assured destruction, yet we had safe deterrence.

Only since the mid-1960s have the ideologues tried to make a virtue out of misery, arguing since the United States was becoming vulnerable to a Soviet missile attack, this was a good thing: assured destruction of the United States in the event of Soviet attack was said to be "stabilizing."

Another dogma of the ideologues who are opposed to missile defenses is that such defenses would hurt our alliances. Yet the President has made it clear that our allies will not be left out by his initiative. Why would it help the American guarantee to the alliance if the United States remained totally vulnerable to Soviet missile attack?

The third dogma of these ideologues is that missile defense will delay arms control. This is another manifestation of amnesia; The basic promise of fifteen years ago, which led to the treaty banning missile defenses, has been disproved. The premise was that such defense would permit us to curb the growth of offensive arms. But after the ABM treaty was signed, the Soviet offensive build-up continued its exuberant pace.

In the nearly 15 years since the negotiations on the ABM treaty began, the Soviets have added some 7900 medium and long-range nuclear missile warheads to their arsenal—an increase of 515 percent. This is arms control? Since the SALT II agreement was signed in 1979, some 3850 Soviet warheads were added, a growth of almost 65 percent. What is so valuable about this so-called "arms control process" that must be preserved by making the ABM treaty forever untouchable?

The inconsistency of our ideologues is nowhere more apparent than in their position on other arms control issues. They applaud the Biological Weapons Convention, for example, because it prohibits offensive use of biological agents. Defenses are clearly permitted. (All of us are against offensive biological weapons, except, apparently, some of the Soviet military.) Second, these ideologues oppose offensive chemical weapons, while supporting defensive chemical warfare equipment. But third, they turn their own rules upside down for nuclear arms by arguing that, here, defenses are bad.

A curious aspect of the ideology against missile defenses is the notion that outer space must be reserved for offensive missiles, so that they can travel without obstruction to create holocaust on earth. The ideology demands a sanctuary in outer space that excludes any protection for the cities we live in, but offers a free ride for the missiles that could destroy our cities.

Fortunately, while the ideologies are confused, the American people are not. They are more pragmatic (see Editor's Note below). Yet, there are some members of Congress who want to preserve outer space as a freeway for Soviet missiles to fly through and hit American cities, without obstacle and opposition. I believe the voters will find a way to explain to these members of Congress that most of their constituents do live in these cities—only a few voters live in outer space. I believe five hundred thirty-five members of Congress represent constituents who want to have defense and protection on earth rather than to preserve outer space as a freeway for missile attacks.

The President's speech a year ago has removed doctrinal blinders that have hemmed in American strategic thinking. The President has toppled an ideology that has become increasingly contrary to fact and common sense.

The renaissance in our thought that President Reagan has ushered in provides new opportunities to overcome the deadly interlock of hostile missile forces; it opens new, more creative approaches to arms control; it opens the doors to escape from the constant threat of mutual genocide.

There is evidence to suggest that over time the Soviet Union will become receptive to such a new approach that will provide an escape from the deadly nuclear confrontation with its ever present doomsday threat. You can be sure that the people of the Soviet Union also wish to escape from the present nightmare of huge and unimpeded missile forces, constantly poised for mass destruction.

As the President explained, the task is formidable. And we in the Defense Department are well aware of the enormous technical challenge and the many complexities.

But I am confident that we can count on the good sense of the American people to reject the permanent nightmare, and to support President Reagan's vision for a better future.

EDITOR'S NOTE

A nationwide professional sampling of public opinion, done by the well-known firm of Penn & Schoen for the Committee on the Present Danger and released in April, 1984, found that most Americans view the nuclear freeze as "a way to reduce the expense of nuclear arms" rather than as a measure that would reduce the threat of nuclear war. Most Americans in large majority also favor development of space-based defensive weaponry, with or without a nuclear freeze.

Among the poll's findings are these:

While 64% favor the concept of a nuclear freeze, 63% oppose a unilateral freeze, believing it would threaten U.S. security.

63% believe the Soviets are using the nuclear freeze issue "to try to gain a permanent advantage over the United States."

By a greater than five-to-one margin, Americans believe that the Soviet Union is violating existing nuclear arms control agreements.

Three out of four Americans support the development of space-based "defensive weapons."●

TAX SIMPLIFICATION

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of tax simplification, I insert the following essay written by Heather Taylor of Indianapolis:

TAXES

Taxes are the little bills your Mom and Dad get in the mail. They also hate them. Dosen't everybody? The reason why you have to pay taxes is because teachers and other workers need money. Taxes are also for paying for the stuff that you use to build buildings. Taxes help the city buy new things for you and others. You could get thrown in jail if you didn't pay your taxes. Most of the time people say that they are fed up with taxes and they won't pay them, but most of the time they end up paying them. Just be glad you aren't a grown-up. Especially if you only got 60 cents for an allowance like me. In one way you should like taxes—like they help your city get new things for you and your friends and in another way you should hate them. Bye-Bye money.●

LET'S KEEP OUR ARKS AFLOAT

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, during the 91st Congress I initiated legislation which ultimately became the Animal Welfare Act of 1970. Under its provisions, the Department of Agriculture was empowered to set certain minimum standards for the care and housing of animals, not only in laboratories but in other facilities as well, including zoos.

As a result of this, a number of marginal zoos were forced to close their doors, and others were required to update and improve many of their exhibits. This was a major step in the right direction.

The Animal Welfare Act could be described as the "stick." Legislation which I have introduced to establish a National Zoological Foundation is the carrot to encourage and assist zoos and aquariums across the Nation to further improve their programs and facilities. The 99th Congress number of my bill is H.R. 617.

The Foundation would be patterned after the National Science Foundation, and its Board would be composed of individuals known for distinguished service in the fields of zoo or aquarium management, wildlife conservation, education, humane work, zoological sciences, and public affairs. Its prime objective is to strengthen and improve the quality of zoos and aquariums throughout the United States and to encourage original and innovative programs to this end.

In the February 1985 Smithsonian magazine, the Secretary of the Smithsonian, Robert McC. Adams, outlined the fundamental purpose of zoos. I am pleased to share it with my colleagues at this point in the RECORD, and I would also commend to them the book "Lifeboats to Ararat," written by Sheldon Campbell of the San Diego Zoo, as well as "A Zoo In My Luggage" and other books along this line by Gerald Durrell. We need to keep our modern "Noah's Arks" afloat, and I would welcome the support of my colleagues in the passage of H.R. 617.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

SMITHSONIAN HORIZONS

Today, good zoos—our own included—exist to try to save for posterity the "wonderful and beautiful" species that are in danger.

I'll confess to having been initially a little uneasy about the National Zoo. Not about the enjoyment that it and all good zoos provide human spectators, but about the confinement of the animals. My own early memories of zoos are of great cats pacing endlessly in cell-like cages, or of the obsessive routines of the higher primates, whose resemblance to ourselves make observing them behind bars more painful. Granting the pleasure zoos afford to citizens of all ages, is there anything other than our own absolute dominance as a species to justify them?

There is, I am now learning. At the Smithsonian a century or so ago, taxidermists were preparing skins and skeletons for museum display on an increasing scale, but with evident lack of naturalistic accuracy. Clearly, it was necessary "to study the natural forms of living animals in order that they might impart to the prepared specimens the grace and characteristics of life." Animals were gradually brought for this purpose, numbering more than 200 by the late 1880s; the collection inevitably became a public attraction.

The spirit of conservation played a part from the outset. Public concern had been aroused over what then appeared to be the imminent extinction of the American bison, as well as other species. "It seemed to Secretary Langley," continued Frank Baker (on whose 1897 account of the first years of the zoos I have drawn), "that the Institution might do something to bring this matter clearly before the eyes of our legislators and of the public generally by exhibiting specimens of the most important animals likely to suffer extinction, placing them as nearly as possible in the conditions natural to them so that they might breed and thrive in captivity as in their native haunts."

That spirit is alive today. The new director of the National Zoo, Michael Robinson, vividly described it in a Washington Post interview as "a kind of modern Noah's Ark." Particularly as a result of the destruction of tropical habitats, of which I wrote in December, he observes that "we exist to try to save for posterity the wonderful and beautiful species that are in danger." Giant pandas provide a well-known example. Golden lion tamarins are another case in point. Not long ago these strikingly beautiful little monkeys were reduced to a handful. Now they are being successfully introduced into a new national park in Brazil as result of breeding efforts by the National Zoo and other zoos in this country.

Conditions in our particular Ark are also being made steadily more tolerable through the replacement of relatively small cages by much larger ones, as well as through clever innovations that stimulate the diversions of the natural environment. For most animals, Robinson goes on to point out, the natural environment is in any case an extremely limited and dangerous one. The myth of free-roaming animal movement just does not correspond with the real world of omnipresent predators and competitors.

Friends of the National Zoo (FONZ) has grown in a quarter-century from a group of 30 to more than 50,000 contributing members and some 600 volunteers. Even in an election year, the FONZ bumper stickers were the most numerous I saw last fall upon coming to Washington. Now I understand why.●

CONGRESS MUST CAREFULLY EXAMINE ALTERNATIVES IN CONRAIL SALE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, Secretary of Transportation Dole is expected to announce shortly her recommendation for the sale of Conrail. Congress will have to carefully examine all alternatives for the sale. What follows is an editorial from the Bergen Record discussing some of these alternatives:

HOW NOT TO SELL CONRAIL

"The Great Train Robbery": that's what The New Republic has called the Reagan administration's rush to sell Conrail, the government-owned railroad. When Mr. Reagan took office in 1981, he said he wanted to sell the railroad because it was losing money. Now he wants to sell it because it's making money. And, worse, he's offering to hold a fire sale for the benefit of private buyers.

In the nine years since Conrail was formed from the remains of seven ruined railroad corrporations, Congress has poured in $8 billion to buy out creditors, pay staggering legal fees, and modernize lines. Northeastern states, whose economies depend on the service, have foregiven the railroad hundreds of millions of dollars in property taxes. Several states, including New Jersey, have taken the money-losing commuter operations off Conrail's hands. Railroad workers have made major pay and work-rule concessions to keep their jobs. In other words, a lot of people have contributed to Conrail's present success.

Under a management that's widely regarded as the best in the business, Conrail has gone from red ink to annual profits of $500 million. It has $800 million in the bank. Wonderful, you say. Let's keep on doing more of the same. But last year the Department of Transportation sought bids from purchasers. A list of 15 hopefuls has been whittled down to three. Along the way, Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole ruled out another kind of buyer—a consortium of Conrail employees and public shareholders. She said that it would be easier to make a single buyer continue Conrail service.

In a remarkably shrewd series of maneuvers, the surviving bidders have managed to fix the sale price at about $1.2 billion. Given Conrail's $800-million cash reserves, the lucky bidder would be paying a net of $400 millon—less than a single year's profits. What a plum!

Fortunately, Congress has a veto over any sale agreement, and plenty of lawmakers are doing the arithmetic. Conrail states have their own congressional caucus, which watches every move. In addition, Rep. James Florio and Sen. Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey have made a special cause of getting a fair price for Conrail or calling off the sale. On Jan. 7 Mr. Florio urged Mrs. Dole to reconsider her disapproval of the public-sale option.

If Conrail must be sold, that option makes more sense than selling to any of the private bidders now in contention. The apparent front-runner is Norfolk Southern Corporation, a large, Virginia-based railroad that is now a Conrail competitior. Conrail workers and customers fear that Norfolk would consolidate the lines and drop some service.

Another bidder is the Alleghany Corporation, a holding company whose owners were part of the debacle that led to the demise of the Penn Central Company. Five Alleghany figures were on the Penn Central board that borrowed heavily to pay dividends and conceal the railroad's faltering condition from shareholders. Just before the public had to be told the truth and the bottom fell out of the market, several board members quietly dumped their Penn Central shares. These do not sound like ideal qualifications for managing Conrail.

The third bidder is a joint venture involving hotel executive J.W. Marriott Jr. and the Bass family of Fort Worth, whose takeover threats have intimidated such giants as Texaco Incorporated. To high-flying entrpreneurs like the Basses or Alleghany's Kirby family, dollars are plainly more important than promises or the public interest. They are speculators.

Mrs. Dole says a private buyer can be made to sign contracts guaranteeing to continue service and conserve railroad assets. It was just such promises that kept the pre-Conrail railroads in litigation for 10 years; speculators expect to go to court when their promises become burdensome.

The present management of railroad (hoping to stay on the job, of course) recommends a public sale of stock, estimating a net to the government of $1.4 billion. This option respects the interests of those who helped bail out Conrail. It rewards the employees for their sacrifices. It virtually ensures continued operation of the system. The price is lower than it should be, but better, at least, than the others. Conrail has prospered under public ownership. Some way should be found to keep it in public hands.●

AMENDMENT TO THE FOREIGN ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1961

HON. GLENN ENGLISH

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to make an exception to that part of the Foreign Assistance Act which prohibits our DEA, Customs, and Coast Guard officers from engaging in certain law enforcement activities in the Bahamas.

For 3 years the Government Operations Subcommittee which I chair has searched for ways to make our drug interdiction efforts more productive. One of the major problems we have seen is that narcotics traffickers have freely made use of the Bahamas, which lie only a few miles off the coast of Florida, to state their smuggling runs into this country.

I have seen the wreckage of smuggler aircraft strewn about clandestine Bahamian landing strips. Smuggler aircraft are routinely detected orbiting the Bahamas as they drop bales of marijuana into the sea, where waiting boats recover them. Last month an official of the Drug Enforcement Administration estimated to me that 12 smuggler boats leave the island of Bimini for the United States every day.

In response, DEA and the Air Force have been authorized to conduct an ongoing operation in support of Bahamian air interdiction efforts, called Operation BAT. We have supplied helicopters, intelligence, and expertise to support them.

Operation BAT has been effective in reducing the numbers of aircraft which stage and refuel on the remote islands, and the recent increase in air drops, where the smugglers do not actually land, is proof of that success. However, U.S. officers engaged in providing transportation and operational assistance to the Bahamians are unduly limited by the Mansfield amendment in their ability to participate, and they are wary of inadvertently exceeding their authority to assist.

But more importantly, any extension of the BAT concept to marine operations, so necessary now if we are going to capitalize on current successes, will expose our drug law enforcement officers to routine exposure to such violations. While an American helicopter pilot can try to stay removed from the arrest activity, the personnel on a boat which is making an interdiction are unable to leave the scene to the Bahamian enforcement officers.

The prohibition, commonly called the Mansfield amendment, was passed in 1975 based on a rationale of wanting to avoid any unintentional involvement in Southeast Asian affairs. We were reacting to the Vietnam experience, attempting to avoid potential embarrassment in other Southeast Asian nations. But we must accept that measures which were passed in other times, and for other reasons, can have unintended consequences today, and need to be altered.

Here are the reasons that this amendment makes sense today:

One, since original enactment, the Bahamas has emerged as the prime transit center for huge amounts of illicit drugs entering the United States.

Two, Bahamian waters and air space closely abut the territory of the United States, making timely coordination of interdiction operations extremely difficult. Drug shipments leaving the jurisdiction of the Bahamas immediately enter the territorial waters and air space of the United States, and it can be extremely difficult to determine the exact point at which that happens.

Three, the Bahamian Government is unable to mount sophisticated air or marine drug interdiction operations. By working with Bahamian enforcement officials, our DEA, Customs, and Coast Guard personnel could assist in interdicting large drug shipments before they are broken down and scattered among hundreds of boats.

Four, the administration has authorized Operation BAT, which currently employs U.S Air Force equipment and DEA intelligence and operational support, against air smugglers in the Bahamas. The BAT effort should be expanded to include marine operations.

Five, Operation BAT has had a positive effect on air smugglers, and many more drug shipments are arriving in the Bahamian for delivery to south Florida by fast boats; or are being dropped from aircraft to boats loitering in Bahamian waters.

Six, DEA has estimated that on average 8 to 12 smuggler boats per day depart the Bahamas for Florida.

Seven, while DEA agents are usually able to keep out of the way after delivering a Bahamian enforcement team by aircraft, this would be almost impossible in the marine environment, so the current law would actually operate against the best interests of this country.

Mr. Speaker, it is the responsibility of each of us to respond forcefully to the needs of our troops in this war on drugs. I hope that this bill can enjoy prompt consideration, because the relief it will bring is needed today.

H.R. —

A bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to make an exception to the ban on participation of officers and employees of the United States in certain foreign arrest actions and interrogations

OVERALL PROBLEM OF TEENAGE PREGNANCY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing comprehensive legislation, which if approved, would significantly reduce the incidence of teenage pregnancy. Over the past few years we have approved piecemeal legislative solutions to address the broad problem of teenage pregnancy. However, up to now, we have yet to devise a comprehensive Federal policy to address this national problem. I believe such a policy should place the highest priority on the prevention of unintended adolescent pregnancy—but must also help those young people who do become pregnant. That is why I am introducing this legislation which defines Federal policy on adolescent pregnancy.

My legislation contains many components which already address some aspects of the overall problem of teenage pregnancy, while going much further to tackle other aspects of this far reaching problem. My legislation would: Earmark 10 percent of the Secretary of Education's discretionary fund to help elementary and secondary schools develop Family Life Education Programs; reauthorize title X of the Public Health Services Act—earmarking one-third of family planning funds for services to teenagers as well as strengthening the program by adding a component of family life education for community based organizations as opposed to schools; repeal the AFDC change in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, that requires consideration of parental income in determining AFDC eligibility for adolescent parents who live at home; repeal the Hyde amendment which restricts Medicaid funding for abortion services and, last, provides comprehensive services to pregnant teens, teen parents, and infants to help them overcome the many problems attendant to premature parenthood, such as health problems during pregnancy and childbirth, school drop-out and welfare dependency.

As a Representative of the South Bronx, an area not unlike many other areas plagued by an extraordinary high rate of teenage pregnancy, I believe that this Congress must take bold and innovative steps to address this problem. As many of you may already know, my constituency in the Bronx is more than 90 percent minority. What's more, teenage parenthood is disproportionately, a minority (black and Hispanic) problem. Among 18 and 19 year olds, the black birthrate is almost twice the white rate; among those 15 and 17, the rate is almost three times higher. To translate rates into numbers: black girls of whom there are far fewer than whites, had almost half of the babies born to single teenagers in 1982—127,500 compared to 133,900 white births. Among Hispanic teens, the birth rate is 60 percent higher than non-Hispanic teens (82.2 births per 1,000 in 1980 compared to 51.5). Moreover, the figures for Hispanics do not reveal the enormous differences within the Hispanic population. (that is, Mexican, Cuban, and Puerto Rican).

My south Bronx congressional district is the poorest congressional distict in the country. As a result, like other similar areas, a large portion of my constituents do not have access to information and services which would be helpful in preventing pregnancies among teenagers. Moreover, once a teenager becomes pregnant, she is also hampered by limited opportunities to utilize resources which are or were available to her at one time as a result of congressional cutbacks and restrictions. Specifically, tens from poor families are usually unaware of the availability of contraceptive educational services and are prohibited by congressional restrictions to receive federally funded abortion services. Not only are they disadvantaged before and during their unplanned pregnancies, but they are severely hampered after the child is born. Thus, the adolescent mother and infant become long-term ward of the State.

A 1979 study by the Stanford Research Institute found that the consequences of adolescent pregnancy and parenthood cost taxpayers $8.3 billion a year in health, welfare, and other benefits. My proposal will not be cheap, but it will certainly reduce public sector expenditures for the consequences of adolescent pregnancy and parenthood. I believe it is a highly cost effective measure and, even more important, it is a humane proposal which will afford the next generation a fighting chance for a quality life.

Again, I would encourage my colleagues to support this far reaching legislation. Moreover, I challenge each of you to commit yourselves to radically reducing the incidence of adolescent pregnancy. I look forward to your support.●

THE FEDERAL BUDGET DEFICIT

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress begins debate on the Federal budget for fiscal 1986, I would like to insert this article on the deficit by George F. Will from the Washington Post. It provides us with valuable insight as we make the critical decisions necessary to sustain the recovery and promote continued economic growth.

[From the Washington Post]

DEFICIT? DON'T BLAME CONGRESS

(By George F. Will)

Someone should silence naughty Norman Ornstein before he spoils the sport of Congress-bashing. He demonstrates that congressional irresponsibility has not been the primary cause of the many deficits that have produced our national debt.

In an essary for the American Enterprise Institute, he notes that the $80 million Revolutionary War debt was cut in half by 1811. The War of 1812 tripled the debt, but it was almost eliminated in the 1830s. It rose as a result of the Mexican War, but then declined until the Civil War produced a $2.6 billion national debt. That caused Congress to centralize spending, resulting in two powerful appropriations committees. In 31 years (1867-1897), there were 27 surpluses. In 13 years revenues exceeded expenditures by more than 25 percent.

The Spanish-American War, combined with the 1896 recession, initiated 20 years with 11 deficits, but in 1916 the national debt was approximately what it had been in 1896. After 127 years the republic's debt was $1.23 billion. But in 1919, modern war, the foremost shaper of the modern world, had increased the debt 20-fold, to $25.8 billion. Then Congress again tightened budget procedures, and the debt again shrank, to $16 billion by 1930.

Depression deficits were almost trivial compared to those of World War II—$211 billion. The national debt as a percentage of GNP was 33 percent on the eve of the Depression, 43 percent in 1940, 128 percent in 1946.

In 1946 Congress cut the number of committees and took other measures to restrain spending. Thanks to that and economic growth, the national debt as a percentage of GNP shrank to 98 percent by 1949, 56 percent by 1961.

But in the next quarter-century there was just one small surplus ($3.2 billion in 1969). From 1960 to 1980 the debt grew from $293 billion to $993 billion. In Reagan's first term it nearly doubled, as did the clamor against Congress and four proposed constitutional amendments (to restrain Congress).

Although Congress has been, in Ornstein's word, an "accomplice" it has been less important as a deficit-maker than presidents, from Lyndon Johnson with a guns-and-butter policy through Reagan's gamble that the stimulative effect of his tax cuts would make them virtually self-financing, eliminating the need for politically hazardous cuts in spending on middle-class programs.

Ornstein acknowledges that Congress has contributed to the deficits by the decline of its institutional tough-mindedness and the rise of "subcommittee government," which has weakened central control of spending through appropriations communities. And Congress has mastered the art of bestowing blessings by tax breaks rather than appropriations.

But Congress has reduced politically profitable discretionary domestic spending by reducing the amount (as a percentage of the budget) and the discretion (adopting formula programs). Congress indexed entitlement programs, thereby stopping the politically advantageous but fiscally irresponsible process of voting ad hoc increases every few years.

In 1982 Congress, dragging a reluctant president, attacked the deficit by raising taxes in an election year. In 1983 it attacked the deficit by initiating an energy-tax increase. In 1984 there again was something like congressional government, with another attempt to reduce the deficit by raising taxes in an election year, with an essentially passive president acquiescing.

Today there are reports that Reagan will go barnstorming to rally support for substantial cuts in middle-class programs. I, for one, will believe it when I see it from the man who, as Ornstein notes, has supported almost all the water projects President Carter tried to kill, has supported swollen farm subsidies and generous farm-loan guarantees, has supported subsidized electric power and grazing fees for his westen friends, has pledged to "not stand for" cuts in the biggest sector of big government (Social Security), and wants some new deficit-enlarging programs, such as tuition tax credits. "These," says Ornstein dryly, "are not the habits of a President who would wield the line-item veto pen mercilessly."

The proposed item veto would cover only appropriations bills, and only a small portion of spending is controlled by such bills. In the $925 billion fiscal 1985 budget, there is just $81 billion in non-defense discretionary spending. And Ornstein thinks an item veto might increase spending because presidents would use it as a club. For example, he says, in Reagan's hands the item veto could be used to threaten dams and federal buildings desired by legislators opposed to MX. We would wind up buying the dams and buildings—and the larger number of MXs.

Ornstein, you see, is doubly insufferable. He robs us of two comforts; the image of Congress as a convenient villain, and the hope that constitutional tinkering can be a panacea.●

MEDICAL COMPUTER CRIMES ACT OF 1985

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing, for myself, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. SIKORSKI, Mr. LELAND, Mr. WIRTH, and Mr. SCHEUER, the Medical Computer Crimes Act of 1985, which will provide criminal and monetary penalties for unauthorized access to computerized medical records.

In 1978, there were an estimated 5,000 desk top computers in this country. Today, there are more than 5 million and by 1990, there will be more than 80 million.

With this phenomenal growth in personal computers comes the capacity to access everything from accounts in financial institutions to the classified ads. The potential damage from computer abuse, or "hacking," is enormous. And nowhere is this more true than in health care where people's lives are at stake.

I believe a real-life story of just how much of a danger computer tampering with medical records poses bears repeating.

In 1983, with just a few taps of a computer keyboard, a group of adolescents broke into the computer system at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York and jeopardized the lives of thousands of cancer patients nationwide.

These youngsters used a simple home computer to break into the radiation treatment computer at the center. As a result, they gained access to the radiation treatment records for 6,000 past and present patients and had at their fingertips the ability to control the radiation levels that every patient received.

Luckily, no one was hurt—this time.

But with the increasing number of computers and the consequent increase in the number of people who are "hackers," it's only a matter of time until someone does get hurt. Computer hacking has become a popular and organized pastime among thousands of people in this country.

Many of these people derive enormous pleasure in breaking the code and beating the odds.

But, particularly when the well-being of medical patients is involved, it's not a game. It's serious business. And it should be a crime.

There's an enormous gap in our laws in this area. Currently, there are no Federal laws, and few State laws, that specifically penalize unauthorized computer access to and tampering with medical records.

This bill would close this dangerous gap in our laws before serious harm is done.

This bill is largely unchanged from H.R. 5831, which I introduced last year and which passed the House with bipartisan support. It establishes a two-tier penalty system for people who gain unauthorized access to computerized patient files: one set of penalties for intent to obtain direct unauthorized access to medical records and one set for unauthorized access with intent to tamper.

I believe this bill will provide a very real deterrent to computer crime by fine tuning our laws and bringing them up-to-date with the level of technology in this country. It will also give patients who are harmed by computer abuse of medical records and hospitals who have their computerized records broken into some legal recourse.

And the bill would do this without requiring additional funding, and without imposing any new regulations, restrictions, or paperwork burdens on hospitals and record administrators. In developing this legislation, we consulted with the American Hospital Association, the American Medical Records Association, the Oregon Hospital Association, and the American College of Hospital Administrators.

Although this bill won't provide the full answer to unauthorized access to all computer files, it is an important first step toward establishing an effective deterrent to this destructive "game-playing."

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this measure and to take action before the first computer crime disaster becomes a reality. This bill sends the clear message that computer abuse of medical records will not be tolerated. And that's the bottom line.●

DON'T TAX VETERANS' DISABILITY BENEFITS

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a resolution today to address what I consider to be a great injustice proposed by the Reagan administration, that being the proposal to tax veterans' disability compensation. This proposal by the Treasury Department is a slap in the face to those patriotic individuals who served our country in time of war. Veterans understand the need to cut Government spending and balance the Federal budget. They realize that these measures are necessary to ensure the economic well-being of their country. What puzzles them—and me—however, is why they, who have sacrificed so much already, should bear an inordinate share of the budget cuts.

Every day of their lives, disabled veterans must live with their injuries, incurred in the line of duty. Not only do they face additional hardships as a result of their disabilities, but they also earn less in their jobs than the average worker. The purpose of disability compensation is to help those Americans who were injured in wartime to lead normal lives. At present, disability compensation is exempt from income tax payments. On the surface, this exemption appears to be a tax break for veterans. What is rarely mentioned, however, is that the tax exemption is figured into the formula for calculating a person's benefits. In effect, the disabled veteran indirectly pays income tax on his disability compensation.

Because disability compensation is already indirectly taxed, the Reagan proposal to remove the income tax exemption would effectively tax disabled veterans, not once, but twice. If passed, the President's proposal would unfairly cut into the income of those brave Americans who defended this country. Everyone would agree that this is no way to reward veterans for their invaluable service to the United States.

Letters from veterans and their families speak for themselves. One woman from San Antonio wrote:

> Our way of life and the freedom we enjoy today are because these brave men gave their eyes, hands, arms, legs, and life so we can strive for the American dream. But what of these men now? Do we cast them aside after the conflict is over? We owe them a debt which no one can put a price on. And yet a proposal is being considered to reduce their already small benefits . . .

Another San Antonian said:

> We as disabled veterans, do not ask for handouts, but it should be understood that compensating us for service-connected disabilities is all figured in as a part of the cost of wars. We do not intend to lose our dignity and wind up selling pencils on street corners like some World War I veterans.

One gentleman wrote:

> A few months ago our President stood on the beaches of Normandy and in no uncertain terms described the obligation our Nation had to those who fought for our cherished freedom. The disabled veterans of this Nation will be dismayed if this proposal is passed.

In short, these great United States, which pride themselves on freedom, justice, and opportunity, should not dishonor those individuals who fought in foreign wars to defend these cherished values. Fiscal responsibility is essential to future economic growth and, clearly, many will have to make sacrifices to achieve this end. But the Government should not make disabled veterans a target of efforts to cut Federal spending. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support my resolution expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that veterans' disability compensation should retain its tax exempt status.●

FAIR TRADE IN AGRICULTURE

HON. GLENN ENGLISH

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the fair trade in agriculture bill to give American farmers a fighting chance to compete in today's world market.

Today's world market does not allow U.S. farmers to compete head to head with foreign producers of agricultural commodities. The United States is the only major exporting country in which the Government does not become the bargaining agent for farmers. While I am not advocating that the Government assume that responsibility—we must give U.S. farmers a fighting chance to compete.

We would not be reading stories about Cargill threatening to import Argentine wheat if the Argentine Government were not subsidizing the sale. At the same time our Government is agreeing to Argentina's request to delay interest payments on their debt to the International Monetary Fund.

During the last 4 years American farmers have lost 25 percent of their export markets. The Secretary of Agriculture would have us believe that farmers are at fault—that farm prices are too high to be competitive in world markets.

I disagree with that assessment. I do not believe that farm prices are too high. I believe that this administration needs to stop blaming farmers and start helping them compete in world markets—just as every other major exporting country does.

The legislation that I am introducing today will give the Secretary of Agriculture authority to use $1 billion of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the purpose of subsidizing the export sale of any domestic agricultural commodity. The Secretary can use this authority to reciprocate when foreign governments subsidize exports of agricultural commodities that compete in international markets with U.S.-produced commodities. The legislation will not authorize new appropriations but earmarks existing revolving fund dollars.

Elimination of all trade barriers should be our goal. In the meantime, however, we need to provide American farmers an opportunity for fair trade in today's world markets.

A copy of the bill follows:

H.R. 999

FAIR TRADE IN AGRICULTURE

A bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to use the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation to subsidize the export sale of domestic agricultural commodities in reciprocation for subsidies paid by foreign governments to export foreign agricultural commodities, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend $1,000,000,000 of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the purpose of subsidizing the export sale of any domestic agricultural commodity whenever the Secretary determines that it is necessary to subsidize such sale to reciprocate with respect to a foreign government that subsidizes the exportation of an agricultural commodity that competes in international markets with such domestic agricultural commodity.●

HISPANIC ENTREPRENEURIAL FEVER

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, words like tireless, resourceful, and dynamic, all describe the American entrepreneur. One entrepreneur who is symbolic of the outstanding entrepreneurial fever of America is "Angie" Echevarria, president and chief stockholder of the fast-growing mattress manufacturing company headquartered in Los Angeles. He is adamant about one thing. In his vocabulary, the word "Challenge" has a special place. He dropped out of school because he wasn't challenged. And on his first job, his major challenge was to become the best performer at the task he was given. His entire life has been a sequence of responding to new challenges. Along the way he polished another basic principle; learn from your mistakes, and look for a special niche in the marketplace. Today, Mr. Echevarria's company is well on its way to becoming a national and international force in its field. The Somma mattress, half conventional mattress and half waterbed, his own invention, has become a runaway success.

Mr. Echevarria is the proverbial "rags to riches" story, as described in the January issue of Hispanic Business, in which, he was designated as one of the entrepreneurs of the year. His accomplishments stem for a fierce determination and persistence. He is truly a living model for all Americans and especially for Hispanics who, like him, have many barriers and hardships to overcome. Hispanics can learn from Mr. Echevarria: Like he says, "hang in there and give 'em a good fight."

The article follows:

[From Hispanic Business, January 1985]

SOMMA'S ECHEVARRIA SAYS LOOK FOR A NICHE

(By Luis Torres)

"Call me 'Angie.' Everybody calls me Angie, because I'm sure no angel; maybe diablo would be closer to it," he jokes.

His name is Angel M. Echevarria and he's a tireless, tough, blunt-talking Puerto Rican entrepreneur from the mean streets of New York City's Spanish Harlem. He started out, 35 years ago, sweeping floors in Manhattan's Lower East Side sweat shops. He is now a millionaire and president of Angel Echevarria Co. Inc., a fast growing mattress manufacturing company headquartered in Los Angeles, California.

Mr. Echevarria's enterprise, made up of three individual companies in the bedding industry, was ranked 53rd in HISPANIC BUSINESS' Top 400 Hispanic-owned Firms in the country. He's a leader in an industry in which Hispanics are usually laborers. Mr. Echevarria, who prefers to be called "Angie" by everyone, acknowledges that, as in all professions and business enterprises, there are obstacles rooted in discrimination and prejudice to overcome. "But I never felt that being Hispanic was a hindrance, I always felt that being Angie was an asset," he says. "That's the way I looked at things when I started to work in this industry as a kid, when I decided to start my own business and that's how I look at it today."

He predicts that 1985 sales of his unique line of mattresses will top the $50 million mark. In 1981, his firm's total national sales inched toward $5.7 million. In 1982 they were near the $10 million mark. 1983 sales were just below $20 million, and in 1984 they will surpass $30 million.

The main product which has provided Mr. Echevarria with his wealth and high ranking as an innovative, resourceful and persistent entrepreneur is the Somma mattress. In the bedding industry, it's known as a hybrid—half conventional mattress and half waterbed. It consists of a half dozen individual tubes or cylinders of flexible vinyl, filled with water and placed inside the chamber which would be a box spring in a conventional mattress. Mr. Echevarria says it allows the sleeper to float on a comfortable surface that gives and conforms to the body, without providing the rolling sensation of orignial-style waterbeds, beds he says which are nothing more than giant plastic bags filled with water. "You won't get seasick on a Somma," he promises.

In the past, the pitch about the Somma mattress has been aimed principally at sales representatives and retailers in the industry, but a new advertising campaign is targeted directly at consumers. It uses billboards, magazine ads and television commercials. His plan is to begin with a regional advertising strategy, testing the response, and refining the pitch. Then the campaign will go nationwide.

Just as the Somma is a hybrid, in the parlance of mattress manufacturing, streetwise, iron-willed Mr. Echevarria is something of an enterpreneurial hybrid himself. There's the suggestion of the hard-hitting boxer in his direct, no-nonsense temperament. "I've always been a fighter," he says. And as he talks about his business successes he jabs the air as if to punch an imaginary foe and punctuate his sentences.

It was a long, sometimes uphill road which Mr. Echevarria travelled from the rough streets of Manhattan's East Harlem to his current comfortable life, his several Mercedes Benzes and his hilltop mansion overlooking Los Angeles' posh Bel Air estates, which is home to movie stars and such big time professional athletes as the Los Angeles Lakers' Kareem Abdul Jabbar.

Stocky and muscular, with a hint of an emerging waistline—the result of some lavish dinners at some of L.A.'s finer restaurants, Mr. Echevarria strikes a formidable pose.

KEEP COMING BACK

"Growing up as a young Puerto Rican kid on 164th and Broadway in Spanish Harlem teaches you a few things," he says. "One of them is how to fight to protect yourself and survive. If you can make it out of there, you learn to hold you own against any type of competitior, and you learn to keep coming back after you've been beaten down by something. I've learned that applies, in some ways, in business."

In his personal and his business dealings, Mr. Echevarria is not belligerent. But he is tough. And he is persistent.

He began to make his fortune in the mid 1970s as a result of the invention, manufacture and skillful marketing of his Somma mattress. He had determined long before then that he would rise above the limitations inherent in growing up in poverty. And become a success.

As a scrappy teenager, he got his first job back in the 1950s after dropping out of Samuel Gompers High School in Manhattan. "Back in those days, and maybe to some extent it persists today, Hispanics in high school were basically told 'you're either gonna be a mechanic or a radio repairman, things like that.' The high school I went to was a kind of vocational school for Puerto Ricans, and since I wasn't challenged in school and couldn't see any future in what I was being taught, I dropped out of school."

Eager to start earning a living and contribute to the financial support of his family, he got a job in New York's garment industry. "My first job was loading bobbins on a quilting machine," he recalls. "That's how I got my first look inside the garment industry and the bedding industry." The bobbins, fist-sized spools of thread, were on machines used to sew quilts, which are eventually used to cover mattresses and box springs.

"I decided I was going to be the best bobbin loader in the business. I was. And I wanted a new challenge. I decided to move up to quilting machine operator. Now, for some workers, that's a big step and a lot of people work up to that and stay doing that. But that wasn't enough of a challenge." He decided to learn all about the internal workings of the machines. On his own time, and with the encouragement of others who evidently recognized the spark of determination in him, he learned about repairing and improving the capability of quilting machines.

He then talked his way into the company which was the main manufacturer of bedding quilting machines.

"They asked me if I wanted to go around the country repairing and improving their machines. It looked like another good challenge, and I accepted." He moved his family to the company's headquarters in the tiny town of Albert Lee, Minnesota. In 1960, he decided to pull up stakes and head for California.

"I needed another challenge, something else to accomplish. And," he laughs, "Puerto Ricans were just not born to live in all that snow."

THE REAL CHALLENGE

In California, he got a job operating a quilting machine for a mattress manufacture. Then he decided to go into business for himself. "You know, I looked around and saw all these entrepreneurs, little people prospering by running their own small companies. I thought 'that's the real challenge, going out there and being my own man."

With a small loan from a friend in the bedding industry, he bought his own quilting machine and began making quilts and other products for mattress manufacturers. By dint of hard work, including frequent round-the-clock working days, he started turning a profit.

"My first desk was an orange crate. I had a chair and a phone. That was my whole office. I knew right away that was the kind of thing I was looking for, to have the freedom to sink or swim on my own."

Financially, he began to swim quite nicely. Then, in the late 1960s came the new phenomenon: waterbeds. They became the rage of the bedding industry, and manufacturers found they couldn't make them fast enough.

Looking for a niche in this burgeoning new market, Mr. Echevarria hit on the idea of making a foam cover for water beds. It was in immediate success. He sold to dozens of manufacturers.

But after riding high on that achievement and its considerable profitability, he suffered his first major set back as a businessman. He had developed a cushion-like cover for firm mattresses which he called the Mattress Mate. It didn't sell. He suffered considerable financial loss. But his already established, and still thriving, quilting machine division helped bail him out.

THE NEED FOR PLANNING

"I learned a lot about how to market a new product from that failure. I realized you have to have a well thought-out plan to market something like that. I knew I wouldn't make the same mistake again," he says now.

He was confident about the product which would represent the "next fight" for him: the Somma, the keystone to his current success. He invented the Somma—with its individual cylinders of water to create a flotation bed—as an alternative to both the conventional inner spring mattress and the standard waterbed made of one big plastic bag.

The key to selling the Somma he says, "is to get the customer to lie down on it. Otherwise, it's just an intangible idea. Once he lies down on it, it's something tangible, and we think we've got him convinced."

He also acknowledges the need to have a proper marketing plan in place. And that has been the essential ingredient in the tremendous sales of the Somma.

Still a David in an industry of Goliaths, he decided he had two basic options. The first was to try to convince one of the big manufacturers to buy out his idea, giving him a commission on the sale of each unit. The second was to manufacture and market it on his own.

He decided to go it alone. He assembled a team of advertising and marketing veterans to help him map sales strategy. Three basic guidelines emerged. First, (with a few exceptions) the bed would not be sold in big department stores. "Department stores don't know how to sell beds. They just put them on the floor and leave them there," he says. Smaller, independent furniture stores would carry the beds, assuring individualized attention. Second, he would establish a network of warehouses throughout the country to guarantee overnight delivery of new inventory to the independent furniture stores. That way, the store would need to carry only one bed at a time, freeing showroom space. When the bed is sold, a new one is on the floor the next day because of the readily accessible inventory from a fully stocked warehouse nearby.

Third, constant communication with the independents and the representatives who serve them. It's a plan which has paid off.

With 47 warehouses placed strategically throughout the country, Mr. Echevarria's company sells Sommas in all 50 states. Six-thousand independents, nationwide, carry it. And it does a healthy business in several West European countries, as well. 1985, he says, will be the firm's biggest, most productive year by far.

ACTIVE MANAGEMENT

Mr. Echevarria is a man on the move, never anchored behind a desk. He's to be found hurrying from his administrative offices to the assembly lines of his three nearby factories. He's seen bobbing and weaving between the sewing machines and giant quilting machines to check, first hand, on production. He jokes with his workers in his rapid-fire "East Harlem" Spanish as he quizzes them about production schedules and deadlines. He boasts that he could take off his tie, roll up his shirt sleeves and run one of the complicated quilting machines better than any one of his workers, should the need arise.

"I've achieved what I set out to do," he says. "Accomplishments. That's what matters. Setting out to do something and doing it, despite whatever or whoever tries to knock you out of the ring. Now that I've reached a certain level of business success, I have more time to devote to other things in the community, to give something back."

Mr. Echevarria recently was named by Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley to be a member of the Department of Water and Power Commission. He cites that as an example of the increasing number of civic and community duties he's devoting his time to. He also devotes a lot of time to a Puerto Rican community organization which raises money for college scholarships for barrio youth. And he's begun, more and more, to take the time to give informal advice to Hispanic entrepreneurs getting ready to go into business for themselves.

"In general, I tell them 'make sure you've got enough capital for what you want to do in the short run. Look for a special niche where you can provide something that others aren't, and once you commit yourself, don't let anybody tell you that you can't make it, just because you're Hispanic. Hang in there and give 'em a good fight.' "●

A TRIBUTE TO SANDRA FLEISHMAN

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, February 8, Sandra Fleishman will be leaving after 5 years of outstanding service as a writer and, for the last 3 years, as editor of the Environmental and Energy Study Conference Weekly Bulletin.

I have been privileged to cochair the conference in the 98th Congress, and I want to thank Sandy for the many hours she has put in over the past 5 years to help me and many other Members of Congress get accurate, unbiased information on energy and environmental legislation before Congress.

Sandy has had the often very difficult task of trying to simplify the complex details of energy and environmental legislation; to put that legislation into a perspective that will help Members understand how it will affect their State or district; to provide balanced descriptions of the arguments for and against amendments; to analyze the political pressures moving bills in one direction or another; and to do it all in a way that is fair and useful to all of us, Democrats and Republicans in both Chambers.

Her success can be measured by the fact that in recent years EESC has been the largest legislative organization in Congress. In the 98th Congress it was 283 Members of Congress and 86 Senators.

I and the other officers and members of EESC want to thank Sandy for the outstanding job she has done and wish her every success in her future endeavors.●

SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEFICIT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, February 6, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEFICIT

The relationship between social security and the federal budget deficit is one issue that has come up constantly in my recent public meetings with Hoosiers. Why, they ask, should there be talk of cutting social security to help reduce the deficit when the social security trust funds are separately financed by their own payroll taxes and are expected to start accumulating surpluses in the near future?

The explanation lies in the relationship between the social security trust funds and the "unified" federal budget. The trust funds and other off-budget programs were brought under the budget in 1969 in order to give policy makers a better idea of the overall impact of the federal government on the economy. However, this did not mean that the trust funds actually would be merged into the general fund of the Treasury and used for other purposes. It merely involved a new method of portraying or presenting the budget. The trust funds continue to operate as they always did, with payroll taxes accounted for separately and spent only on social security.

There is, however, an indirect connection between the social security trust funds and the general fund of the Treasury. If there is a surplus in the trust funds, the law says that it must be invested in interest-bearing U.S. government securities. The Treasury can use the loan as it sees fit, but if the social security system should need the money to cover its costs, the Treasury must pay it back immediately. This is the way that the system has worked since payroll taxes first were levied in 1937. The loans always have been paid back, with interest.

The reason why budget cutters are looking at social security is not that the trust funds have been merged into the deficit-ridden general fund of the Treasury. The scrutiny results from the simple fact that social security accounts are now listed in the official budget. Because of their sheer size, $258 billion in an annual budget of $931 billion, the accounts cannot escape notice when a serious effort is made to cut the deficit. Policy makers view social security as an integral part of the federal government's financing because any savings from social security would show up as overall savings, even if the social security fund is financed completely by its own tax revenues.

In recent years, older people have begun to worry that social security may be cut sharply in order to reduce the deficit. They point to the 1981 cuts in social security minimum and student benefits as evidence that there is something to be concerned about. In response, Congress passed a law requiring that social security be removed from the budget by 1993. The anticipated effect of keeping social security in the budget between now and 1993 is that for the next two years, as in most years past, the deficit will be higher. But in 1987, social security surpluses should start to accumulate due to favorable demographics, an expanding economy, and recent changes in payroll taxes and social security benefits. The surpluses will show up in the form of a smaller deficit.

Those who favor keeping social security in the budget, as I do, argue that it makes sense if one wants to assess the overall impact of the federal government on the economy. The basic reason for a unified budget is that policy makers need a general view of the extent to which the federal government consumes private investment capital. If social security, which accounts for more than one quarter of all federal expenditures, is removed from the budget, the economic impact will still occur, but it will not show up in the budget figures. The budget would lose much of its usefulness as a planning device. Another argument for a unified budget is that social security should be reviewed for inefficiency in the same manner that other federal programs are reviewed.

Those who favor removal of social security from the budget believe that benefits should not be cut for reasons totally unrelated to the social security system itself. They claim that the system should not be examined in light of fluctuating budget projections because older people make irreversible decisions about retirement based on what they think that they will receive from social security. Also, it is argued, having social security in the budget may distort policy makers' decisions. The large social security surpluses expected after 1987, for example, will make the government's overall fiscal condition seem better than it is.

It is plausible to argue that social security should be removed from the budget. Indeed, Congress may consider legislation to bring about the separation before 1993. However, we ought not to expect too much from this bookkeeping change because it simply will not insulate social security from growing pressure to reduce the deficit. Even if social security were removed from the budget, it could be used to reduce the deficit. For example, social security benefits and payroll taxes could be trimmed, and income taxes raised proportionately. The taxpayer's overall burden would be the same, but the general fund of the Treasury would have more money to apply against the deficit.

Those who want to cut back social security benefits are shifting the focus of their attack. There is more emphasis on fairness. As things stand today, retirees are entitled to benefits far exceeding their past contributions, and few are in poverty. In fact, many have larger incomes than the young workers who are paying their benefits. Critics of social security maintain that such an expensive inequity should not be continued, especially when other federal programs for the poor are being cut back. The pressures to trim future increases in social security benefits for the well-to-do will continue to build whether or not social security is removed from the budget.

While I favor a unified budget principally because I think that it is critical to measure the federal government's impact on the economy, I also believe that social security should be treated as a self-sustaining system, and that it would be wrong either to subsidize it or to sacrifice it for the sake of a balanced budget.●

RITA MORENO AND SALLY STRUTHERS ENCOURAGE STRONG FEDERAL ARTS SUPPORT

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, today at a meeting of the Congressional Arts Caucus, actress Rita Moreno and Sally Struthers presented arguments in support of our Federal cultural programs. Both actresses, currently appearing at the National Theatre in "The Odd Couple," expressed dismay at the administration's proposals to cut the budgets of the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities and urged increased support for public broadcasting.

Ms. Struthers stressed the need to recognize the priority of arts funding within our national budget. In addition, she highlighted the special concerns of individual artists, the urgent financial problems of the Folger Theatre, and the great need to increase support for public broadcasting.

Ms. Moreno, who elaborated on her colleague's concerns, prepared an eloquent written statement, which follows:

STATEMENT OF RITA MORENO

For a number of years, I served as a member of the National Endowment for the Arts and, hopeful, someday soon I will be asked to serve again. I learned first hand and quite dramatically in what awful straits is the state of our arts. A relatively small amount of money goes a long way toward producing great dividends and enriching us all.

And now these very programs are faced with financial setbacks. So I want to use these moments to plead with you people of power and influence gathered here today to do what you can to restore the monies needed for the arts. A very small percentage taken from the defense budget could salvage an entire arts program.

Nations are feared and perhaps even respected for their armed might. But you know as well as I that nations are revered not for their Napoleons, but for their Renoirs; not for their Clausewitz', but for their Mendelssohns; not for their Lord Nelsons, but for their Shelleys.

So it is imperative that we not only beat our swords into plowshares, but it becomes equally important that we beat those selfsame swords into songs and sonnets.●

THE PLIGHT OF AMERICAN FARMERS

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, many farmers in debt to the Farmers Home Administration are caught in a credit crisis that threatens to bankrupt thousands in the next few months. Adding to this problem are desperate farmers who are putting into production segments of farmland, which is marginal, in a futile effort to make a profit. The times have simply been so bad that these farmers are unable to meet their debt obligations. Low commodity prices, continuing high interest rates, plummeting land and machinery values, a strong dollar, and depressed exports are contributing factors. Because of this situation the Farmers Home Administration is faced with many pending foreclosures which would add thousands of acres to the FmHA inventory.

If such foreclosures take place and this land comes on the market at fire-sale prices, economic ruin will threaten entire farm communities. A drastic fall in farmland values will produce financial chaos. Farmers will lose their land, the financial shock will be heard throughout the community, the Farmers Home Administration will record enormous losses on its loans and the bottom line is that the American taxpayer who provided the funds will have lost again.

On February 6, 1985, I introduced the Farm Debt Restructure and Conservation Set-Aside Act of 1985 which will help solve this problem. It will authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire long-term easements—at least 50 years—for public use on marginal farmland for conservation, hunting, recreational, and wildlife purposes. These easements will be obtained from the present FmHA inventory and from delinquent FmHA borrowers who are farming marginal cropland. In exchange for turning over their land to the Government for public use, farmers will be allowed to write down their debts with the Farmers Home Administration at the appraised value. The results of this legislation would be: (1) The individual farmer would be left with his most productive land and a lower debt. This would allow many farmers to service the lower debt and stay in business as profitable producers. (2) Many marginal acres would be permanently retired and no longer subsidized by the Government. Because this land will be taken out of production it will not be producing crops and competing with land owned by privately financed farmers. (3) The land set aside would be used as wildlife habitats, forests, and game preserves with management agreements between the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and individual States. Conservation practices would be established to protect this resource for future generations. (4) The public would be allowed to use the land for recreation and hunting.

All these things can happen without the flow of actual dollars. Instead of accounting for a loss the Federal Government can now record an asset in land that would be used for the benefit of all Americans. Furthermore we would contribute to the security of agriculture and give all our taxpayers something other than a loss or a foreclosure for their hard-earned tax dollars.●

DEAUTHORIZE THE DICKEY-LINCOLN SCHOOL DAM PROJECT

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to deauthorize the Dickey-Lincoln School Dam project, located on the St. John River in the State of Maine.

The Dickey-Lincoln School project has had a long and controversial history. First authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1965, this project has been rejected after a thorough review of the merits of this hydroelectric dam project. In 1981, the Dickey portion of the project was deauthorized by the Congress with the passage of legislation containing deauthorizing language I had first introduced in 1979. In addition, Congress ordered the completion of a study by the Army Corps of Engineers on the economic and environmental impact of a hydroelectric facility located at the Lincoln School Dam site. This study was completed last year and has been submitted by the Assistant Secretary of the Army to Congress. To summarize the corps' conclusion, the Lincoln School Dam project is not financially feasible.

The saga to rid Maine of the Dickey-Lincoln project has been a long and exhaustive one. At one time, Dickey-Lincoln was the most divisive issue in the State, but further documentation of the financial and environmental realities of the project led to the correct conclusion that the project does not make sense. The careful assessment of Dickey-Lincoln has not been without cost or controversy. But I believe there is no substitute for careful evaluation. Certainly, it is far easier to move a project in a forward direction than backward. The attractiveness of a public works project and the benefits of construction tend to put these proposals on a one-way path to completion. It has not been easy to overcome this kind of momentum, but the citizens of Maine have always demanded a full and fair public assessment of major projects under consideration.

Two years ago, the debate finally came to an end. The 1983 corps' report documented the suspicions held by many Maine residents: hydroelectric power generated from a finished Lincoln Dam cannot be marketed at a rate which could meet production and distribution costs. Therefore, the project clearly cannot meet a Federal prerequisite requirement of financial feasibility.

Aside from the financial realities of the Dickey-Lincoln School Dam project, the environmental and socioeconomic impact of the project has been extensively evaluated. While a great deal of time and money were spent to complete this review, I believe final deauthorization of the Dickey-Lincoln School project will represent the right choice for Maine and save American tax dollars from being unwisely spent.

I am hopeful that the final deauthorization of the Dickey-Lincoln School project can be accomplished at the earliest possible date through passage of my legislation. The time is long overdue for the discontinuation of a proposal which may have made sense 20 years ago, but after careful evaluation doesn't meet the tougher standards we now require. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

CARIBBEAN INFRASTRUCTURE ASSISTANCE

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to acquaint my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives with an unfortunate matter of waste and neglect. Since the Spanish-American War, U.S. foreign relations with the Caribbean region countries has stressed strategic concerns and national self-interest. In recent years, the Caribbean Basin Initiative has broadened America's involvement to include some regionally coordinated economic development projects. Nevertheless, the basic standard of life or infrastructure in the Caribbean remains grossly underdeveloped as well as ignored by the donor-aid nations of North America and Europe.

One of the major causes of this underdevelopment remains the lack of trained labor in the Caribbean who can respond to the many technological challenges of the 1980's. I am proposing legislation that will not create new development agencies or establish expensive development assistance projects. Instead, I propose to use an existing agency with a record of success in infrastructure improvements in the Dominican Republic and the Turks and Caicos Islands; the Peace Corps. Furthermore, I also propose to employ Peace Corps recruits throughout the Caribbean in an effort to train local personnel in water management and distribution, electrification, road and harbor rehabilitation, and other long overdue infrastructure development projects.

Technical training promises to create a new corps of skilled labor and professionals who will, in turn, offer their expertise in modernizing the Caribbean that the tourist does not see. The Caribbean-wide Peace Corps effort will symbolize the type of U.S.-Caribbean relationship that is clearly needed in this post-Grenada incursion era; a relationship based on peace and cooperation. As the 21st century nears, it is apparent that special labor skills are needed to survive. The situation in the Caribbean dramatically accents that fact.

My legislation presents a harmonious path to brighter U.S.-Caribbean relations, suggesting that the development problems of the Caribbean region can best be resolved through cooperation and peace.●

NORTH MIAMI SHOWCASE

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for the past 6 years, Dan and Estee Breiman have been responsible for running the North Miami Showcase, an entertainment program for the elderly.

Mr. and Mrs. Breiman exemplify the spirit of voluntarism. They are not paid for their efforts, but do all of their work on behalf of the North Miami Showcase just to make people happy.

I would like to share a recent Miami Herald article discussing their fine work with my colleagues.

COUPLE KEEPS SHOWCASE GOING FOR NORTH MIAMI SENIOR CITIZENS

(By Constance Prater)

The show must go on.

And thanks to Dan and Estee Breiman, it does.

The North Miami Showcase, a monthly entertainment gala for the city's elderly, has been running nonstop for the past six years because of the Breimans.

This month's showcase, featuring singer Eddie Klein and comedian-impersonator Dory Sinclair, begains at 2 p.m. today at the North Miami Community Center, 1590 NE 123rd St.

The Breimans, both 65, volunteer their time to hire acts, design advertising fliers for the show, promote it and put it on.

"Our pleasure is being with people, making them happy. We've always done that," Estee Breiman said.

"We do it because we enjoy doing it," Breiman said. "Instead of sitting around getting old, we'd rather keep ourselves active."

In 1980, the City Council approved a $2,000 a year grant for the Breimans to sign entertainers and plan the showcase.

"We wanted to have it in different sections of the city, but somehow it didn't work that way," she said. "We couldn't get that many people to come."

They fixed the time and place for Sunday afternoons at the community center.

"It worked out beautifully," Breiman said. "We have people coming from all over now, even Miami Beach. We've established a reputation."

"They really work hard. And they get nothing for it other than the satisfaction of doing something for the community," said Virginia DiFederico, parks and recreation department assistant.

Neither has ever been an entertainer. They say they know what they know about good music from attending countless performances and banquets at hotels on Miami Beach.

"I know the acts and whose good and who isn't," she said.

Dan Breiman is a retired postman. He has been president of the National Jewish Civil Service Employees for the past seven years. His wife was a secretary for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineer before she became a housewife. Both are members of the North Dade Chamber of Commerce and several other community groups.

Past showcase acts have included singers Vivian Lloyd, Alex Redhill, Jeb Stewart and Laynee Gould and comedians Danny Tadmore, Ned Walsh and Eddie Barton.

Next month the Hollywood Pop Orchestra will perform. In March the Breimans are bringing in a puppet show.

The showcase is sponsored by the Senior Citizen Advisory Board and the Parks and Recreation Department.●

NEW YORK STATE JUDGES ADOPT RESOLUTION ON DRUGS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1985, the Federation of New York State Judges adopted a formal resolution criticizing the Federal Government for failing to prevent the importation of heroin into the United States. The Federation of New York State Judges is an organization formed in 1983, which now represents more than 2,000 New York State judges. The president of the organization is Presiding Justice Francis T. Murphy of the appellate division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, first department.

The resolution calls on the President and Congress:

First, to prohibit all U.S. assistance to, and trade with, any country that permits the production and exportation of opium or its derivatives for other than medical purposes;

Second, to appropriate moneys immediately for the construction and maintenance of New York prisons in order to protect the safety of the men, women, and children of New York; and Third, to apply themselves in New York to a radically more intensive enforcement of Federal narcotics laws.

In explaining why the resolution was adopted, Justice Murphy cited the following statistics. There are 500,000 heroin addicts in the United States. Half of these addicts live in New York State. One in every seven-five residents of New York State is a heroin addict, and 1 in every 40 of New York City's residents is a heroin addict.

Justice Murphy remarked that these 500,000 heroin addicts commit 100,000 crimes every day, and suggested that:

If the Federal Government does not immediately appropriate monies for the construction and maintenance of New York prisons, then New York should consider directing its police officers to take all arrested narcotics offenders directly to Federal Courts for arraignment and prosecution.

This resolution is significant for two reasons. First, it is a further indication that the Federal Government has failed in its duty to prevent the flow of illicit drugs into our country from abroad. Second, it is a strong statement by New York State judges who are in the frontline of our efforts to deal with the crimes drugs cause, that our State criminal justice systems must have immediate additional assistance if the situation is to improve.

I ask that the resolution and press release of the Federation of New York State Judges be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

The resolution and press release follow:

RESOLUTION

The federal government having long failed to prevent the criminal importation of heroin into the United States, a duty within the federal government's exclusive jurisdiction;

New York having become the nation's heroin capital in which one-quarter million heroin addicts pay for heroin by killing, robbing, stealing from, and assaulting innocent men, women, and children; and

New York's prisons having become dangerously overcrowded by inmates imprisoned for crimes involving narcotics;

Now be it resolved by the Federation of New York State Judges that;

The President and the Congress have a critical moral obligation to prohibit, excluding food and medicine, all United States assistance to and trade with any country that permits the production and exportation of opium or its illicit derivatives for other than medical purposes.

The President and the Congress have a critical moral obligation to appropriate monies immediately for the construction and maintenance of New York prisons in order to protect the safety of the men, women, and children of New York.

The President and the Congress have a critical moral obligation to protect the safety of the men, women, and children of New York by applying themselves in New York to a radically more intensive enforcement of federal narcotic laws.

PRESS RELEASE OF THE FEDERATION OF NEW YORK STATE JUDGES

Presiding Justice Francis T. Murphy of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, First Department, speaking as president of the Federation of New York State Judges,[1] announced today that the Federation, by formal resolution [2] criticizing the federal government for having long failed to prevent the importation of heroin into the United States, has called upon the President and the Congress:

(1) to prohibit all United States assistance to, and trade with, any country that permits the production and exportation of opium or its derivatives for other than medical purposes;

(2) to appropriate monies immediately for the construction and maintenance of New York prisons in order to protect the safety of the men, women and children of New York; and

(3) to apply themselves in New York to a radically more intensive enforcement of federal narcotic laws.

Presiding Justice Murphy stated:

"The time is critical for the President and Congress to tell New Yorkers what the federal government intends to do about heroin

[1] The Federation of New York State Judges, formed in 1983 is the largest judicial organization in the history of New York. Its membership, listed in the margin of this release, represents more than 2,000 New York judges.

[2] A copy of the Federation's resolution is attached to this press release.

in New York. It is the federal government that is morally accountable for the presence of heroin in New York, for that government alone has the duty and the power to prevent its importation.

"There are 500,000 heroin addicts in the United States. They commit 100,000 crimes every day. They kill, rob, and steal. Half of these addicts, 250,000 strong, live in New York State. One in every 75 residents of New York State is a heroin addict.

"In New York City, America's heroin capital, there are 190,000 heroin addicts, a heroin population greater than the total population of most American cities. One in every 40 of New York City's residents is a heroin addict.

"In New York State there are 17,000 narcotic abusers between the ages of 12 and 17. There are in New York State 390,000 children between the ages of 12 and 17 who regularly use drugs such as cocaine and amphetamines. In 1988, New York State will have a heroin addict population of 270,000, to say nothing of 1,500,000 abusers of drugs such as cocaine and amphetamines, a figure that excludes marijuana.

"Is it not wrong for the federal government to withhold money from New York for the building of prisons when it is the federal government that has failed in its duty to stop the flow of heroin into New York?

"Will the federal government continue to withhold money from New York until 1 in every 20 of New York City's residents is a heroin addict? Or will the federal government grant that money when 1 in every 10 of New York City's residents is a heroin addict?

"For those who look upon a catastrophe and count the dollars, let them consider that in 1982 the total, direct average cost to government for one unmarried, unemployed male drug abuser on welfare was $7,000 annually, excluding the incredible cost of his crimes. The dollar value of one addict's thefts is about $30,000 per year. If arrested in 1982, the average cost of his arrest alone was $3,300. If imprisoned, the 1982 average cost of keeping him was $21,000.

"New York City is in a whirlwind of drugs and crime. In this city there is a hell, the land of heroin addicts. They have not died, yet nothing of life remains. Anguish is their day, torment their night, affliction their eternal season, and crime their constant industry. Their beds are the broken floors and littered rooftops of gutted buildings, their air the stink of excrement, urine and vomit, their time measured between needle points. Their hell has made life hell for millions of our innocent citizens.

"If the federal government does not immediately appropriate monies for the construction and maintenance of New York prisons, then New York should consider directing its police officers to take all arrested narcotic offenders directly to federal courts for arraignment and prosecution.

"If the federal government will not bring prisons to New York, then New York should bring prisoners to the federal government."●

MARCH DECLARED NATIONAL EYE DONOR MONTH

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best gift a person can give is to be an organ donor to renew the lives of the suffering. Thanks to medical advances and increased national awareness of the benefits of organ donation, last year more than 22,000 Americans were restored to useful vision through a corneal transplant.

This procedure has a 90-percent success rate in improving sight and can only be done with donated eye tissue. No synthetic cornea presently is effective. People in all walks of life, from 2-month-old infants to those in their nineties, can see today because others gave this precious gift. However, thousands more people without vision could benefit from this operation but are not being helped because suitable corneal tissue is not always available.

A united national effort exists to eliminate this shortage. The 88 eye banks belonging to the Eye Bank Association of America are committed to the goal of having a cornea readily available for anyone suffering from corneal blindness. These eye banks work together to preserve medical standards of the highest quality, to promote organ and tissue donation, and to encourage research into the prevention and treatment of eye disease and injury.

The major barrier contributing to the waiting list is the lack of public knowledge about organ and tissue donation. In particular, many citizens do not realize that all eye tissue is acceptable for donation, regardless of the donor's age or quality of vision. Eye tissue not suitable for transplant is used for research projects so valuable information can be gained to help the thousands of others with diabetes, glaucoma, retinal disease, and other eye problems.

Therefore, as we in Congress have done the last 2 years, it is fitting that we once again inform the public of the need for eye donations and encourage more Americans to become organ donors. By doing so, we designate March 1985 as "National Eye Donor Month" and call on all our citizens to support this humanitarian cause with appropriate activity.●

CONGRESSMAN A. LINCOLN IN DORCHESTER, MA

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, in September 1848, a little-known freshman Member of the House of Representatives toured the Boston area, campaigning on behalf of the national Whig ticket, led by Gen. Zachary Taylor.

There were only sparse newspaper accounts of the speeches made by the 39-year-old Illinoisan, who was more often than not referred to as "Abram" Lincoln.

Thirteen years later, when he became somewhat better known and when newspapers started getting his name right, President Abraham Lincoln recalled that tour. "Yes, I had been chosen to Congress from the wild West, and with hayseed in my hair I went to Massachusetts, the most cultured State in the Union, to take a few lessons in deportment."

There is certainly more than a bit of Mr. Lincoln's typical self-deprecating humor in the recollection. He may have taught more than he learned.

Boston at the time was a leading manufacturer and exporter of orators of the grand style. His audience was not prepared for the tall, lanky westerner telling racy stories, ridiculing the opposition, and laughing at his own jokes as wildly and enthusiastically as anyone in the hall.

Listeners were surprised that Lincoln seemed to be speaking to them individually, instead of orating to a large audience.

Lincoln's 1848 tour of Massachusetts is regarded by some biographers as important for his political growth and development.

On September 18, 1848, Lincoln spoke at Richmond Hall in Dorchester, then a town of 7,000 and now a neighborhood of Boston. Not far from the site of that speech the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library now stands.

On February 19, the library and the Dorchester Historical Society are sponsoring "An Evening with Congressman A. Lincoln," a symposium examining the early career of the great statesman and his development before and after his Massachusetts campaign tour, and to assess the results of his "lessons in deportment."

This event demonstrates the continuing ties that many people in many parts of our country feel directly with that great President and the desire to learn from his life.●

CITY COLLEGE OF SAN FRANCISCO CELEBRATES ITS 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, City College of San Francisco is celebrating its 50th anniversary. This institution, which was established during the depression, has provided many young people with an opportunity for education that they might not otherwise have had. City College students have included a broad range of people, from O.J. Simpson to W. Michael Blumenthal, former Treasury Secretary, to others less well known. The lives of all of them were enhanced by their experience at City College.

I would like to include with my remarks an article in the San Francisco Examiner about the school's 50th anniversary celebration:

(By Michael A. Robinson)

I was a child of the Great Depression, born at a time when many wondered how they would struggle through the day, let alone prepare for the future.

But by offering its students free tuition and the chance for improvement, San Francisco Junior College not only prevailed, it prospered.

More than a million men and women have passed through the doors of what is now one of the state's largest two-year community colleges. Most were just preparing to get a good job. But some, like sports star O.J. Simpson and actress Lee Meriwether, stopped by what is now called City College of San Francisco on their way to the Big Time.

Now college officials want to boast of their success as they prepare to launch a long list of events to mark the school's 50th anniversary.

"First of all we want to celebrate the anniversary," says Hilary Hsu, chancellor of the San Francisco Community College District. "But we have another purpose, too."

"We want to generate the necessary and useful excitement, so that we will remain strong for the next 50 years. We are trying to raise money for an endowment for scholarships and for equipment to meet the students' need.

"This will give us a little more independence. Our single theme is to maintain the stature of City College."

As part of the celebration, Meriwether will star in the first of four evening performances of "The Lion in Winter," beginning Feb. 7 at the City College Theater. Meriwether, a former Miss San Francisco who became Miss America, also will serve as the mistress of ceremonies for the college's Founder's Day program.

That program is scheduled for Feb. 12 and will be marked by a reception at Davies Symphony Hall followed by a dinner and dance at the Gift Center Pavilion. Mayor Feinstein will chair the event with Burroughs Corp. Chairman W. Michael Blumenthal serving as the keynote speaker.

Blumenthal, who was President Jimmy Carter's Treasury Secretary from 1977 until he was fired in 1979, will recall his experiences in San Francisco and at City College. Blumenthal immigrated to the United States from Shanghai in 1947. He attended City College from the spring semester of 1948 through the spring semester of 1949 before transferring to the University of California at Berkeley.

Indeed, Blumenthal's experiences mirror two important roles City College plays, says Hsu.

The school serves as an essential reference point for many foreign students. Nearly 70 percent of the college's enrollment are from minority groups, many of whom are recent arrivals from overseas.

"We give those students a springboard into American life," says Hsu. "They need orientation and initiation into America."

At the same time, City College is successful at preparing students for transfer to four-year universities. Only Diablo Valley College, in affluent central Contra Costa County, sends more students to the University of California at Berkeley.

Not bad for a college that began in 1935 by using space at Galileo High School and at the University of California extension center on Powell Street. Back then enrollment was 1,700.

Today the two-year community college is a sprawling 49-acre campus with an enrollment of about 22,000. A $50 per semester fee is now charged, a result of state budget woes. Approximately another 40,000 attended non-credit courses through various centers throughout The City affiliated with the college.

Funds raised through the 50th anniversary events will be used to improve the school, says Hsu.●

COAL EXPORT ENHANCEMENT ACT OF 1985

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today, I am reintroducing a bill which I sponsored during the last Congress to create a Federal Coal Export Commission under the auspices of the Secretary of Commerce.

One-third of the 30 Commission members would represent agencies of the Federal Government which are involved with foreign trade and two-thirds of the Commission members would represent export coal producers and traders, coal labor, transporters of export coal and financial institutions with an interest in the international coal trade.

The goal of the Commission is to increase the cooperation and coordination of those parties involved with coal exports. Among the Commission's mandates as provided by the legislation are the identification of diplomatic channels to increase coal exports; impediments to coal exports; foreign markets for U.S. coal with an emphasis on those in developing nations; availability of and methods of financing coal exports; and, an examination of the potential for small- and medium-coal producers to enter the export trade through export trading companies.

The importance of creating such a Commission, which would be authorized for a 2-year period by this bill, is due to the nature of the international coal trade with many foreign buyers being governmental entities. The U.S. Federal Government must show these buyers that it is committed to maintaining and increasing the U.S. market share of international coal demand. Further, it can only be through a joint government-private sector effort that many of the impediments to the coal export trade will be resolved.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of U.S. coal exported is extremely important to our domestic economy. In 1983, the value of U.S. coal exports was over $3 billion. Besides making a great contribution to our efforts to narrow the balance-of-trade deficit, these coal exports create thousands of jobs in the coalfields, in the transportation sector and at our ocean ports.

From January to October 1984, over 7.7 million tons of U.S. coal was exported to 64 countries. About 71 percent of that figure was metallurgical coal sales and 28 percent was steam coal sales. Our leading markets are Canada which purchased 26.5 percent of the total for the first 10 months of 1984, followed by Japan whose share was 20.3 percent. These two countries are followed by, in order, Italy, The Netherlands, Brazil, France, Belgium, and Luxembourg, the United Kingdom, largely due to that nation's coal strike, and the Republic of Korea. These countries all purchased over 2 million tons of U.S. coal during the period described above.

It must be noted that the U.S. share of many of these nations' coal market is falling from levels achieved during past years. There are a number of reasons for the lackluster performance of coal in recent years, such as the worldwide lowering of demand for electricity and steel, new nuclear powerplants coming online and the decline in petroleum prices.

These factors, however, affect all coal-exporting countries and are not reasons for the disproportionate reduction of U.S. market share. In this regard, U.S. coal is hindered mainly due to its high delivered price. Coal from the Republic of South Africa, Canada, Poland, and recently, from Colombia, often sells far less than U.S. coal in the Asian, European, and South American markets. One of the reasons for this is the position of the dollar in international money markets. Another pressing reason is the high cost of U.S. railroad transportation. Many European and Japanese buyers cite transportation costs as the major reason for the high delivered price of U.S. coal.

These factors are the very ones which I hope to see addressed by the Federal Coal Export Commission, as well as the assistance such an entity would give U.S. coal exporters in the areas of financing, insurance, and the U.S. foreign aid program to developing nations who have growing coal requirements as they further their efforts to industrialize.●

RAISE THE CIGARETTE EXCISE TAX

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to raise the Federal cigarette excise tax permanently to 40 cents a package. This measure would adjust the cigarette tax for inflation, help compensate the Federal Government for the costs associated with smoking-related illnesses and, at the same time, provide $7 billion to $9.5 billion a year in new revenue to reduce the enormous Federal deficit.

From 1951 through 1982, the excise tax on cigarettes was 8 cents a package. A provision of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 [TEFRA] raised this tax of 16 cents a pack, starting in January 1983; however, the increase is only temporary, and the tax will revert to 8 cents a pack on October 1 of this year.

Much has happened since 1951 to justify a substantial increase in the cigarette tax. Consumer prices have risen 400 percent, so simply to maintain the tax's original revenue-raising power, it ought to be increased to 32 cents a pack. And there is another good reason to increase the cigarette tax: The harmful effect of smoking on human health—which was not well understood 34 years ago, but which is now well known and well documented.

C. Everett Koop, the Surgeon General of the United States, calls cigarette smoking "the most important individual health risk in this country." He blames smoking for more premature deaths and disabilities than any other known agent. Says Dr. Koop: "There is no single more effective action a person can take to reduce the risk of cancer—and of dying from it—than to quit smoking, especially cigarette smoking."

The amount of damage done by cigarettes is truly staggering. The Surgeon General links smoking to 30 percent of all cancer deaths. Smoking is a major cause of cancers of the lung, larynx, oral cavity, and esophagus, and a major contributor to cancers of the bladder, kidney, and pancreas. Smoking accounts for 80 to 90 percent of all chronic lung disease in the United States, including chronic bronchitis and emphysema, and for one-third of all coronary heart disease, says the Surgeon General. And smoking by pregnant women has been linked to premature birth, fetal injury, and low birth weight.

In sum, cigarette smoking is responsible for more than 300,000 premature deaths in the United States each year, an enormous amount of disease and disability, and untold physical and emotional pain. These human consequences are terrible enough, yet smoking results in enormous economic costs as well.

The Departmnent of Health and Human Services calculates that smoking leads to $13 billion a year in added health costs and to $25 billion in lost productivity. Smokers bear much of this economic burden; however, we all share it to some extent through higher insurance premiums, higher costs for Government health programs, and higher costs for consumer goods.

Absenteeism caused by smoking translates into higher costs for consumer products. Nonsmokers and businesses that contribute to employee health plans pay higher insurance rates to help pay the cost of treating smoking-related illnesses. Smoking also leads to higher Government outlays: nearly $4 billion a year in increased spending for Medicare alone.

The legislation I am introducing would keep the cigarette tax from returning to 8 cents a pack later this year, as mandated in TEFRA, and it would thus prevent the loss of $2.5 billion in annual revenue that we can ill afford at this time. But the bill would go much further. It would compensate for 34 years of inflation and bring the cigarette tax more in line with current knowledge about the costs and dangers of smoking. A 40 cent tax on a package of cigarettes would raise about $12 billion each year—$7 billion more than the 16 cent tax now raises, and $9.5 billion more than the 8 cent tax would raise.

Frankly, I doubt that a higher tax will have a major effect on the smoking habits of those who already smoke. However, it is likely that some smokers will choose to smoke less, and that potential smokers—especially teenagers—might be deterred by the higher tax from taking up an expensive and dangerous habit.

Mr. Speaker, the cigarette tax is a significant, relatively untapped, potentially lucrative, and entirely justifiable source of revenue. The bill I am introducing, together with spending cuts and other revenue-raising measures, is needed to reduce the Federal deficit and pave the way for a strong and long-lasting period of economic growth.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation and enacting it into law.●

DR. STECKEL RECEIVES JONSSON PRIZE

HON. BOBBI FIEDLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House an event that will be held this weekend in Los Angeles. Dr. Richard Steckel, the founding director of the Jonsson Comprehensive Cancer Center at UCLA will receive the Jonsson Prize for his work.

Dr. Steckel has a distinguished record of achievement. He graduated magna cum laude from Harvard College where he also received his M.D. degree. His internship at UCLA was followed by a residency at Massachusetts General Hospital and his appointment as a clinical associate at the National Cancer Institute in Bethesda, MD.

Dr. Steckel returned to UCLA as a professor of radiological sciences and was appointed the founding director of the Jonsson Comprehensive Cancer Center at UCLA in 1973.

Dr. Steckel has received many awards and honors and is well known for his wide-ranging areas of community service. He is a member of the Editorial Board of the Medical and Pediatric Oncology Journal and a contributing editor of the American Journal of Roentgenology. He serves on numerous consultant panels and as an institutional site visitor for the National Cancer Institute.

Dr. Steckel has been the principal investigator and director of many millions of dollars of research support grants and is continually called upon to make significant professional presentations.

He has published two books in the field of cancer diagnosis and nearly 100 research papers.

Dr. Steckel's award this Saturday will be the first of its kind. The Jonsson Prize has been created by the Kenneth Jonsson family to recognize significant achievement in the field of cancer research. The award money will be used in a research project of Dr. Steckel's choice.

I will be joined by many figures from the entertainment and sports worlds this Saturday, as well as with hundreds of Dr. Steckel's friends and colleagues. And, I know the Members of the House will want to join with me in adding our honor to a man who has devoted his life to his fellow man.●

BETA PSI LAMBDA

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to pay tribute to the Beta Psi Lambda Chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc. Chartered in Los Angeles during the 1940's, Beta Psi Lambda has an impressive history of community involvement. Fraternity members have worked relentlessly to improve the quality of life in the Los Angeles community, particularly in the areas of education and health care and, it is with great pride that I take this occasion to share just a few of their accomplishments with my colleagues.

For over 40 years, Beta Psi Lambda has been active in the pursuit of educational excellence. They established a perpetual endowment scholarship fund which benefits high school, college, and graduate students and are consistent contributors to the United Negro College Fund. In addition, the chapter maintains a tutorial service for students attending high school in the Los Angeles area. The chapter is similarly dedicated to the development of black leadership and has established several ongoing programs for high school students, including workshops on public speaking, goal setting, writing skills, and parliamentary procedure. Beta Psi Lambda also sponsors a leadership conference wherein high school students are encouraged to seek careers in management/leadership related fields.

Furthermore, this chapter has worked tirelessly to improve the quality of mental health service in the community through a series of lectures and workshops geared toward the prevention and rehabilitation of stress and depression related illnesses.

Recognizing the importance of involvement in cultural affairs and its preservation, Beta Psi Lambda has contributed moral and financial support toward such worthy efforts as the Brockman Gallery and the California Afro-American Museum at Exposition Park.

The Beta Psi Lambda Chapter has also been politically active in the community, sponsoring bipartisan public forums featuring local elected officials. The chapter has also worked with the League of Women Voters on ballot issues, voter registration drives and fund-raising techniques.

In 1983, Beta Psi Lambda was recognized as "the Outstanding Chapter" by the Western Region Conference of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to commend Mr. Homer Mason, who as president of the chapter from 1981 through 1984 played an integral role in the fraternity's growth and increased recognition. Mr. Mason served with a diligence and enthusiasm that often proved to be the pivitol force necessary to complete many projects. He is currently a member of several organizations in our fair State, including California Attorneys for Criminal Justice, 100 Black Men and Sigma Pi Phi Fraternity. I alm honored to acknowledge the accomplishments of both Beta Psi Lambda and Mr. Homer Mason and wish to extend my very best to the membership of this outstanding organization.●

NATIONAL EMPLOY-THE-OLDER-WORKER WEEK

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, the persistence of age discrimination and declining employment opportunities for older Americans require us to keep up our fight to improve job opportunities for those older workers who wish to continue working.

The facts about older worker employment problems are startling. According to data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, unemployment among older workers is growing faster than among all other age groups. Once unemployed, older workers remain out of the work force nearly twice as long as young workers. Older workers are also three times as likely as younger workers to simply give up on the job search and drop out of the labor force after a long period of unemployment.

The causes of these employment problems can be traced to persistent age stereotypes and widespread age discrimination in the work force. Recent national surveys indicate that 8 of 10 Americans believe that age discrimination is a problem for most older workers. Moreover, 6 of 10 employers also believe that age discrimination is widespread in the labor force. Overcoming these stereotypes will require a concerted national effort to promote the virtues of older workers and to change attitudes about them in the work force.

I am encouraged along these lines by what some companies are doing to hire and retain older workers. Programs such as job sharing, flexitime, retraining, and part-time jobs are being made available to older workers to encourage them to remain on the job. Studies indicate that older workers are productive and reliable and that employers can benefit from their expertise on the job.

To date the Federal Government has done very little to promote the interests of older workers. One exception is the senior community service employment program authorized by title V of the Older Americans Act. This program provides 65,000 low-income older workers with meaningful and productive jobs in their communities. It is essential that this program be continued and, if possible, expanded to help employ many more older workers.

Providing employment opportunities for the older worker is an important and necessary goal, not only for today but for the future. Moreover, those older Americans who are employed are four times as likely as all others to avoid the clutches of poverty.

For these reasons, I, Mr. PEPPER, and Mr. RINALDO, along with 103 of our colleagues in the House, today join with Senators HEINZ and GLENN in introducing a joint resolution to draw attention to the older worker and to encourage employers to generate employment opportunities for these workers. Specifically, we are requesting that the President authorize the week of March 10 through 16, 1985, as National Employ the Older Worker Week. During this week special programs would be scheduled around the country to inform employers and the public about older worker resources and to educate older persons about available employment opportunities. The outcome should be increased visibility of the need for employing older workers, a better understanding among employers of the benefits of employing older Americans, and wider employment opportunities for those older individuals who would like to make a contribution to society.●

CONTINUE VA AND SOCIAL SECURITY FIELD OFFICES

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I told the House about Reagan administration plans to cut Veterans' Administration counseling centers and Social Security field and regional offices. This effort to reduce direct services to taxpayers is not limited to Social Security and the Veterans' Administration. Rather, the administration plans a major effort to reduce the number of regional offices and field offices of all agencies.

To stop this from happening, I am pleased to join with Representative NORM DICKS in introducing legislation to continue the 10 regional office structure of the Government. This regional structure was a creation of the Nixon administration. In an effort to bring the Government closer to the people it serves, the Nixon administration issued Office of Management and Budget Circular A-105 setting out the standard Federal regions. It was a good idea then and it is a good idea now.

Let's face it: taxpayers are dissatisfied with the amount and quality of service they get from Government for their tax dollars. This is a problem with which we have to deal to restore confidence in Government. If we eliminate the most visible, accessible, and responsive Government offices—those spread throughout the country—we increase taxpayer hostility and further reduce confidence in Government.

I hope we can pass this legislation soon to preserve Government services to our constituents and to prevent further damage to public confidence in the Federal Government.●

INTER-LATA TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMPETITION ACT OF 1985

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Inter-LATA Telecommunications Competition Act of 1985.

Mr. Speaker, we are all too well aware of the tumult in the telecommunications industry—an upheaval which is primarily attributable to the divestiture of the AT&T monopoly. In the year since AT&T divested itself of its local operating companies, the ratepayers of America have been not only confronted with unprecedented increases in local rates, but also threatened with the imposition of end-user access charges or—as the FCC now calls them—subscriber line charges. The concern for continued universal telephone service became so great in the 98th Congress that this body felt compelled to overwhelmingly approve the Universal Telephone Service Preservation Act of 1984, largely in an effort to prevent the imposition of end-user access charges. Indeed, my concern has remained so great that my first action in the 99th Congress was to introduce legislation to prohibit imposition of those unfair and unjustified charges.

However, we are told that we need not worry about local rate increases or the imposition of subscriber line charges which the FCC has ordered effective in June. We have heard promises that the telephone user will soon begin to realize the benefits of increased competition which will come as a result of the divestiture. But I am worried, Mr. Speaker; worried that the Federal Communications Commission has initiated the deregulation of AT&T without sufficient marketplace competition to protect the consumer; worried that terms of the divestiture agreement entered into by AT&T do not ensure the rapid growth of competition necessary to justify the burdens placed upon consumers by that agreement and its sometimes erroneous interpretation; worried that consumers will be adversely affected by divestiture without experiencing any positive benefits.

The deregulation of AT&T by the Commission has already begun. In alaring display of the Commission's deregulatory zeal, the Commission has permitted AT&T to sell its regulated services on an unregulated basis through a separate subsidiary—only a very short step away from complete deregulation of AT&T's services. The Commission also moved away from cost-based rate regulation when it authorized AT&T's "Reach Out America" scheme—long-distance service at a price below AT&T's admitted cost of providing the service, another effort to drive its fledgling competitors from the market. While these and other deregulatory actions may be worthy long-term goals, deregulation of the carrier which retains more than 90 percent of the long-distance voice market defies the realities of the marketplace and fails to serve the public interest which the Commission is charged with protecting.

Moreover, given today's regulatory scheme, I am unsure of the ability of alternative long-distance carriers to compete with an entrenched monopoly of AT&T's—albeit somewhat diminished—size. We are told that the arrival of equal access mandated by the consent agreement—which we must remember was willingly entered into as the settlement of the Department of Justice's antitrust suit against AT&T—will encourage competition by placing AT&T and its competitors on an equal basis. But this argument fails to recognize that AT&T's competitors already enjoy a significant cost advantage as compensation for their inferior access—a cost advantage which placed AT&T and its competitors on a theoretical equal basis even prior to the divestiture. Yet after 10 years of marketplace competition, AT&T retains an overwhelming share of the long-distance market. Clearly the availability of technical equal access alone will not lead to increased competition. With nothing more, AT&T will remain an overwhelming monopoly and the benefits of competition built into the consent agrement will not soon reach the consumer.

In addition, equal access as it is being implemented today hinders rather than facilitates the development of competition. When an end office is converted to equal access, the other common carriers, or OCC's, are charged the same rate as AT&T for a system which still places inequitable burdens on competition and which appears to perpetuate AT&T's market dominance.

As equal access in implemented in individual end offices, the OCC discount is terminated for lines servicing those offices. But, because only a small number of subscribers within a market are served by an individual office, additional costs are incurred by the OCC's which are not borne by AT&T. For instance, it is highly inefficient for OCC's to use mass media to advertise the benefits or even the availability of equal access when only a small minority of potential customers in the market are able to use the new and improved service. Instead, the OCC's must resort to targeted advertising techniques, such as direct mail, that are far more expensive. The current system also forces the OCC's to develop and utilize dual billing systems within the same market—one billing system which reflects the discounted inferior access rates and a separate billing system which reflects the new and higher equal access rate. AT&T does not incur these increased costs for advertizing and billing because it and its customers already enjoy premium access throughout the market.

Further, the current practice of providing equal access through individual end offices, rather than through access tandems—systems which link several end offices—requires costly and inefficient connections for the OCC's. Rather than use a small number of trunk lines from their switch to an access tandem—which in turn is tied to several end offices, thus pooling traffic—OCC's must purchase individual trunk lines to each equal access end office. Given their minute market share, the individual OCC does not generate sufficient traffic from each end office to utilize even a small portion of a trunk line's capacity. The competitors are forced to bear the cost of facilities which they have no hope of ever using. Again, this extraordinary cost of equal access is not paid by AT&T.

The most burdensome aspect of the current system is the practice of routing default traffic to AT&T—a practice which only serves to perpetuate AT&T's monopoly of the long-distance market. When an end office is converted to equal access, subscribers served by that facility are given the opportunity to choose a preferred long-distance carrier. This choice was one of the centerpieces of the consent agreement. But the Bell Operating Companies are permitted to automatically route calls to AT&T for any subscriber who neglects to select a carrier. The local operating companies have no incentive to encourage the subscriber to make a choice. Currently, AT&T has been the beneficiary of a large number of default subscribers—on the order of 70 percent—as indicated by what is actually happening in already converted markets. This practice serves to maintain AT&T's monopoly and to deny the benefits of competition to those bearing the presumed, but unproven, additional costs of divestiture—the consumers.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the InterLATA Telecommunications Competition Act of 1985 to ease the impact of the changes in the telecommunications industry on consumers by smoothing the transition from a Government-regulated monopoly to a fully competitive long-distance market. The purpose of the bill is twofold: First, to promote competition in long-distance telecommunications service; and second, to prevent the premature deregulation of the dominant common carrier—AT&T—but then to facilitate its deregulation once it is shown not to possess monopoly power, which, for too many years, has worked against free-enterprise competition.

The bill seeks to ensure for the telephone consumer the benefits sought in the divestiture agreement and to protect the consumer from potential abuses by AT&T with its monopoly power while at the same time allowing for AT&T's deregulation when that potential no longer exists.

The bill addresses the deregulation of AT&T by providing that the FCC may not deregulate AT&T unless—after a full agency hearing—the FCC finds that with respect to every local access transport area [LATA], AT&T does not possess monopoly power in providing inter-LATA telecommunications service. In defining the monopoly power standard to be applied, the bill adopts traditional antitrust principles which are well established in case law. Under this traditional view, monopoly power is the "ability to control prices or exclude competition." The test which has been developed by case law begins with an examination of market share. If a market participant's share of the market is significantly large, that participant has often been presumed to possess monopoly power. Consistent with this approach and in accord with case law, the bill deems monopoly power to exist if AT&T's share of the long-distance market exceeds 60 percent. ATT's share currently exceeds 90 percent.

Those who urge the rapid deregulation of AT&T have misinterpreted and taken statements out of context from cases which suggest that monopoly power is not determined by examining market share alone; but rather, requires examination of other factors to determine whether the power to control prices or exclude competition exists. Such judicial statements have been made, it is true, but only in cases where the market share involved was less than that which warranted a presumption that monopoly power existed. In such cases, the absence of a presumption concerning the existence of monopoly power based on market share alone required a fuller examination of the facts to determine whether the power to control prices or to exclude competition existed. The test for monopoly power, developed over time through case law, is twofold: First, if a market participant has a large enough market share, it is found to possess monopoly power on that basis alone; second, if, however, the market participant does not fall into that market share category, the court can look to other factors to find monopoly power. The bill utilizes this traditional approach. Monopoly power is conclusively deemed to exist if AT&T possesses a long-distance market share in excess of 60 percent. If AT&T's market share is 60 percent or less, monopoly power can nevertheless be found to exist if AT&T retains the ability to control prices or exclude competition.

Of course, under the antitrust laws, possession of monopoly power, without more, is not actionable. Some evidence of abuse of that power is necessary before the antitrust laws impose liability. But this bill does not impose antitrust liability upon AT&T. This bill merely uses the antitrust monopoly power standard—a standard developed by years of case law application—to establish a rational basis for transforming AT&T from a monopoly long regulated by the Government to a deregulated entity in a competitive marketplace. That the regulated entity has not abused its monopoly power is an insufficient standard to determine whether regulation remains necessary to protect the public interest. Rather, before the protection of regulation is removed, the safeguard of adequate competition should be demonstrated to exist so that the public interest will not be placed at risk.

By applying this monoploy power standard, the bill prevents the premature deregulation of AT&T. This includes, but is not limited to: The termination of cost-based rate regulation; the termination of rate regulation based on average costs; the termination of tariff filing requirements; the elimination of Computer II separation requirements; forbearance from regulation within the meaning of the Commission's orders issued in CC Docket No. 79-252; and any similar or related actions having the same or similar effect. Allowing the Commission to deregulate AT&T only when AT&T no longer possesses monopoly power will protect the telephone ratepayer from the potential anticompetitive, anticonsumer activities of an unregulated monopoly.

In addition to protecting the consumer from premature deregulation of AT&T, the bill also encourages competition, thus bringing to the consumer the benefits sought by the divestiture of AT&T. The bill provides that neither the FCC nor any State commission may permit any tariff for inter-LATA exchange access to remain or become effective unless the rate charged to other common carriers is 55 percent less than the rate charged to AT&T for such access until the Commission, with respect to a particular local access transport area [LATA] and upon full agency hearing, makes both of two required findings. First, the Commission must determine that AT&T does not possess monopoly power in providing any long-distance telecommunications service from that LATA. Second, the Commission must find that true equal access is available for OCC's to substantially all end offices within that LATA.

Tying the phaseout of the OCC discount to both the elimination of monopoly power by AT&T and to the availability of equal access must be the cornerstone of any effort to ensure greater competition in long-distance telecommunications services. Only when both these conditions are met can the long-distance market be considered competitive.

As noted earlier, technical equal access is not sufficient to develop a competitive market when one of the market participants already possesses a monopoly. During the 10 years in which OCC's have competed with AT&T, the OCC's have gained less than 10 percent of the market even though they were at least partly compensated for their inferior access. Therefore, loss of monopoly power by AT&T must be added to the equation before the OCC discount can be eliminated without anticompetitive consequences.

Conversely, phasing out the OCC discount based solely on the loss of monopoly power by AT&T would likewise fail to produce a lasting competitive market. If equal access were not a precondition to the phasing out of the OCC discount, AT&T would swiftly regain monopoly power when the OCC's began paying the same price for an inferior service.

The equal access required by this bill must be equivalent in type and quality to that provided AT&T. The equality requirement is broad, extending to ancillary services provided to AT&T. Such ancillary services are defined by the bill to include, but are not limited to: 700-service; 800-service; operator assistance; and customer billing. To avoid inefficient and costly trunking by both OCC's and local telephone companies, equal access must be provided through access tandems to meet the requirements of the act. Finally, so that OCC's do not bear inequivalent marketing and billing burdens, the Commission must find that the described equal access is available to substantially all the end offices within the local access transport area in question before terminating the OCC discount for end offices within that LATA.

In order to fully address the problem, the bill applies to tariffs filed with the State commissions, as well as to those filed with the FCC. The bill does not infringe, however, on the States' ability to establish rate levels for exchange access. Instead, the bill requires only that a specific minimum differential be maintained between the rate paid by AT&T and that paid by the OCC's until equal access has been made available and the market is demonstrated to be competitive.

The bill recognizes that without special provision, local telephone companies could experience a revenue shortfall due to the maintenance of the OCC discount. The bill prevents any such shortfall by allowing the local telephone company to adjust its access rates to both AT&T and OCC's while maintaining the required 55-percent differential. In short, the bill guarantees that the effect of the legislation on local telephone companies will be revenue neutral.

Mr. Speaker, the consumers of telephone service are today bearing the burden imposed by the frequently inaccurate interpretations of the divestiture agreement but are not receiving its benefits. Moving swiftly and rationally to a truly competitive long-distance telecommunications market in the manner set forth in this bill while guarding against premature deregulation of AT&T is the best way to deliver those benefits promptly and efficiently to consumers.●

TRIBUTE TO RAYMOND L. McLEAN

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to pay special tribute to my constituent, chief of police of the city of Ventura, Rayond L. McLean on his retirement.

Ray McLean became chief of police in Ventura in 1978. Prior to that time he had been chief of police of the city of Montclair, CA, from 1959. In his current position, Chief McLean has 155 personnel under his jurisdiction for a city whose population is 85,000.

Some of his significant accomplishments include reorganization of the department and reprioritization of levels of service due to cutback requirements of "proposition 13." He was project director of a $5 million program to construct a police/fire headquarters building and developed an integrated computer-aided police/fire dispatch center, automated records system, crime analysis system and automated dictation system.

Chief McLean has 32 years experience in law enforcement, including the two stints as chief of the cities of Ventura and Montclair. He received his B.A. in sociology in 1958 at California State College, Los Angeles and attended the FBI National Academy in 1965. He holds a special subjects teaching credential and executive certificate-POST. Ray is affiliated with the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the California Police Chiefs Association and the California Peace Officers Association.

Chief McLean is retiring from the police department of the city of Ventura to affiliate himself with the office of the California State attorney general. He will be greatly missed by the citizens of Ventura.●

HONORING CHARLES W. KUNKLE, JR.

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, one of Johnstown's leading citizens and most community-spirited leaders is stepping down as head of the Johnstown Area Regional Industries, the economic development arm of the area.

Holding this voluntary post for over a decade, Charlie Kunkle led the Johnstown community through some of its most difficult times. His work has been synonymous with the attraction of new industry to the area, the rebuilding of the downtown Johnstown area, and the growing diversification of the economic base.

Charlie Kunkle is one of those individuals who demonstrate what America is all about. What makes us the greatest country in the world? It is the unselfish, volunteer acts of thousands of American citizens who take their time to help their fellow citizens.

The last decade has been a difficult one for the Johnstown community. Economic problems have often seemed to topple over one another. Yet, Charlie never lost his dedication, his hopes, his imagination, and his commitment to the people of the area and their needs.

Having had the opportunity to work with him closely over those years, I can say without hesitation that we never would have achieved what we have without the work of Charlie Kunkle.

Even in an interview given recently noting his formal departure from JARI, he spoke with enthusiasm about the area's future, saying "We're ready to go."

In recognizing future ecomomic success, we will remember in the Johnstown area that the foundation for the future has been laid by the work and dedication of Charlie Kunkle.

In giving tribute to a fellow member of the House of Commons, Winston Churchill once said, "The only guide to a man is his conscience; the only shield to his memory is the rectitude and sincerity of his action." Against this measure, Charlie Kunkle deserves our congratulations and our highest possible praise.●

ROMANIA, PERSECUTION, AND MFN STATUS

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, last week I met with a friend who had recently returned from a trip to Eastern Europe. During our visit, he recounted to me several disturbing incidents of religious persecution in Romania, a nation which currently enjoys most-favored-nation [MFN] status.

There is, apparently, a well-defined cycle to such persecution in Romania—a cycle based on the fear of losing MFN status. Because such status is reviewed each summer, religious persecution is the harshest during the winter months. It then begins to slacken as the time for renewal approaches. By June—the month the President notifies Congress of his intent to renew or cancel MFN status—religious persecution is almost nonexistent. Once this status has been secured for another year, persecution picks up again.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear to the Romanian officials that Congress is aware of the persecution that occurs in their country throughout the year, not just in June. As a signatory of the Helsinki international accords on human rights, Romania has pledged to uphold the freedom of religion for its citizens. The Romanian Government's actions, however, are far different from its rhetoric. I learned of church burnings and the denial of internal passports for pastors, among other incidents.

Given this cycle of persecution, I urge my colleagues to oppose any attempts to grant MFN status every 3 years rather than every year. Without guarantees of religious freedom for all Romanians, we would be condemning many to extended periods of persecution.●

THE DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the 98th Congress approved the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 in June of last year. While I am generally in favor of measures to eliminate the deficit and reform our present tax system, I felt many of the provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act were unsound and, therefore, voted against this legislation. Section 179 of the Deficit Reduction Act is one provision in particular which I believe creates unnecessary hardships for the taxpayer.

As you are aware, this section of the Deficit Reduction Act provides for changes in the Internal Revenue Service rules and regulations on the taxation of automobiles used for business purposes. The changes in the Tax Code as established in the Deficit Reduction Act, require taxpayers to substantiate any tax credit or deduction for business use of listed property with adequate contemporaneous records. In order to comply with this requirement, taxpayers must maintain cumbersome logs or journal with individual entries specifying names purposes, mileage, and times for property used for personal and business purposes.

On January 25, 1985, the Internal Revenue Service announced it will issue temporary and proposed regulations modifying the requirement to keep adequate contemporaneous records for automobiles and certain other vehicles. The Internal Revenue Service contends that these modifications will reduce substantially the recordkeeping burden imposed for certain vehicles used for business purposes. I still believe, however, that the provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act which established the recordkeeping requirement should be repealed.

The simplicity of our tax system is an important aspect to consider when making changes to the Tax Code. The simplicity can be measured by how well taxpayers understand the tax system and how easily they can comply with its provisions. A finance minister to Louis XIV once wrote, "The art of taxation consists in so plucking the goose as to obtain the largest amount of feathers with the least possible amount of hissing." Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks I have received hundreds of letters from farmers, electricians, plumbers, salesmen, painters, doctors, and a list of others attempting to comply with these recordkeeping requirements. Regardless of the particular field of work, the complaints I am hearing from my constituents are all the same. These taxpayers are frustrated from daily attempting to maintain meticulous records for each business related trip they make in their automobile. The upkeep of these records requires a great deal of time as well as large amounts of paperwork.

I do not believe taxpayers should be subjected to the overall hassles of adhering to these recordkeeping requirements. Accordingly, I have introduced the Business Tax Records Reduction Act of 1985, H.R. 783, to repeal section 179 of the Deficit Reduction Act. I am concerned that our Tax Code be sound enough to force strong compliance with regulations for deductions relating to automobiles used for business purposes. I do not, however, believe we should continue to unduly burden the American taxpayer with this bothersome recordkeeping requirement.●

SAXONBURG WORKS SALUTED

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in tribute to the employees of United States Steel Corp.'s Saxonburg Works in Clinton Township, Butler County, PA. Next week the plant is scheduled to produce its 100 millionth ton of high quality sinter since becoming operational in 1958.

Although relatively obscure in the iron and steel making process, sinter is an important blast furnace feedstock. Sinter consists of recycled materials bearing iron ore as well as newly mined iron ore, limestone, and dolomite. These and other raw materials are fed through a processing line that fuses them into a honeycomb-like rock. The sinter is then cooled and crushed for shipment to the blast furnaces at United States Steel's Edgar Thompson Works in Braddock, PA.

While imports have caused markets for steel products produced in United States Steel's Mon Valley operation to evaporate, the Saxonburg Works has normally been able to provide jobs for 80 to 100 area residents.

Mr. Speaker, once again, I salute the people of the Saxonburg Works and congratulate them on producing their 100 millionth ton of quality product.●

EXTEND THE FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION PROGRAM

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to extend the Federal Supplemental Compensation Program for an additional 2 years.

This program, first enacted in 1982, is designed to assist the long-term unemployed by providing 8 to 14 weeks of supplemental benefits to those who have exhausted 39 weeks of other State and Federal jobless payments. Last extended during October 1983, the current program is authorized only through the week of March 31, 1985.

While it is true that the national unemployment rate has been on the decline as the economic recovery continues, certain States, such as West Virginia, still suffer from extremely high levels of joblessness. Historically, West Virginia has been one of the last States coming out of a recession and this is occurring today.

For States such as West Virginia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Michigan, additional Federal unemployment benefits are essential to the livelihood of laid-off workers and their families as they continue to search for employment. However, if the FSC program expires, once these workers go through their regular State unemployment insurance programs and where eligible, the extended benefits program, they will have no option but welfare.

The employment situation is still grim for many, and in fact, 8 million Americans are jobless today. This statistic alone reflects the need for prompt action on this legislation.●

THE TENANTS' PROTECTION ACT

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, along with Messrs. MOODY, JEFFORDS, HAWKINS, LELAND, MITCHELL, RANGEL, WEISS, LEHMAN of Florida, LEVINE, MORRISON, and WILLIAMS, I have today reintroduced a measure that will have a significant impact on the civil rights of tenants.

The Tenants' Protection Act is offered as a way for the Federal Government to help guarantee that an individual's right to participate in a tenants' group is not infringed.

Often the very nature of a tenant-advocacy organization inherently puts it in an adversarial relationship with the landlord or the landlord's agent. Although in many cases both parties are able to work together in order to promote a common goal, there are instances in which some landlords seek to intimidate or retaliate against those who rightfully and completely legally attempt to improve their living conditions. The Federal Government has a compelling interest to protect the 1st and 14th amendment rights of the tenants who form associations to speak out about and correct discriminatory or substandard conditions in their apartments.

Mr. Speaker, the Tenants' Protection Act amends the Civil Rights Act of 1968 by widening the scope of the Fair Housing Act. Under the proposed legislation, individuals who endeavor to participate in tenants' groups would be protected under the provisions of 42 U.S.C. 631, which deals with intimidation, interference and injury to individuals on account of their class, or because of their advocacy on behalf of a class. The bill, by protecting tenants groups, would fill in the void that currently exists in the law. I invite my colleagues to cosponsor this important legislation.

Thank you.●

NATIONAL SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE WEEK

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce a bill designating the week of June 16 through June 22, 1985 as "National Safety in the Workplace Week."

It is a little known fact that in 1983 alone, workplace accidents accounted for 11,300 fatalities, and 1,930,000 injuries—causing the loss of more than $33 billion to American industry. The pain and suffering endured by the victims and their families is incalculable.

The American Society of Safety Engineers, headquartered in my district, joins me in urging that my colleagues cosponsor this resolution as a way to promote occupational safety in all industries through the efforts of both workers and management.●

THE PUBLIC HEARING PROCESS

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my distinguished colleagues a recent book entitled "Public Hearings Procedures and Strategies" by Dr. Jean Mater.

Nothing like this book has ever before appeared in print. Written by Dr. Jean Mater, a leading authority on public hearings, it marks the first methodical attempt to show how Americans can use the public hearing process to bring their ideas to bear on public decision—in their community, State, and even here in Washington.

I'm sure it is unnecessary to remind my colleagues that effective participation by all people in government is the foundation of this democracy.

I commend Dr. Jean Mater's book, "Public Hearings Procedures and Strategies," to all Americans who want to have their voices be heard in the decisionmaking process of our Government.●

A MEMORIAL TRIBUTE TO TED PENSZYNSKI

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a great American. On January 7, 1985, Mr. Thaddeus A. (Ted) Penszynski, former mayor and councilman of Harper Woods, MI, died after suffering a massive coronary, while attending a public hearing at city hall.

Ted Penszynski was a tremendously dedicated, loyal, and effective public servant. Without discretion, Mr. Penszynski gave of himself to all people within our community. Ted was an active member of the local branches of the Lions Club, Little League, Association of Retarded Citizens, board of education, Rotary Club and various other organizations. While serving his community, Ted Penszynski worked to make Harper Woods a better place for its citizens.

Ted Penszynski epitomized how a public servant should represent his community. It is a common practice for public officials to serve a given community with patience, diligence, conviction, and dedication. Ted Penszynski possessed an extraordinary level of these qualities. Moreover, it was his exceptional integrity that set him apart from other public officials.

The community of Harper Woods is forever grateful to Ted Penszynski for sharing his rare qualities with us. All public officials should strive toward achieving the level of professionalism he displayed.

I join the people of Harper Woods in paying our highest respect to Ted Penszynski. We sorrowfully extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Joann, his two sons, Steven and Carl, and his daughter, Linda. We greatly appreciate the outstanding contributions of Ted Penszynski to the Harper Woods community. He will always be remembered in our prayers.●

A QUICK WAY TO CUT $1.5 BILLION OFF THE PRESIDENT'S DEFICITS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the President's budget is unacceptable. He is asking for $5,707 in new Federal debt per second!

That level of debt accumulation will lead to future economic disaster.

The President likes to talk about his opportunity society—but it is just an opportunistic society that spends more than it is willing to pay for and which reduces the opportunities of its children by burdening them with $2 trillion in debt.

Here is one quick area we can cut $1.5 billion off the President's deficits. Once again, he is asking for enterprise zone legislation—an elaborate cat's-cradle of tax subsidies and loopholes. Yet on page 2-15 of "The Budget of the United States Government," the President proposes eliminating the Economic Development Administration and urban development action grants, because—and I quote—"these programs merely assist local governments in their efforts to compete with other areas to attract private investment."

That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what enterprise zones do. Therefore, if we are to abolish EDA and UDAG, we should not create enterprise zones. Q.E.D.●

TRIBUTE TO DOROTHY L. SCHECTER

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in paying tribute to my friend and constituent, Ventura County Counsel, Dorothy L. Schecter, on the occasion of her retirement from that office.

Dorothy is the wife of my former colleague, Thomas L. Schecter, with whom I shared an office for many years, and it has been my pleasure to have known her for a long time.

Mrs. Schecter attended the University of Southern California where she received her LLB degree in 1964, having been a member of the Law Review and graduating in the top 20 percent of her class. Upon graduation, she started work as a law clerk for the Ventura County District Attorney's office and upon being admitted to practice in January 1965, became the first women deputy district attorney in Ventura County. Upon formation of the county counsel's office in 1966 she became an assistant county counsel, again being the first woman in the county to hold that position. In 1971 she was made chief assistant county counsel, acting county counsel in September 1972 and was formally appointed county counsel by the board of supervisors on February 27, 1973. She was the first woman in the State of California to be named a county counsel.

Mrs. Schecter is admitted to practice before the courts in the State of California, the United States district court for the southern district, the United States court of appeals, and the United States Supreme Court. She has been a member of the District Attorney's County Counsel's Association of California; Tri-counties Government Attorneys' Association, Women Lawyers Association of Ventura County, School Business, Executives Association, and the Ventura County Law Library Board of Trustees, having also served as its president.

She has received many honors in the course of her public career, including being selected to serve on the Ventura County Management Posture Committee from 1973 to the present. She served in 1976-77 as the first woman president of the County Counsels' Association of California and as president of the Ventura County Bar Association in 1979-80. In 1973 she was named as Business Woman of the Year by the Ventura County Business and Professional Women's Association and in 1984 she received the first award of the Ventura County Management Association as the outstanding departmental manager.

Dorothy has been married to Tom for 30 years and plans to become associated with him in his law practice as well as enjoy cooking, gardening, swimming, and horseback riding. She and her husband raise horses and enjoy the rural life.●

SIX MORE WEEKS OF WINTER

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I would to like to include here my remarks given on Groundhog's Day, February 2, 1985, on Gobbler's Knob in Punxsutawney, PA.

First of all, I'd like to say . . . it's an honor to finally meet you Phil. I know that there are some spurious pretenders to your throne . . . other groundhogs from around the United States who claim to be the real groundhog. But you are the true seer of seers. Pennsylvania's earliest settlers found groundhogs in profusion in many parts of the State and they determined that the groundhog was the most intelligent and most sensible animal around, and, therefore, decided that if the Sun did not appear on February 2, so wise and noble an animal as you could properly and accurately interpolate a shadow. In all these years, you Phil have yet to make an inaccurate forecast. The weather has been inaccurate but never you. And for that reason, I'd like to take this opportunity to invite you to come to Washington to explain your legendary forecasting techniques to the experts at the National Weather Service. For that matter, I think you could help our economic forecasters as well. You certainly couldn't do any worse. And if you decide to come down to Washington and you can't find a comfortable burrow to stay in, you have a standing invitation to stay at the House of Representatives. It's such a zoo down there that you'll feel right at home. And now the proclamation:

Here Ye! Here Ye!
To all faithful followers here on Gobbler's Knob
And to all believers around the world,
Especially everyone involved in the Groundhog Run
In Kansas City, Missouri:
I, James H. Means, President of the Punxsutawney Groundhog Club
Proclaim that His Majesty, King Philip,
Has come out of his royal burrow at 7:28 a.m.
In the cold light of dawn, he stood tall and proud.
In seconds, he spied a thin, gray shadow over his right shoulder.
Punxsutawney Phil declares there will be six more weeks of winter.
But, the worst is over.
Changes are on the way.
Like President Reagan, Phil believes that golden days are ahead.
Having made his reliable prediction, the world's most famous weather-forecasting groundhog
Has gone back into his burrow.
That's the official word today, February 2nd,
From Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania,
The weather capital of the world.●

CONTROL FEDERAL SPENDING

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation that I believe would make an important contribution to our effort to control Federal spending and balance the Federal budget. My legislation proposes an amendment to the Constitution allowing a line-item veto in appropriations acts.

If enacted, this amendment would enable the President to veto specific spending programs in appropriations bills, excluding entitlements. The President's action could be overridden by a three-fifths vote by both Houses of Congress. I believe that the enactment of the item veto would result in more cooperation between the President and the Congress in the development of Federal programs and that this in turn would result in more efficient, cost-effective Government. It would also give the President the opportunity to focus on specific programs in need of reform or elimination.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that many of our colleagues will be concerned over the apparent shift of power on appropriations matters from the Congress to the President because of the item veto. I share those concerns most sincerely, but believe strongly that our economy is heading into a most perilous period and we must study every available option for curbing the excessive Federal spending that threatens our economy.

The line-item veto, while not a panacea, would put the Congress on alert on specific programs that should be cut or more thoroughly scrutinized without necessarily jeopardizing the larger appropriations bills and programs that merit continuing support. Additionally, my proposal would also permit the Congress to override item vetoes with a three-fifths vote, less than the two-thirds vote now required to override Presidential vetoes on regular bills. Although there would be a theoretical shift in power to the President as a result of the item veto authority, it would not be precipitous, and would enable the Congress ample opportunity to check Presidential actions.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that our colleagues will give my proposal their careful consideration. The budget deficit promises to produce a dangerous credibility gap between the Congress and the American people on Federal spending, not to mention the irreparable damage that will be done to our economy if we fail to act on the deficit. The item veto gives us one more important tool with which to wage the deficit fight, and I hope that the Congress will debate this issue with renewed vigor in the days ahead.●

AMERICAN LIVER FOUNDATION NATIONAL LIVER AWARENESS MONTH

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would designate November 1985 as "American Liver Foundation National Liver Awareness Month." I believe it is important that we set aside a month devoted to learning more about the liver and liver diseases. Many people are unaware that liver diseases claim 50,000 lives annually and are the fourth leading cause of death for Americans between the ages of 15 and 65. There are no known causes, effective treatments—other than liver transplants—or cures for the vast majority of liver diseases.

Unfortunately, although there are many conditions which can lead to liver diseases, people suffering from these diseases must also deal with the unjust stigma resulting from the common, but mistaken, notion that liver disease is caused only by alcoholism.

The American Liver Foundation is the only national organization to focus on the full array of liver diseases. The foundation is a network of vounteers, families, researchers, and health care professionals located throughout the United States. All of these individuals are dedicated to funding and increasing research to find the causes, treatments, and cures for these devastating diseases.

The foundation is committed to promoting the health of Americans by increasing public awareness of all conditions which can lead to a liver disease, providing health and therapy information and education programs about liver disease for lay persons and professionals.

I believe passage of this legislation will help further the important work of the American Liver Foundation, and I urge my colleagues to lend their support to this worthy measure.●

THE CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES PENALTIES ACT OF 1985

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation that seeks to amend the Controlled Substances Act and the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act by modifying criminal penalties for certain drug offenses. This bill would only change the penalties in cases involving bulk amounts of narcotic drugs. I feel that this legislation is necessary to take the amendments that were made in the last Congress one step further.

I feel that steps must be taken to isolate the big-time drug trafficker and to impose stricter penalties in cases where large amounts of narcotic drugs are involved. This bill is necessary because steps must be taken to prevent these drug traffickers from leaving the country after posting bond. My bill eliminates bond in those cases involving bulk amounts of narcotic drugs. This no bond provision is vital because it ensures that big-time drug traffickers will stand trial and are sent to prison. Mr. Speaker, the immense financial resources and international connections of the big-time drug trafficker are such that even if bond is set at an exorbitant level, the money will appear and the risk of flight is great. I think that given the nature of the crime and the nature of international drug trafficking, the risk of flight in cases involving bulk amounts of narcotic drugs is self-evident. Therefore, the no bond provision in my bill would be an effective measure in preventing those accused either of importing or dealing large amounts of narcotics from posting bond and leaving the country.

My bill would increase the penalties in cases involving a kilogram or more of cocaine; 2 or more kilograms of any other controlled substance in schedule I or II which is a narcotic drug; a kilogram or more of phencyclidine [PCP]; or 25 grams or more of lysergic acid diethylamide [LSD]. Those convicted of violating this act involving the previously mentioned amounts of narcotic drugs would be subject to the following penalties: For first offense the penalty will be increased from a maximum 20-year sentence and $250,000 fine, to a maximum of 30 years imprisonment and/or a $500,000 fine.

First offenders would not be eligible for bond and will not be eligible for parole until at least one-half the sentence imposed has been served. Second offenders will be subject to either a life sentence—previous penalty was up to 40 years—or the death penalty. The death penalty shall be imposed only in cases where the defendant resisted arrest or was armed with a dangerous weapon at the time of the arrest for such offense. My bill makes reference to the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 relative to the procedural provisions for the imposition of the death penalty. That act has provisions for a death penalty in cases involving the death of an individual as a result of an air hijacking. The procedures and provisions mentioned in that section of the Federal Aviation Act would also apply in my bill.

The problem of drug abuse and drug trafficking has become monumental in this country. Every day massive amounts of narcotic drugs are illegally brought into this country or bought and sold in this country. It is through these huge dealings that these deadly narcotic drugs find their way to the local street dealer and ultimately into the hands of our youths. It has become a national tragedy that each day young men and women, boys and girls, and even unborn babies die as a result of drug overdose. The big-time drug trafficker is the one who imports and deals these deadly drugs—most times with impunity from the law. In most cases it is the addict or the small time dealer who is arrested and sent to prison. But the big-time dealer—because of his financial resources and international connections either escapes the hand of the law or posts even the most exhorbitant bond and then leaves the country. My bill would make a serious effort to isolate the big-time operator and prevent him from posting bond and leaving the country. My bill would also provide the judge with the option of imposing a stiff sentence, up to 30 years, for a first offense. My bill would also provide the judge with the option of imposing either a life sentence or the death penalty for second offenders. The death penalty should be an option for the judge to consider if the defendant resisted arrest or had in his possession a deadly weapon—the potential to do serious harm to the arresting officer. This would send out a powerful signal that the United States is dead serious about combatting drug trafficking and is willing to take harsh steps to better protect our law enforcement officers involved in drug enforcement.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of narcotic drugs that are smuggled into this country has reached catastrophic proportions. Those who are masterminding and directing this illicit activity must be deterred and stopped. This legislation is just one step toward the fight against these drug traffickers and against drug abuse in this country. The stakes are high—so many young lives are needlessly lost and abused through drugs. This bill will be a bold statement that the Federal Government has indeed declared war on drug traffickers and is willing to take the necessary steps to protect our youth and to protect drug enforcement officers.

At this time Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert into the RECORD the full text of this bill:

H.R. 994

A bill to amend the Controlled Substances Act and the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act to modify criminal penalties for certain drug offenses

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Controlled Substances Penalties Act of 1985".

CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES ACT AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 401 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841(b)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)—

(A) in subparagraph (A)(i), by inserting ", but less than a kilogram," after "100 grams or more";

(B) in subparagraph (A)(ii), by inserting ", but less than 2 kilograms" after "a kilogram or more";

(C) in subparagraph (A)(iii), by inserting ", but less than a kilogram" after "500 grams or more"; and

(D) in subparagraph (A)(iv), by inserting ", but less than 25 grams" after "5 grams or more";

(E) by redesignating subparagraphs (B) and (C) as subparagraphs (C) and (D) respectively; and

(F) by inserting after subparagraph (A) the following new subparagraph:

"(B) In the case of a violation of subsection (a) of this section involving—

"(i) a kilogram or more of a controlled substance in schedule I or II which is a mixture or substance containing a detectable amount of a narcotic drug consisting of—

"(I) coca leaves;

"(II) a compound, manufacture, salt, derivative, or preparation of coca leaves; or

"(III) a substance chemically identical thereto;

"(ii) 2 or more kilograms of any other controlled substance in schedule I or II which is a narcotic drug;

"(iii) a kilogram or more of phencyclidine (PCP); or

"(iv) 25 grams or more of lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD); such person shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 30 years, a fine of not more than $500,000, or both. No person shall not be eligible for release under chapter 207 of title 18 of the United States Code pending trial for, or appeal with respect to, an offense under this subparagraph. A person convicted under this subparagraph shall not be eligible for parole with respect to such conviction until at least one-half the sentence imposed with respect to such conviction has been served. If any person commits such a violation after one or more prior convictions of him for an offense punishable under this paragraph, or for a felony under any other provision of this title or title III or other law of a State, the United States, or a foreign country relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a time of imprisonment for life, or to the penalty of death. The procedural provisions of section 903(c) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 shall apply to the imposition of a death penalty under this section, except that for the purpose of paragraph (7) of such subsection, in lieu of the factors listed in subparagraphs (A) and (B), the only applicable factor is that the defendant resisted arrest for such offense or was armed with a dangerous weapon at the time of the arrest for such offense."; and

(2) in subparagraph (C) as so redesignated, by striking out "(A) and (C)" and inserting "(A), (B), and (D)" in lieu thereof.

CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES IMPORT AND EXPORT ACT AMENDMENTS

SEC. 3. Subsection (b) of section 1010 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 960(b)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)—

(A) in subparagraph (A), by inserting ", but less than a kilogram," after "100 grams or more";

(B) in subparagraph (B), by inserting ", but less than 2 kilograms" after "a kilogram or more";

(C) in subparagraph (C), by inserting ", but less than a kilogram" after "500 grams or more"; and

(D) in subparagraph (D), by inserting ", but less than 25 grams" after "5 grams or more";

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (2) and (3) as paragraphs (3) and (4), respectively;

(3) by inserting after paragraph (1) the following new paragraph:

"(2) In the case of a violation of subsection (a) of this section involving—

"(A) a kilogram or more of a controlled substance in schedule I or II which is a mixture or substance containing a detectable amount of a narcotic drug consisting of—

"(i) coca leaves;

"(ii) a compound, manufacture, salt, derivative, or preparation of coca leaves; or

"(iii) a substance chemically identical thereto;

"(B) 2 or more kilogams of any other controlled substance in schedule I or II which is a narcotic drug;

"(C) a kilogram or more of phencyclidine (PCP); or

"(D) 25 grams or more of lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD);

the person committing such violation shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 30 years, a fine of not more than $500,000, or both. No person shall not be eligible for release under chapter 207 of title 18 of the United States Code pending trial for, or appeal with respect to, an offense under this paragraph. A person convicted under this paragraph shall not be eligible for parole with respect to such conviction until at least one-half the sentence imposed with respect to such conviction has been served. If any person commits such a violation after one or more prior convictions of him for an offense punishable under this paragraph, or for a felony under any other provision of this title or title II or other law of a State, the United States, or a foreign country relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a time of imprisonment for life, or to the penalty of death. The procedural provisions of section 903(c) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 shall apply to the imposition of a death penalty under this section, except that for the purpose of paragraph (7) of such subsection, in lieu of the factors listed in subparagraphs (A) and (B), the only applicable factor is that the defendant resisted arrest for such offense or was armed with a dangerous weapon at the time of the arrest for such offense.";

(4) in paragraph (3) as so redesignated, by striking out "and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof ", (2), and (4)"; and

(5) in paragraph (4) as so redesignated, by striking out ", except as provided in paragraph (4)".●

CORRECT IDENTIFICATION FOR RESISTANCE MOVEMENTS IS ESSENTIAL

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, most of us in this body realize that words can represent ideas and ideas have power. Today, I take a moment of our colleagues time to discuss the mistaken use of various terms when discussing those who are seeking to change the regime or government in a country.

The worst violation of definitional accuracy is the routine use of the word "rebel" or "rebel group" when describing a person or group resisting the domination of a country by a foreign power using military might.

According to Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary, a rebel is one who "oppose(s) or disobey(s) one in authority or control; renounce(s) by force the authority of one's government." There is no substantiation to call Afghans opposing Soviet military occupation or Angolans fighting Cuban occupation "rebels." Likewise, "rebels" is inaccurately described to those persons or groups attempting to terminate the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea. It is much more accurate to term these movements as resistance movements, similar to those in Western Europe under Nazi occupation.

Roget's Thesaurus (third edition), cites the following synonyms for "rebel"—"revolter; insurgent; insurrectionist; mutineer; brawler; rioter; malcontent; agitator." These are decidedly negative connotations, clearly referring to persons or groups opposing legally constituted authority.

I point these observations out, Mr. Speaker, because the misuse of the term "rebels" seriously undermines the truth in at least two ways. First, it verifies the legitimacy of a foreign oppressor and second, it trivializes the nature of the occupier's opposition.

It is much more useful to use accuate terms because referring to Cambodians, Tigrayans, and Eritreans, UNITA, and Afghans as "rebels" undermines the high moral ground of their resistance.

There is a group in the House who prefer to refer to these legitmate resistance movements as "freedom fighters." I have much sympathy for their position but there is a downside to this term. Seeking to clean up the image of the terror-using African National Congress, the U.S. press sometimes refers to its imprisoned leader as a "nationalist" rather than a rebel. In some people's eyes a nationalist can be equated with a freedom fighter. "Freedom fighter" is too imprecise, therefore.

A resistance, according to Mr. Webster, is "an underground organization of a conquered country engaging in sabotage and secret operations against occupation forces and collaborators." Here we have an accurate term for those opposing foreign occupiers. There is a positive connotation.

Mr. Speaker, when regimes come to power which are so fragile that they must be underpinned by a foreign army, they are prima facie illegitimate and their opposition cannot be "rebels." To misuse this term clouds sharp policy debate and undermines the chance of these and other occuppied peoples of taking courage from the United States.●

HOUSE HONORS SEVEN JEFFERSON COUNTY EAGLE SCOUTS

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, the attainment of the highest rank of Scouting, Eagle Scout, is an achievement toward which all Boy Scouts aspire but few achieve. That is why I feel particularly honored to represent Boy Scout Troop No. 86 in Birmingham, AL, which held an Eagle Scout Award ceremony on Monday, February 4, 1985, to present, not one, but seven Eagle Scout badges to seven outstanding young men.

The seven young men who have attained this highest Scouting rank are Charles B. Collat, John O. Greaves, Bryan B. Patton, Lee A. Pilleteri, William E. Smith III, Thomas M. Spencer, and Benjamin S. Weil. All possess the strength of character, integrity, physical, and leadership abilities that our country needs as we advance into the future.

Only 2 percent of the Scouts across this country achieve the rank of Eagle Scout, and it is quite extraordinary for this number, seven, to become Eagle Scouts in one location. This is a testament not only to these fine young men, but also, the members of Troop No. 86 in Birmingham and Scoutmaster Harry Jeffcoat III, who has done such an outstanding job of providing these youth with the tools they will need to be tomorrow's leaders.

I believe Scoutmaster Jeffcoat, and these young men and their parents, deserve to be recognized by my colleagues in the House of Representatives. They have earned our admiration, praise, and respect.●

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month I made a long overdue visit to my hometown, Selma, AL. While I was there, I enjoyed seeing old friends and renewing close friendships that go back to my boyhood.

One of my longtime and closest friends is a very special person, Keene Wilson. We practically grew up together at the Selma YMCA. We spent several hours reminiscing about our days in Selma but especially about his amazing and courageous experiences in military service.

I remember in 1941 when, as a private, he left Selma with Company C of the Alabama National Guard. Most of his promotions from private to lieutenant colonel were made on the battlefield.

It is indeed a privilege to have Keene Wilson as a lifelong friend. I would like to share with my colleagues some of the military record of this remarkable soldier and great American:

SILVER STAR

In March 1943, Lieutenant Wilson assumed command of Company C, under extreme battle conditions and proceeded to carry out duties of commander in a highly efficient manner despite a schrapnel wound in the abdomen. In April 1943, the company ammunition dump was set on fire by an enemy mortar shell and without regard for his personal safety and at risk to his life, Lieutenant Wilson extinguished the fire by covering it with dirt. This action saved essential ammunition and prevented an explosion which would have threatened the personnel of his command.

BRONZE STAR

From July 4 to September 30, 1944, lieutenant colonel—then captain—distinguished himself in combat and when his battalion commander became a casualty, displayed expert judgment and leadership ability, demonstrated by his keen knowledge of military tactics in swiftly moving his battalion to complete the cutting of the Cherbourg Peninsula. Lieutenant Colonel Wilson received two battlefield promotions.

OAK LEAF CLUSTER TO SILVER STAR

Distinguished himself by gallantry in action against the enemy on June 16, 1944, at Barnesville-Sur-Mer, France. Given command of the 3d Battalion, Colonel Wilson had the mission of capturing the strongly fortified enemy position there. Under cover of darkness, he maneuvered his battalion into a position from which he launched an attack from commanding terrain, assaulted enemy positions at dawn, two enemy battalions reinforced with armored elements were routed from position. The factor of surprise and speed of the attack were the major contributing factors in the victory.

FOREIGN AWARDS

French Croix de Guerre with Palm, Defense of Leningrad Badge, Republic of Korea Presidential Unit, and Citation Badge.

One would think of Keene being a rough, tough battle-scarred combat veteran. On the contrary, I've never known a kinder, more thoughtful and gentler person. I've never even heard him use any profanity.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN C. RYAN

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to honor Mr. John C. Ryan, a former State Senator from Missouri who was tragically killed in a car accident last November. I served in the State senate with John, and it was the great respect which he commanded from his colleagues which allowed him to be the effective lawmaker which he was. His dedication to his job, and his hard work on behalf of his constituents are a model for all legislators. John is greatly missed by all who knew him.●

CHEMICAL MANUFACTURING SAFETY ACT OF 1985

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with several of my colleagues in introducing a comprehensive legislative package designed to prevent chemical accidents and to redress the injuries caused when such tragedies unavoidably occur.

Our concern about the dangerous consequences of the uncontrolled release of toxics into the environment has become painfully acute in recent weeks. From Bhopal, India to Institute, WV, to Linden, NJ, we have seen repeated incidents of chemical releases that threaten peoples' lives.

In the past 11 weeks, 13 separate spill and emission incidents at Linden chemical plants have sent hundreds of New Jersey and New York residents to the hospital and kept thousands of others shut in their homes. At the same time, we have learned that the accident which killed thousands in India could have happened in West Virginia.

In the face of these disturbing incidents, we must reexamine the adequacy of the laws dealing with such emergencies, and today I am proposing changes which will help deal with the dangers.

The legislative package I am introducing today is designed to do something we have never addressed before—prevent accidents in the chemical industry and prepare for the accidents which will inevitably occur. It includes the following basic components:

The first comprehensive national community right to know legislation which includes both notification requirements designed to fully inform communities about the potential chemical hazards in their midst and the mandatory development of emergency response and evacuation plans;

Reforms designed to plug loopholes in the major environmental programs which should prevent such disasters, including the regulation of leaking underground storage tanks and the specific manufacturing processes which led to some of the worst recent incidents;

Provisions designed to breathe life into the hazardous air pollutant requirements of the Clean Air Act by mandating the listing of the most dangerous and toxic substances now know. These provisions have been rendered a legal nullity by the inaction of the Environmental Protection Agency and it is past time for the Congress to relieve the agency of its endless paralysis in this crucial area;

A provision designed to protect workers exposed to hazardous substances in the factory by ensuring that weak OSHA right to know requirements become the floor and not the ceiling for State efforts to safeguard worker health;

A regional training program for firefighters and police who deal with train and truck wrecks which cause dangerous chemical spills; and

A Federal right to sue for victims of chemical disasters containing strong liability provisions and fair procedural rules.

This legislation should create powerful incentives for industry to resolve some of the worst and most dangerous pollution problems. Citizens of the communities around industrial facilities should have the information and legal rights they need to insist on adequate protection for themselves and their families.

We must do all that we can to prevent chemical disasters such as we have witnessed in recent weeks. I believe this legislation will provide us with substantial, and badly needed, protection and I am hopeful we can move forward on it quickly.●

NORWICH SENIOR CENTER COMMENDED FOR JOBS PROGRAM

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment of my colleagues' time to bring to their attention an outstanding example of the excellent programs which can be developed in our communities through a combination of corporate initiative, modest Federal funding and a good deal of creativity on the part of local citizens. The program is a jobs bank at the Norwich Senior Center in Norwich, CT, recently singled out for recognition of the unique service it provides to local seniors. Let me briefly describe this program and the events leading up to its creation.

In 1981, the Dow Chemical Corp. decided to give one of its employees a 6-month leave to volunteer in the community. At the same time, Janice Stewart, director of the Norwich Senior Center was trying to get a senior jobs referral program off the ground, and submitted a request for a volunteer to head the project. Thus, with the help of a Dow Chemical employee, the Norwich Senior Job Bank was begun.

Mrs. Stewart realized immediately that the job bank was filling a long unmet need in the area. Persons over the age of 60 were able to use their skills and earn money on a part- or full-time basis, while members of the community were able to find reasonably priced, dependable employees for any number of job descriptions.

Eager to keep this popular program going, Mrs. Stewart applied for and received a grant from the local area agency on aging under title IIIB of the Older Americans Act. As you know, the Older Americans Act, recently reauthorized by Congress, is the major vehicle for the organization and delivery of a wide array of social services to older Americans. Title III of the act is the part of this law which touches the lives of the greatest number of senior citizens, for it authorizes State agencies on aging to develop a comprehensive and coordinated delivery system for supportive services, nutrition services, and multipurpose senior centers. This system is intended to assist older persons attain maximum independence in their community through the removal of individual and social barriers which may inhibit them.

The Norwich Senior Center has certainly achieved the major goals of the Older Americans Act in creating its Job Bank Program. The number of people served by the program has increased from 126 in 1983 to 493 in 1984, and the placement record this past year was an astonishing 98 to 100 percent. It is no wonder that the University of Southern California chose the Norwich Job Bank as 1 of 12 programs to be profiled in the published results of its nationwide survey on jobs programs for seniors.

Now that it is there, I don't see how we ever got along without the job bank. Its fine example will, I am sure, encourage other communities both in Connecticut and across the country to start similar programs, and I know my colleagues join me at this time in congratulating the Norwich Senior Center on its fine work and in reaffirming the support of this Congress for all programs aimed at tapping the vast resources which is our Nation's elderly.●

CELEBRATING THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF DISTRICT COUNCIL 37

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call the attention of my distinguished colleagues to the 40th anniversary of the birth of District Council 37, a union in the city of New York that has not only changed the lives of its workers and their families but has influenced labor movements all over the world.

Mr. Victor Gotbaum is the executive director of District Council 37, and through his hard work and the hard work of his predecessors, and the membership, much has changed for the worker in America. These changes have resulted in better wages and working conditions for the union's rank and file. They were brought about because the membership united in its purpose.

Looking back over the last 40 years, this ability to unite has been the greatest strength of District Council 37. With a great deal of hard work you have earned the respect and praise of many.

We must use the strengths of our proud history, and reinforce our commitment to doing it together in the future. Without our continued commitment to advancing life for all our members, we will lose ground. So, on this occasion, I praise you for your achievements and urge you to ignite the fire of brotherhood that has been so effective in the past. You have changed the world for so many and so many continue to look to you for guidance.●

WAXMAN SEEKS RESTORATION OF NIH GRANTS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing House Joint Resolution 136 which will reverse the Office of Management and Budget's arbitrary cut in research support for the National Institutes of Health. At issue is not only maintaining support for the world's preeminent biomedical research institution, but also the prerogative of the Congress to assure that the laws it writes are properly administered.

Recently the Office of Management and Budget [OMB] ordered the National Institutes of Health to inform its grantees that 1,500 fewer research grants will be available in 1985 than originally provided by the Congress. The OMB directive reduces from an estimated 6,500 to some 5,000 the number of new research grants NIH will be permitted to award this fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, the OMB's action is arbitrary and a blatant violation of the intent of the Congress in this area. When the 98th Congress considered the fiscal 1985 appropriations bills for the National Institutes of Health both the House and Senate Appropriations Committees made clear that funds were intended to support between 6,200 and 6,850 new and competing individual investigator-initiated research grants.

There is no ambiguity on this subject. The National Institutes of Health properly implemented the law and announced the availability of approximately 6,500 new and competing awards in the current fiscal year.

New and competing research grants are the foundation of scientific progress in the health field. They are in every sense the fuel that has enabled the NIH to distinguish itself and this Nation as the world's leader in health research.

In fiscal year 1985 the NIH received a long overdue and deserved increase in Federal support. The OMB order freezing the number of new and competing NIH research awards at 5,000 jeopardizes one of our most productive Federal programs. In fact, the proposal reduces grant support below the 1984 and 1983 levels.

Mr. Speaker, the administration's attempt to ignore the Congress' directives is cavalier and totally unacceptable.

The signal OMB has sent researchers trying to find a cure for diseases like cancer, diabetes, or heart diease is clear. The message communicated about this administration's priorities in research is unmistakable and should concern—if not frighten—every American.

We don't need to give up on or apologize for the level of support this Nation commits to health research. Health research, particularly basic biomedical research, is our best hope of finding cures, developing more effective and less expensive treatments and preventing the diseases Americans most fear. It will be a sorry legacy if this administration becomes the first to cut research on the causes of disease while committing unprecedented research moneys to perfecting the implements of war.

A strong national defense depends upon the physical health of its people no less than the technical superiority of its military's weaponry. The elimination of human illness and disease has as much to do with achieving world peace as does reducing the competition over missiles and warheads.

In the budget the President recently released, an additonal $8 billion is requested for research in the Department of Defense. Total defense research will rise to a record $39.28 billion in contrast to the $5 billion spent on health.

The President is requesting that next year's NIH budget be cut by almost $300 million. Combined with the OMB's attempt to reduce NIH support for basic research, the budget is an unprecedented reduction. It indicates the administration's willingness to surrender this Nation's world leadership in the health sciences.

House Joint Resolution 136 proposes to set the record straight. The resolution states in clear, unmistakable terms the Congress' commitment to assure that its legislative intent is followed and that the public's support of NIH and its vital research mission is recognized.

Passage of this resolution will assure the public that the Nation's commitment to NIH is unwaivering and that our investment in better understanding the mechanisms of disease will continue to yield impressive dividends. Mr. Speaker, I believe the opportunities before us are vast and the potential for major breakthroughs has never been better.

Mr. Speaker, I urge every Member to join in cosponsoring this important matter.

I request that a copy of House Joint Resolution 136 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

H.J. RES. 136

Joint resolution directing that the National Institutes of Health receive full funding in fiscal year 1985 for new and competing research grants

Whereas the National Institutes of Health are among the foremost biomedical research institutions in the world;

Whereas the National Institutes of Health are responsible for supporting basic biomedical and behavioral research critical to improving the health of the American people;

Whereas the National Institutes of Health promote expansion in scientific knowledge vital to understanding the causes and treatment of disease through the award of grants for individual investigator-initiated research;

Whereas the Congress appropriated funds to award approximately 6,500 such grants in fiscal year 1985 in Public Law 98-619, the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education and Related Agencies Appropriation Act, 1985;

Whereas the National Institutes of Health, under the direction of the Office of Management and Budget, recently notified researchers that the number of new and competing research grants available for award in fiscal year 1985 will be 5,000, which is 1,500 below that intended by the Congress;

Whereas the Office of Management and Budget's order to reduce NIH grant support was in direct contravention of congressional intent as reflected in the House and Senate Committee Reports accompanying the bills leading to Public Law 98-619;

Whereas the Office of Management and Budget's arbitrary reduction in biomedical research support grants will have a seriously disruptive impact on the nation's research capacity and may result in the closing of numerous research laboratories previously notified by the National Institutes of Health that they were likely candidates for funding;

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from appropriations under the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education and Related Agencies Appropriation Act, 1985 funds shall be made available to enable the National Institutes of Health to award 6,500 new and competing research grants in fiscal year 1985.●

EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT RELIEF IS NEEDED NOW

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation urging the President to immediately implement a farm debt restructuring program proposed by Communicating for Agriculture—a farm organization in my district.

The Communicating for Agriculture plan, as authored by Mr. N. Rollie Lake, would lower interest rates, ease repayment terms, improve the turnaround time on loan paperwork, equitably share the risk between private lenders and the Federal Government, and offer some hope to our hard pressed farmers.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor my resolution. A detailed explanation of how the Communicating for Agriculture Modified Debt Recovery Program would work follows:

FARM DEBT RESTRUCTURING, CA MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM, JANUARY 28, 1985

(Prepared by Communicating for Agriculture)

CA is proposing a farm-debt restructuring plan designed to build on present programs, and target farm borrowers who are in financial difficulty yet who can be helped with the right program.[1]

Today, many farmers find themselves in a financial bind. While about 30% of farmers have little or no debt and are doing well economically, there are between 30% and 40% of all farmers who have substantial debt and are in various stages of financial difficulty.

WHO ARE THESE FARMERS IN DIFFICULTY?

Most agricultural production, about 60% in 1982, comes from 205,000 farms (out of 2.4 million total farms) with more than $150,000 in annual sales. Narrowing our focus somewhat, of these farms with sales of $40,000 to $200,000.

19% have a debt-to-asset ratio of greater than 70%. That means, for every $10 of assets, the farmer has more than $7 of debt;

44% have a debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40%;

Farms with debt-to-asset ratios greater than 40% account for 71% of debt on farms in this sales class but only 36% of assets.

For farms in all sales categories with a greater than 70% debt-to-asset ratio, there is little hope of economic survival. In a recent Iowa study, 10% of the farmers fall into this category, hold 9% of the assets and 25% of the total debt.

Farmers with debt-to-asset ratios of greater than 40% are also facing financial difficulties. In that same Iowa study, 28% of the farmers with 30% of the assets and 65% of the debt fall into that category.

The Iowa survey further shows that farmers from all sales/size categories are in the over 40% group and that the majority of these are full-time family farmers.

WHAT IS THE NATURE OF THE FARM DEBT?

Nationally, the total farm debt has increased dramatically. In 1971, total farm debt totalled around $54 billion; in 1976, around $91 billion; and in 1984, total farm debt stands at $215 billion.

Farmers as a group have a much higher debt to income ratio now than in the past. In 1950, the overall debt-to-income ratio stood as less than 1; in 1960, it doubled to 2, changed to over 3 in the early 1970's, to 8 in 1980 and to 10 in 1984. Today the average farmer is trying to support $10 of debt for every $1 of income.

But even more important, the nature of the debt has changed dramatically. Debt today has a much shorter maturity.

Much of the debt is short term with interest rates tied to current loan rates. Even real estate debt is based on variable interest rates or is based on relatively short contract purchases. Maturities on a great deal of real estate debt has moved from 20-25 years in the 1960's and 1970's to 10-15 years or less today.

CAN FARMERS WITH HEAVY DEBT LOADS BE SAVED?

For a substantial segment of the 30% to 40% of farmers who have substantial debt and who are in various stages of financial difficulty, economic survival is a serious question. To help this group there must be a restructuring of farm debt. This group, mostly full-time family farmers, were caught with too much debt at the wrong time, debt that was manageable under the prevailing economic conditions when it was incurred but became a crushing burden when conditions changed.

In the group of farmers, there are many good farmers facing bankruptcy for lack of a way to make the transition from an economy of high inflation, raising land values and low interest rates to one of low inflation, sinking land values and high interest rates.

Many of the farmers in this group can be helped and saved with the right debt restructuring programs.

CA'S DEBT RESTRUCTURING PROPOSAL

In order for farm debtors to pay off debt obligations, a major restructuring of indebtedness will be necessary.

The number one feature of any debt restructuring program is to stretch out principal payments into a manageable debt repayment schedule. The second major feature must provide for a lower rate of interest, and third, for farm lending to continue, the risks must be shared.

The CA proposal utilizes existing FmHA programs and expertise of commercial lenders to accomplish this.

These are the Approved Lenders Program, Insured Operating Loan Program and Limited Resource Program. CA's Debt Restructuring Plan modifies slightly these existing FmHA programs to create a program of modified recovery debt credit.

The heart of the CA debt restructuring proposal is the utilization of FmHA's Approved Lender Program, with some minor modifications.

FMHA APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM

Under FmHA's Approved Lenders Program, a qualified commercial lender is approved in advance to process FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The approved lender makes the loan, services the loan and collects the loan, thereby reducing the paperwork and time required for FmHA approval of loan guarantees. The lender is responsible for seeing that proper and adequate security is obtained and maintained. FmHA makes the final decision on farmers' eligibility, use of funds, and credit worthiness.

WHO DOES THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

In today's farm economy, there are many farmers whose debt-to-assets ratio between 40% and 70% who are caught in a "credit availability gap." These farmers are not in serious enough financial difficulty for consideration by the lender of last resort, FmHA. Yet, they do not quite meet the credit standards of private commercial lenders.

This group is a relatively stronger class of farm borrowers than normal FmHA borrowers. The problem for this class of farm borrowers is that their cash flow is inadequate under current high interest rates and low commodity prices, though their basic personal net worth and equity remains relatively strong. The security behind the loan is strong enough to satisfy the bank lender, yet the loan is classified by bank regulators as a classified loan. For the bank, every classified loan reduces the amount of available assets against which credit can be made available, resulting in less credit being available to farm borrowers.

THE FMHA LOAN GUARANTEE PROGRAM

FmHA Loan Guarantees are designed to provide the credit necessary for family farmers to conduct successful operations. The loans are to be used for the purchase of farm machinery and equipment, basic livestock, annual operating expenses and refinancing for authorized operating loan purposes. Interest rates may be fixed or variable and cannot exceed the rate common in the area. The terms of the loan may be up to seven years on basic security. Quality loans may be guaranteed up to 90% while high risk loans may receive less than a 50% guarantee.

HOW WILL THE APPROVED LENDERS PROGRAM HELP?

Utilizing FmHA's Loan Guarantee Program, the commercial lender will have the additional security to make a bankable loan to farmers who find themselves in a "credit gap". The program is not a bailout for lenders. Unless the loan meets requirements, with a reasonable chance for success FmHA will not approve it.

The program will help, first, by making credit available. Second, the banker will use the banks own (pre-FmHA approved) loan forms familiar to both the borrower and the banker, reducing FmHA's paper-handling load. Third, credit will be available on a much quicker basis, assuring that available guarantee loan funds reach eligible farmers as quickly as possible. Fourth, the banker and borrower are familiar with each other, helping to insure that better loans will be made. Fifth, the borrower is most likely to stretch out the loan payback. A commercial lender will normally have a maximum of five years on the loan while under the FmHA Loan Guarantee Program, a maximum of seven years is possible. This extra two years can assist the farm borrower in achieving an attainable cash flow-payback program.

CA'S MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

CA proposes to utilize FmHA's Approved Lenders Program and Operating Loan Programs to achieve a significant plan for farm debt restructuring. To achieve this will require some modification of each of these programs.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE APPROVED LENDERS AND DIRECT LOAN PROGRAMS

A basic modification to the Approved Lenders Program is to place a maximum rate to be charged on interest. Under the Approved Lenders Program, interest rates may not exceed the prevailing interest rate in the areas in which the loan is made. At present, this interest rate is approximately 13½%.

Under the modified Approved Lenders Program, a maximum interest rate would be set at 2½% above discount rate. This would yield an interest rate of 10½% at December 31, 1984 rates.

Clearly, there is a need to lower interest rates in order to create a more achievable positive cash flow-debt repayment plan for many farm borrowers. In addition to the obvious advantage of lower interest rates, by lowering the maximum interest rate which a commercial lender may charge under the Approved Lenders Loan Program, the result will be to create opportunities for additional farm borrowers to take advantage of the Loan Guarantee Program. A lower maximum interest rate will encourage the lender to graduate the borrower to a regular commercial status.

The second basic change in the Approved Lenders Program would be to limit the Approved Lenders guarantee to a maximum of 50%.

FMHA OPERATING LOAN PROGRAM

FmHA Operating Loans are made for both operating expenses and farm ownership. Ownership loans may carry an interest rate as low as 5½% and may be written up to 40 years. Operating loans may carry an interest rate as low as 7¼% and may be written up to 7 years. Under the Direct Loan Program, appraisals are done by the FmHA and security in the loan is named and itemized per lender.

MODIFICATIONS TO THE DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

In order to restructure farm debt, lower interest rates and longer pay back terms will be required to attain a manageable, attainable cash flow for many farm borrowers.

The CA Modified Debt Recovery Program would incorporate into the Approved Lenders Program the use of FmHA Operating Loans in the same manner as the FmHA Guaranteed Loans. The pre-FmHA approved commercial lender would process the paperwork for FmHA Operating Loans, using the commercial lender's forms. FmHA would still have the final say-so on the loan under a shortened turn around approval or denial. Appraisals would be done by the pre-FmHA approved commercial lender or qualified appraiser. The main change in the present FmHA Direct Operating Loan Program would be to share security on a prorated dollar value basis. This last change is important to create an environment where the financial risk is shared and one which will create far fewer complications than the present system of named security.

MODIFIED CREDIT ILLUSTRATION

Under the CA Modified Debt Recovery Program, there can be a significant debt restructuring which will assist present financially troubled borrowers who have a stronger asset base yet who can neither qualify for FmHA loans or regular commercial lender loans.

As an illustration: Farm Borrower with $100,000 of indebtedness—cash flow shows $21,000 available for debt retirement.

EXAMPLE 1.—Farm borrower with commercial lender

[Loan term, 5 years; loan interest rate, 13½ percent]

Cash required for:
Principal reduction	$20,000
Interest payment	13,500
Total	33,500
Payment deficit	12,500

EXAMPLE 2.—Farm borrower under approved lenders program (no modifications)

[Loan term, 7 years; loan interest rate, 13½ percent]

Cash required for:
Principal reduction	$14,285
Interest payment	13,500
Total	27,785
Payment deficit	6,785

EXAMPLE 3.—FARM BORROWER UNDER CA MODIFIED DEBT RECOVERY PROGRAM

[Debt is divided between approved lender loan and limited resource loan (3A) and insured loan programs (3B)]

	Approved lender loan (3B)	Approved lender loan (3A)
FmHA guarantee loan	$40,000	$50,000
Loan term (years)	7	7
Loan interest rate (percent)	10½	10½
Repayment required for:
Principal reduction	$5,714	$7,143
Interest payment	4,200	5,250
Total	$9,914	$12,393
	Plus insured loan	Plus limited resource
FmHA operating loans	$60,000	$50,000
Loan term (years)	15	15
Loan interest rate (percent)	10¼	7¼
Repayment required for:
Principal reduction	$4,000	$3,333
Interest payment	6,150	3,625
Total	$10,150	$6,958
Total payment required for:
Principal reduction	$9,714	$10,476
Interest payment	10,350	8,875
Total	$20,064	$19,351
Cash flow balance	$936	$1,649

From the above example, the Modified Debt Recovery Program has accomplished a significant reduction in interest rates and has extended payments over a longer period of time to achieve a reasonable and achievable cash flow.

The Modified Debt Recovery Program covers the three areas of need: restructuring of debt, adjustment of interest and sharing of risk. The Modified Debt Recovery Program shares the risk by bringing the Government in on a maximum of 50% guarantee of the Approved Lender Program. Debt is restructured by adding the Direct Lending Program, and interest is lowered with a combination of ability through the Direct Lending Program to lower to a minimum of 7¼% and a maximum of 2½% plus Discount Rate on the Approved Lender portion. The Modified Debt Recovery Program utilizes the assets of the FmHA, the types of funds which are already available and adds the expertise of Commercial Lenders. The Modified Debt Recovery Program would only be in place long enough to carry agriculture through this present period of adjustment.

RIGHT-TO-KNOW

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the entire world was shocked last December by the tragic disaster at the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, India, when the leak of methyl isocynate gas killed more than 2,000 people. This disaster, along with reports of other leaks and mishaps, underscores the fact that chemical disasters and hazardous substances threaten both workers and communities alike. In the aftermath, our attention turns to preventing and preparing for future chemical disasters. But one of the biggest obstacles for workers and communities in the battle to prevent and prepare for industrial accidents is the fact that in many cases the hazards are unknown until the time of the disaster or exposure.

In the workplace, an estimated 25 percent of all workers in the United States, about 25 million employees, are exposed to hazardous substances at their job sites. Exposure occurs in all industries and services, including but not limited to manufacturing, construction, agriculture, transportation, health care, and public safety. For example, studies prepared by medical professionals at the National Institute of Occupational Health and Safety [NIOSH] indicate that 250,000 workers in the 86 worksites studied were exposed to chemical hazards. An estimated 110,000 of these workers could benefit from early notification, diagnosis and medical treatment.

Despite the evidence of exposure, many workers handle hazardous substances in the workplace yet are unaware that they pose an imminent threat to their health and safety and are not trained to reduce the risk of occupational disease and injury. Typically, substances are only identified by a code or trade name which conceals the chemical identity and provides little or no useful information about safe handling of the substance, the health effects of exposure, medical treatment in the event of exposure, and the control of the substance in an emergency. At the same time, new chemicals are being developed at the rate of hundreds per year and with increasing variety above and beyond the nearly 8,000 health hazards identified by NIOSH as posing serious and immediate health dangers to workers and communities.

On a related matter, knowledge of the chemical identity and health effects of hazardous substances is essential to workers and their representatives in pursuing legal remedies under State worker compensation programs, the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers Compensation Act, and the Federal Employees Compensation Act. Without knowledge of the chemical identity and health effects of hazardous substances it is probable that many workers who have been disabled because of exposure to hazardous substances in the workplace are only receiving Social Security disability benefits rather than also receiving compensation under workers' compensation.

For communities, a growing number of residents in areas surrounding industrial plants are subject to exposure. Aging industrial plants, outdated safety procedures, and cutbacks in maintenance personnel further increase the risk of industrial accidents throughout the United States. But prevention and preparation by communities is possible only when communities are completely aware of the chemical identity and health effects of hazardous substances at area worksites. Knowing this information is vital to doctors and other emergency medical personnel in adequately treating and properly caring for exposed individuals and helps to ensure that communities develop emergency medical treatment, firefighting and evacuation procedures to combat possible industrial accidents. In addition, meaningful research on the short- and long-term effects of hazardous substances to the environment, to ground water supplies, and to plant, animal, and human life is impossible without knowing the chemical identity of hazardous susbstances.

In 1970, Congress attempted to address some of these problems by passing the Occupational Safety and Health Act. This legislation directed the Occupational Safety and Health Administration [OSHA] to formulate strong Federal right-to-know regulations. The first phase of which was completed in 1980 when OSHA issued a rule requiring employers to keep medical and environmental records on employees and permitting workers access to those records. In January 1981, in the waning days of the Carter administration, OSHA proposed the second phase of the process. This hazard identification or labeling standard required, among other things, extensive labeling of all containers and pipes holding or transporting toxic substances. Less than a month later, the hazards identification rule was revoked for further study by administrators for the incoming Reagan administration.

On November 23, 1983, OSHA under Reagan issued its final version of the "Hazard Communication Standard," a watered-down version of previous proposals. In my view, OSHA's final rule is too weak to protect the health and well-being of our Nation's workers and communities. It fails in addressing the crucial issue of chemical identification since labeling is not required; it fails to afford any protection to workers outside of manufacturing; and it fails to provide the information resources necessary for safe handling, assessing health risks, ensuring adequate medical treatment, and control in emergencies of hazardous substances. The OSHA standard also grants wide discretion for employers to withhold, except in emergency situations, information on substances which they regard as trade secrets.

But perhaps worst of all, the OSHA standard preempts existing State and local right-to-know laws, including those more stringent than the Federal standards. Indeed, just recently, the third U.S. district court ruled that New Jersey cannot enforce its strict right-to-know law in the case of firms covered by the Federal standard. Ironically, Congress gave OSHA preemption powers because it was assumed at the time that the Federal standard would be stronger than State and local laws. Moreover, the Federal standards were meant to define minimum requirements for State and local laws. In other words, the Federal rule was supposed to be a floor, not a ceiling.

The preemption issue is of special concern to Pennsylvania since last November the State legislature passed one of the strongest right-to-know laws in the country. In fact, as Pennsylvanians we should be proud of the hard work and negotiation that resulted in the passage of this law. These efforts are helping to better protect the health and well-being of workers and communities throughout the State. The task before us now is to call attention to the need to protect Pennsylvania's law, to ensure that it is not preempted by OSHA's watered-down standard.

In this regard, I am introducing the right-to-know resolution of 1985 today to express the support of Congress for the fundamental right of both workers and communities to know about hazardous susbstances which threaten health and well-being. It calls upon OSHA to revise its hazard communication standard to require the labeling of all substances to provide information on the chemical identity of all substances, the health effects of exposure and emergency medical treatment procedures and to extend right-to-know protection to workers in all industries and services. Most importantly, it seeks to clarify congressional intent that weaker Federal requirements should not preempt stronger State and local laws.

I am also pleased to be an original cosponsor and strong supporter of the Chemical Manufacturing Safety Act of 1985 which Congressman JIM FLORIO is introducing today. JIM FLORIO's legislation is needed to ensure the health and well-being of workers and communities and to make sure that strong

State and local laws cannot be preempted by OSHA's watered-down standard. The tragic disaster at the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, India, last December has underscored and dramatized the fact that chemical disaster and hazardous substances are not just hypothetical threats. They can become a nightmarish reality. Americans need strong right-to-know protection, but the fight for health and safety in this field is not yet over. A coalition of forces came together to pass State and local right-to-know laws. We need to build a coalition at the Federal level to extend this protection nationwide.●

SENATOR ROTH'S STATEMENT ON TRADE REORGANIZATION

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, now that the trade deficit figures for 1984 are out and the awful truth confirmed, it is time once again to look at what actions Congress can take to revitalize the U.S. economy.

American competitiveness in international trade is fast becoming the single most important component of our overall economic health. Yet, U.S. trade policy is made in a piecemeal fashion, with primary jurisdiction split between the Department of Commerce and the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative. Last year, I introduced legislation to reorganize the trade functions of the Federal Government and to create a new Department of Commerce and Trade. Senator WILLIAM ROTH of Delaware authored a similar proposal, which had the active support of the administration.

I commend my good friend Senator ROTH for his work on behalf of trade reorganization, and submit, for my colleagues' attention, a recent article from the Journal of Commerce expressing his views on the timeliness and importance of reorganization efforts.

It is my hope that Senator ROTH, myself, and members of the administration will be able to work closely during the coming months to draft a consensus bill that is amenable to Congress.

[From the Journal of Commerce, Jan. 31, 1985]

ROTH: DEPARTMENT OF TRADE A TOP PRIORITY

(By Senator William V. Roth, Jr.)

Last year economic forecasters reached an uncommon agreement on one prediction: the U.S. trade deficit would reach record proportions in 1984. Now, with the announcement of a $123.3 billion deficit for the year—roughly double the figure for 1983 and four times the size of the deficit in the late 1970s—the disturbing projections have been confirmed. The question is, what are we going to do about it?

Among the proposals to attack the trade deficit that will surface and provoke debate in the coming months will be:

Change U.S. macroeconomic policies to better serve the interests of our exporters.

Eliminate government rules and actions that discourage exports—for example, ease rules on export licensing, requirements of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and export embargoes.

Begin new multilateral trade negotiations aimed at opening foreign markets to U.S. products and bringing international trading rules up to date.

Develop a long-term trade strategy to promote America's trade interests.

While each of these strategies should be carefully considered, the prospects for accomplishing any of them will be enhanced substantially if we establish a single, effective government trade organization—a Cabinet-level department of trade.

Take the issue of macroeconomic policy. If we want trade to be considered in the development of macroeconomic policy, trade must be a top national priority, there must be a strong advocate for trade within the government and that advocate must be present in the key decision-making meetings.

None of these factors is present today, and trade and economic policy proceed as if they were unrelated. The establishment of the new trade department would remedy this situation.

In this country we define our top national priorities through our Cabinet structure. By creating a new department of trade we will grant trade the equal status it deserves with defense, foreign policy and other key issues.

The need for a single, strong advocate for trade within the government is clear. Responsibility for trade is now divided between two Cabinet officials. Trade is only one of a number of responsibilities assigned to the secretary of commerce, while the U.S. trade representative, although a member of the Cabinet, lacks the clout of a full Cabinet department head in advocating his positions.

Legislation creating a new trade department can be drafted to help ensure that the secretary of trade is at the right place at the right time when U.S. economic policy is debated and implemented.

A highly-placed advocate has not been present at crucial times in the past when many of the export-discouraging policies now in effect were taken. For instance, the decisions to impose agricultural embargoes during the Nixon and Carter administrations were made in the National Security Council without the participation of the U.S. trade representative.

This lack of participation could not happen with the trade organization that I envision. The new secretary of trade would participate in deliberations of the National Security Council whenever trade-related issues were discussed.

While the need for new trade negotiations seems clear to many observers, our performance in such negotiations could be hampered seriously if we do not reorganize first.

It is unrealistic to expect the handful of experts in the Trade Representative's Office—no matter how skillful or experienced—to carry out such far-reaching negotiations without help. The trade representative would have to go, hat in hand, to other agencies asking for support.

Far more preferable would be an organization connecting the trade representative's negotiators directly, through clear management ties, to competent support staff, data analysts and statistical experts.

Finally, it is difficult to imagine a long-term trade strategy emerging from our current situation in which one agency (Commerce) is responsible for trade data analysis and policy implementation, while an entirely separate and sometimes competing agency (the Trade Representative Office) handles trade policy development and negotiations.

Instead of encouraging forward thinking and innovation, the present organizational split promotes turf rivalries and a largely reactive approach to trade problems. And there is no question that our foreign competitors know how to exploit these jurisdictional battles to enhance their own trade performance at the expense of ours.

Moreover, our government does not possess the analytical capability to determine with any certainty the overall state of U.S. industrial competitiveness or the condition of many key sectors of the American economy. Under trade reorganizations, all the functions needed to formulate a long-term trade strategy will be brought under one roof and strengthened.

Now more than ever, our nation needs a Cabinet-level department of trade. I am hopeful that with the active support of the Reagan administration, Congress will act to create the department before the year is out.

To be sure, creation of the trade department is only the beginning of what must be a concerted, long-term effort by many agencies, groups and individuals to reduce the staggering U.S. trade deficit. But if we do not reorganize our trade bureaucracy, the policy changes we need will be more difficult to achieve. Trade reorganization should be a part of our strategy to tackle the trade deficit.●

SOUTH AFRICAN POLICY

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to change our policies toward South Africa. It expresses the concerns of Americans to a system of government that is inhuman and immoral.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in his book "Chaos or Community?" addressing the South Africa question said, "South Africa's national policy and practice are the incarnation of the doctrine of white supremacy in the midst of a population that is overwhelmingly black. But the tragedy of South Africa is not simply its own policy; it is the fact that the racist Government of South Africa is virtually made possible by the economic policies of the United States and Great Britain, two countries which profess to be the moral bastions of the world."

The bill will do the following:

First, prohibit making or holding any investment in South Africa;

Second, prohibit imports to and exports from South Africa;

Third, prohibit landing rights of South African aircraft;

Fourth, prohibit importation of krugerrands;

Fifth, prohibit tax credits and deductions.

It is time that we change our policies and reverse "constructive engagement" that has failed.●

OAKLAND, LEWISBURG, AND GORDONVILLE FIELD CHAMPIONS

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to note an historic occasion which has come to pass in Tennessee's Sixth Congressional District. Tennessee has been witness to the courageous play of three football teams fielded by Murfreesboro Oakland High School, Lewisburg High School, and Gordonsville High School. The fact that these three teams all won the Tennessee State championship game in their respective divisions certainly merits the attention of the Congress.

It is my wish to commend and recognize the play of the Patriots of Murfreesboro Oakland High School for winning the State championship in the AAA Division. I further commend the fine coaching job of David Alsup who led the team to the championship.

I also call attention to the gridiron prowess of the Tigers of Lewisburg High School. This team won the State championship for 1984 in the AA Division and was coached by Bob Edens who did a superb job.

Honors should also be extended to the Tigers of Gordonsville High School who battled their way to the State championship in the A Division. This team was coached by Mark Medley who did a fine job.

It is rare indeed to have the banners of the State champions hanging from the rafters of three schools within a small geographic area covered by one congressional district. I do hereby make note in the RECORD of the 99th Congress the great pride Sixth District residents have in the football teams herein mentioned. These teams have shown great prowess upon the football field by setting for themselves a lofty goal and then attaining that goal through hard work, devotion, and skill. In the process, these teams have brought great pride upon themselves, their schools, their parents, and the great and sovereign State of Tennessee.●

ROBERT FORTINSKY RECEIVES COMMUNITY SERVICE AWARD

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I bring your attention to a man who will soon join an esteemed group of citizens as the Lincoln Day honoree of the S.J. Strauss Lodge No. 139 of B'nai B'rith. Robert Fortinsky will be honored on February 10, 1985, by his grateful friends and associates for his diligent commitment to our community.

The Lincoln Day dinner is an opportunity for the lodge to bestow its most prestigious accolade to a member of the community. Previous winners have included my predecessor, the Honorable Daniel Flood, who represented Pennsylvania's 11th Congressional District for more than 30 years, the Honorable Max Rosenn, Dr. Abraham D. Barras, Mr. Roy Morgan, and Mr. Andrew Sordini III.

The common link between these individuals has been their dedication to strengthen the fabric of community life in our region. Robert Fortinsky has been a leader in our area for years, devoting his time and energies to innumerable community efforts. He has served as chairman of the United Jewish Appeal campaign twice—in 1972 and 1984—and for 3 years he worked as president of the Jewish community center. In 1983 he took a leadership role once again, cochairing the J.C.C. endowment. And in 1984 he became first vice president for Temple Israel.

Mr. Fortinsky has been involved in the Mount Nittany Society of Penn State University, the Century Club of King's College, and the John Wilkes Society of Wilkes College. He is a dedicated husband and father, and a truly outstanding choice for the community service award.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my many grateful constituents in extending my warmest congratulations to Robert Fortinsky on the recognition of his years of service to Luzerne County.●

NATIONAL ENGINEERS WEEK

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 6, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, by Presidential message the week of February 17-23 is National Engineers Week and I rise to recognize the many contributions of the men and women of this profession.

I also want to recognize Mr. C.R. "Chuck" Pennoni, of Philadelphia, who has been elected 1985 Engineer of the Year by the technical, professional, and scientific societies in the greater Delaware Valley. Mr. Pennoni has been cited for his professional activities, his civic involvement and for contributions his firm has made to technical and economic progress in the region.

I might add that it gives me a great deal of personal satisfaction to recognize Mr. Pennoni. Mr. Pennoni is by education a civil engineer. As you know, Mr. Speaker, since my very first days in this body 10 years ago, I have taken a special interest in the problem of our Nation's crumbling infrastructure. But it is engineers such as "Chuck" Pennoni, and others like him from the American Society of Civil Engineers, who have labored in this "vineyard" longer than I.

It is indeed fitting that we celebrate National Engineers Week and reflect on the achievements of the profession. The role that engineering plays in translating scientific knowledge into useful goods and services for American Society cannot be overstated. As the theme of the 1985 Delaware Valley Engineers Week so aptly proclaims: "Engineers: Turning Ideas Into Reality."

Virtually every form of communication is a product of engineering. Every form of transportation except animals and our own legs is a product of engineering. The clothes we wear are products of engineering. All the food we eat is a product of engineering except that which we grow ourselves, and even that is produced by tools which were designed by engineers. All the medical tools which save and prolong human life are products of engineering. Every building the human race has ever produced draws on principles of engineering. There is no aspect of human existence on which the science of engineering has not had an impact—from the magnificent span of the Golden Gate Bridge to the mundane glow of the electric lightbulb.

Engineering achievements have always been on the leading edge of economic progress. Fifty years ago "high technology" for many people was electric lighting and heating, automobiles, and airplanes. The television had not even been introduced. In the 1980's, routine space travel is a reality; the artificial heart is being perfected; robotics is revolutionizing the manufacturing process; and the computer is ubiguitous in our society. We are on the verge of ascending to a new plateau of knowledge and technology.

But with that ascendancy will come the question: How can we best incorporate the potential benefits of this knowledge into our society and prepare to move on to the next plateau? Vision is necessary to keep the United States on the leading edge of international competitiveness. And keeping us on that edge cannot be done without further contributions by engineers—engineers in industry, academe, and government.

The United States is at a critical juncture in its industrial leadership. Not since Sputnik in 1957 has there been so much cause for concern about the adequacy of our science and technology base and our ability to capitalize on our scientific strengths to sustain our industrial leadership. We face foreign competitors who have expanding skills, lower costs, and higher productivity growth. These factors affect the security of our Nation, the standard of living of our people, and the legacy we leave behind.

This legacy, the world of the future, will have a different technological base from the world which we inhabit. As the computer takes over and becomes the primary tool of engineering and the robot comes to play a major role in industrial production, we will be faced with a new strength in America.

But that "new strength" is not yet here. We have entered a transition phase in the evolution of modern society, and in order to deal successfully with the challenges posed by this transition, changes must be made now in the way we confront the technological process. And just as the engineering profession has been on the leading edge of technological innovation, so too must the profession now be on the leading edge of that process that enhances the interchange of innovative ideas between industry, labor, academe, and government.

Creating an environment for this process is no easy task. It is, as I see it, the most significant challenge to the engineering profession in the remaining years of this century. Let me be more clear about my concerns, Mr. Speaker.

Generally, U.S. industrial R&D focuses on short-run research which results in immediate profits. The structure of American business creates a bias against long-range R&D and improved management and marketing strategies which might enhance productivity and give us a competitive edge internationally. Based on current developments, it may be questioned whether the United States will be able to improve, or even maintain, its competitive position in international science and technology if existing trends continue.

During the past several years intense concern has also been expressed over the health of our engineering education system. Both the National Science Foundation and the National Academy of Engineering have in recent reports detailed many of these weaknesses.

For example, one major problem is that there is an inadequate understanding by students of engineering "practice"; that is, the understanding of how engineering knowledge is converted by industry into societal goods and services.

There is also an overemphasis in the academic sphere on analytical research, with less opportunity for "hands on" experimental research. This leads to a widening gap between academic engineering programs and industrial practice. Industrial applications have outstripped the fundamental knowledge generally developed by university researchers.

Another problem is that the rapid advances in technology are driving engineering toward cross-disciplinary interactions. Specialists are still needed, and continued development of high-quality engineering subdisciplines is essential. But, in addition, there is a growing need for engineering education that cuts across the engineering subdisciplines and applied sciences.

Also, technological advances are leading toward the integration of design, engineering, manufacturing, and marketing. There is a need for engineers with a broad understanding of the overall manufacturing system and of the interrelations among its components.

Finally, it is critical that while we actively seek developing knowledge in areas of emerging and critical engineering systems and technologies, we not abandon our research efforts that would reinvigorate industries that have served us so well in the past but now are languishing.

Mr. Speaker, these are important problems for our future industrial competitiveness. There are no easy solutions. But let me suggest just one partial response: a vigorous effort in Federal support of university-industry engineering research centers.

The goal of the centers would be to improve engineering research so that U.S. engineers will be better prepared to contribute to engineering practice and to assist U.S. industry in becoming more competitive in world markets. Thus, engineering research and education would be firmly linked in these centers. While the centers would differ from one another, reflecting their home institutions, people, and programs, their mission would have some common traits.

First, specific working ties with industry would provide a continual interaction of academic researchers, students, and faculty with their peers, namely, the engineers and scientists in industry. This would assure that these programs remain relevant to the needs of the engineering practitioner and that they faciliate and promote the flow of knowledge between the academic and industrial sectors.

Second, the programs of each center would emphasize the synthesis of engineering knowledge; that is, the programs should seek to integrate different disciplines in order to bring together the requisite knowledge, methodologies, and tools to solve problems important to engineering practitioners.

Third, the programs would contribute to the increased effectiveness of all levels of engineering education, including the emphasis on advanced education as part of the career pattern of engineers, the use of engineering professionals as adjunct professors, and university-industry programs for continuing education of engineers.

This response is not entirely new, of course. For several years, some States and local governments, on their own have been encouraging university—industry efforts across a broad spectrum. My own State, Pennsylvania, and the city of Philadelphia have had the very successful Ben Franklin Partnership, for example. But for the most part State and local efforts are relatively small and are not concentrated in engineering especially. The Congress, just last year, approved a Federal effort—$10 million—in support of engineering research centers. But such support is fickle, especially in an environment of budget cutbacks.

I bring this issue before this body now because National Engineers Week could not come at a more opportune moment. As the debate on this year's budget opens and proceeds over the coming months, I hope we look carefully at efforts such as engineering research centers, whose support is so fragile in this year's budget. If we are being asked to increase our commitment in fiscal year 1986 for the Defense Department's R&D by over $7 billion—or about 22 percent—we can certainly afford to expand our support for engineering cooperative research efforts between universities and industry that will benefit us for generations to come. If we are being asked to spend billions of dollars for star wars research—and thereby double the effort of the previous year—we can certainly afford to spend additional millions for a program that in a very fundamental way serves as the first line of our national defense.

For while we may face threats to our national security in a hostile international environment, we must not forget that the challenge to our long run industrial competitiveness is no less a threat to our Nation. A recent Library of Congress study calculated that only three-tenths of 1 percent of Federal R&D is directed toward the needs of civilian industry. By contrast, that figure in Japan and West Germany, for example, is 12.5 percent. We will never reach the next plateau of knowledge and technology with such a meager effort as this.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to this next plateau and the new strength that will come with it. I believe we can reach it; I look forward to the challenge. As Thomas Wolfe said almost a half-century ago: "I think the true discovery of America is before us. I think the true fulfillment of our spirit, of our people, of our mighty and immortal land is yet to come."●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, February 7, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED

FEBRUARY 8

9:00 a.m.
Budget
To continue hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1986 budget.
SD-608

FEBRUARY 19

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
To hold hearings to review the President's proposed budget requests for fiscal year 1986.
SD-192

2:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Interior and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation, National Capital Planning Commission, and the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation.
SD-138

FEBRUARY 20

9:00 a.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
To resume hearings on S. 259 and S. 287, bills to protect local community interests regarding the relocation of certain professional sports teams.
SR-253

Select on Intelligence
Closed meeting on intelligence matters.
SH-219

10:00 a.m.
Energy and Natural Resources
Business meeting, to consider the committee budget for 1985, and other pending calendar business.
SD-366

Environment and Public Works
To hold hearings on those programs which fall within the jurisdiction of the committee as contained in the President's budget requests for fiscal year 1986, focusing on requests for the Environmental Protection Agency
SD-406

1:00 p.m.
Veterans' Affairs
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Veterans Administration.
SR-418

2:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Energy and Water Development Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for energy and water development programs, focusing on Army civil works programs.
SD-192

FEBRUARY 21

9:00 a.m.
Veterans' Affairs
Business meeting, to consider committee budget for 1985, and committee rules for procedure for the 99th Congress.
SR-418

9:30 a.m.
Small Business
To hold hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal year 1986, 1987, and 1988 for the Small Business Administration.
SR-428

2:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Interior and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, Holocaust Memorial Council, and the Federal Inspector for the Alaska Gas Pipeline.
SD-138

Appropriations
Transportation and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Department of Transportation.
SD-124

FEBRUARY 25

10:00 a.m.
Small Business
To resume hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 for the Small Business Administration.

SENATE—Thursday, February 7, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord.—Jeremiah 9:23-24.

Gracious God of wisdom, truth, and love, give us the grace to recognize our need of You, our inadequacy without You. Help us to see that in looking to You for wisdom, we are no less wise—for strength, we are no less strong—for insight, no less discerning. Help us to remember how often the powerful have fallen when weakened by the infection of pride. We thank You, Lord, that we increase in wisdom, strength, discernment, and power when our faith is in God. Forgive the pride—the arrogance—which forbids our dependence upon You. May we understand, Lord, that we are most independent when we live in dependence upon the mighty God, that we are most free when we submit to You, most powerful when we acknowledge our need of You and, Father, remind us of the most precious truth that we need each other. In His name in whom dwells all power in Heaven and on Earth. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the previous order, there are two special orders of 15 minutes each. The first is for the Senator from Wisconsin, Senator PROXMIRE, who is present.

Mr. President, I will reserve the remainder of my time when I complete a couple of other statements.

Following the special orders, we will have a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 o'clock. That has been agreed to.

It is my intention after morning business to take up the nomination of Lee M. Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. There may be a rollcall vote on that nomination.

Mr. President, I think it is fair to state for the information of Senators who may want to make plans, it would be the intention of the leadership to adjourn for the February recess when the Senate completes its business today.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

CAN MASSIVE DEFICITS LEAD THE WAY TO PERMANENT PROSPERITY?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, President Reagan may prove to be right after all. Huge deficits may be exactly what the country needs. After all, did not 1984—the fourth year of the Reagan term—and three successive supercolossal deficits in a row—$190 billion, $195 billion, and $175 billion—turn out to be about as close to economic heaven on earth as this country is likely to get? Did not we have the best real economic growth since 1951—33 long years ago? As a remarkably happy companion, did not the country enjoy at the same time stable and moderate inflation? Mr. President, that is a rare and very welcome combination; in fact, a knockout couple. At a time when economics seems to be mostly smoke and mirrors, and bad guesses, the first President who has conspicuously turned his back on the economists is the biggest economic winner. Sure, we are now in a colossal deficit, huge national debt buildup jam. And what do we do about it? Well, why not follow the President, why not do exactly what the Congress did before, take another shot of the same old big deficit joy juice, drink deep, relax, and live?

Ask yourself, why did we have the 1984 boom? Easy. The deficit did it. Yes, the deficit did it. The deficit stimulated the economy. Do you ask how about the low level of inflation? The deficit did that, too. It did it by so sharply increasing U.S. borrowing from foreign countries to finance the deficit that we shoved the value of foreign currency down and the dollar up. This has made the price of foreign goods cheap to American consumers and held down the price of American goods that compete with foreign imports.

We also, Mr. President, have 8.5 million people unemployed as of January. That holds down wages. We also have an enormous glut of oil, an enormous glut of food production that has held down the price of energy and the price of food. But the debt itself has made an interesting contribution to stable prices.

Now the President is asking for a slowdown in the rate of increase in overall spending for the 1986 fiscal year. He is asking for drastic reduction in domestic spending. It is true he is calling for big increases in military spending. But, still, if we comply with the President's requests, we will have the smallest increase in overall Federal spending in 1986 that we have had in many years. Is this a major economic policy reversal? No, it is not. Oh, sure, it may be a fat $42 billion lower than the deficit in 1985. But that is according to the administration's estimates. Whatever course the Congress chooses to follow—whether we hold down spending as the President requests, impose some kind of freeze that is roughly equal on all spending, make far deeper cuts in the deficit than the President has asked by including military spending and foreign aid in the reductions and substantially increase taxes—any of these courses will encounter vehement and bitter political opposition back home in our States and districts. And if we stay with the President's proposal or follow the across-the-board equal freeze advocated by others, which are certainly the two most likely courses, we will probably end up with a deficit of at least $296 billion in 1986 anyway.

Administrations have traditionally underestimated the deficit in the coming year. In recent years, their estimates have been off by a whopping average of 50 percent. And this year the economic assumptions seem especially optimistic. So Congress will go through the agony of denying thousands of our constituents their most heartfelt wishes for Federal spending and then probably end up with no real gain in deficit reduction after all.

And that is not all; it gets worse. Suppose the Congress cuts spending and the country moves into a recession—a very real possibility. Then, the action by Congress in slowing its fiscal stimulation will get a sure and strong share of the blame for killing the recovery and throwing millions of Americans out of work.

So what can Congress do? Just consider one temptation so lurid and exciting that no one to my knowledge has even dared discuss it—at least, it has not been discussed very much. I have not read it in columns, I have not heard it on the floor. Suppose the Congress or the President decides, "Enough with all this negative thinking, this slinking, shrinking fear of spending big public money to meet our national needs and of cutting taxes at the same time." What would happen to the economy if Congress should decide to go out and court a really massive deficit? Suppose we forget about this pennyante $200 billion stuff. After all, that will be only 5 or 6 percent of the GNP. Suppose we go for a trillion-dollar deficit. Give every interest group pressing for Federal largess everything they want, and then cut taxes by 20 percent or so. What would happen?

Well, Mr. President, we have an historical precedent for that. This is precisely what this country did in World War II at the end of the Great Depression. We ran deficits not of 5 or 6 percent of the GNP but of more than 25 percent of the GNP. Five times our present deficits. And what happened? What happened was that the country ended the Great Depression with a bang. Unemployment dropped from 17 percent down to 2 percent. Personal income soared through the roof. Sure, it took rigorous wage and price controls to keep inflation in check. But we used wage-price controls and, that time, they worked.

Could we do it again? Mr. President, we could, and this Senator has a hunch that we just might blunder into it. If we stumble into another recession, we could easily slip to a deficit to end all deficits. But, even without a recession, the Congress and the President might just find it so hard to agree on spending restraints that it staggers—through a lack of resolve—into a fiscal policy that for 3 or 4 or more years could give us more of that exuberant, intoxicating medicine of 1943 and 1944 and 1945. And, I might add, 1984. I add 1984 because that was last year. As I said earlier, these years of back-to-back peacetime record smashing deficits gave the country its best economic growth year since 1951—33 years ago.

Now, Mr. President, in the long run, this kind of policy of colossal irresponsible deficits could permanently undermine even the marvelous economy of this Nation. We could sink under the burden of a crashing national debt. Inflation and interest rates would eventually break through any restraints and soar out of sight. But the poisonous, lurid, tantalizing attraction of this deficit policy is that, in the short run, for 2 or 3 or maybe 4 years, it would work like magic. After all, 4 years would take us through the 1986 congressional election and the next Presidential election of 1988. So do not count on a Democratic Senate after the 1986 election, or a Democratic President in 1988. Four more years of these gigantic Reagan deficits might do wonders for the Republican Party. Unfortunately, politics is a short-run game.

THE ADMINISTRATION HAS NOT MADE THE CASE FOR MR. MEESE FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a Washington Post editorial on the Meese nomination declared: "We think the Senate has not made the case for rejecting him." I think that is incredible. The implication of that statement is that whoever the President appoints to his Cabinet should be approved unless a case is made to reject him. A Wall Street Journal Pepper and Salt item by Rose Sand appeared on Wednesday, February 6, that carries the same logic. It was labeled Mr. Clean. Here it is:

> The man, a resident of a small town, was charged with a petty offense. He was asked by the judge, "Is there anyone here who can vouch for your character?"
> "Yes, your honor, the sheriff over there."
>
> "Why, I don't even this know man," exclaimed the lawman.
> "Observe, your honor," beamed the defendant triumphantly, "that I have lived in this county for 12 years—and the sheriff doesn't even know me!"

Mr. President, Mr. Meese is under consideration for appointment to the most important law enforcement position in our country. He should not win confirmation just because the sheriff does not know him. He will, if appointed, be the country's No. 1 lawyer. He will command a department including tens of thousands of professional employees. This country has no more important obligation than to secure justice for our citizens. And Mr. Meese will be Mr. Justice.

Does this mean that the Senate must make a case against him, I repeat against him, and unless we do he should occupy this critical position? No way. Can you imagine a member of a corporate board charged with the responsibility of voting on the next chief executive officer of the company, being told by the chairman of the board that the man he selected should be confirmed unless a case is made against him. Has any university president ever been selected for office on the grounds that opponents had not made a case against him?

Or even a football coach. Could the Redskins have justified the selection of a football coach—not on the basis of his excellence, but simply because no case had been made against the coach?

Mr. President, the selection of the Attorney General of the United States is far more significant than the selection of a football coach, a corporate president, or a university president. In each of those other offices, a number of candidates are considered. Most candidates are rejected. And why are they rejected? Not because they are bad, not because they are incompetent, not because they lack experience and a winning track record, not because any case has been made against them. They are rejected because they are not the best.

Let me give you a case in point, because it happened very near here in the very, very near past. In January, the University of Virginia selected a new president. Now consider how they did it. They established a search committee. The search committee considered not one candidate, not a dozen candidates, but literally 312 persons. After 10 months of meticulous sifting and winnowing they reduced the list down to 10 or 12 of the very best candidates. And, finally, they selected a person who had been president of a great university for the preceding 5 years and who had a record as an administrator in other universities over a longer period of years. He had solid experience and a great record as a university president. He was a distinguished scholar. In the judgment of the University of Virginia Board of Visitors who made the selection, he was the best available man in the country for the job.

Now, Mr. President, contrast that selection of the University of Virginia president with the way the Federal Government has gone about the process of selecting the top policymakers in our Government, and especially the process of confirming Mr. Meese. How many persons did the President consider in determining that he would select Mr. Meese as his Attorney General? Did the President establish any kind of a search committee? Of course not. Did he ask a distinguished group of experts to recommend several of the best qualified persons in the country to serve as the Attorney General of the United States? Are you kidding? We know that was not done. Did he look within the Department of Justice, past or present, to determine what experienced and highly competent professionals might be qualified to do that job? Do not make me laugh. The President did what Presidents have been doing for much too long. He picked a pal, a crony, a buddy, a man with two commanding qualifications: First, the President knew him and knew him well; and, second, Mr. Meese, as Attorney General, will certainly be 100 percent loyal to the President in every and all circumstances.

Mr. President, if the Federal Government were a family business, this method of selection of top officers would be a mistake, but it would be understanable. It would be the kind of mistake family businesses often make. It is why so many fail. But the Federal Government is not a family business. This Government operates under a constitution which recognizes that Presidents are likely to make appointments like the Meese appointment. That is why the Founding Fathers required that the Senate advise and consent to top policy nominations like Attorney General. And that is why it should not be enough to follow the Washington Post's feeble prescription and approve a person to be Attorney General because no case has been made against him or he must have sound character because after all, "the sheriff doesn't recognize him."

The Senate should disapprove every Presidential nomination to positions of great power in this Government unless the case has been made and made convincingly for the nominee. In the case of Mr. Meese, it is crystal clear that no such case has been made.

DOES PRESIDENT REAGAN WANT NUCLEAR ARMS CONTROL OR NUCLEAR ARMS RACE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the most widely heralded books of the year was Strobe Talbott's "Deadly Gambits." Talbott's book is a highly disturbing account of the struggle over a nuclear weapons policy in the Reagan administration. The struggle is really a fight for the heart and mind of the one man who can determine foreign military policy in our Nation—the President. Because the heart of Ronald Reagan seems transfixed in cold stone on the side of winning the nuclear arms race, the struggle is not over whether the country should negotiate an arms control agreement or win the nuclear arms race competition. The President has already decided that issue on the side of winning the arms race. But most of the American people do not want an arms race. They want to negotiate a mutual verifiable end to the arms race with the Soviet Union. So the real struggle is over how the President can best present himself as an arms control advocate to the American and European public without being pushed or maneuvered into an agreement that would in any significant way limit the U.S. competition in the nuclear arms race: the research, the development, the production, and the deployment of nuclear arms.

Because Ronald Reagan is President of the United States, because he has an amiable, disarming manner, because he speaks smoothly and clearly, because he repeats over and over again that he wants an agreement with the Soviet Union to limit nuclear arms even if he does not, and especially because he has entered into negotiations with the Soviet Union in two arms control areas, the general public view is that the President wants arms control agreements with the Soviets if he can get them. So many, perhaps most, Americans believe the President is truly sincere in pursuing arms control. Is he? The evidence is overwhelmingly to the contrary. Also, here we have a President who is on record in opposition to every single arms control agreement ever negotiated with the Soviet Union by both Republican and Democratic Presidents. As Gerard Smith, President Nixon's chief negotiator of arms control agreements with the Russians, has observed, the only two arms control proposals the President has made—START and INF—are on their face impossible for the Soviet Union to accept.

Who does the President send to negotiate the START Treaty? He sends as hard headed a pure hawk as one could find: General Rowney. So we have a proposition the Russians could not possibly accept, negotiated on our side by a general who bitterly opposes arms control agreements and especially arms control agreements with the Russians. To make sure that the arms control machinery in this country does not second guess Rowney, the President appoints as head of the Arms Control Agency, Kenneth Adelman, a man with no prior experience in arms control except as an unrelenting and consistent critic of arms control.

Some optimists argue that the President really does want an arms control agreement with the Soviet Union but he wants it on his terms. Is that possible? Well, maybe. But when a hard-bitten, down-the-line anti-Communist like Paul Nitze takes a walk in the woods with a Soviet negotiator and comes up with something that looks like the beginning of an agreement advantageous to us, the President engages in a race with the Russians to see who can scuttle the agreement first.

Meanwhile, to make sure that we build an atmosphere which makes it impossible for the Soviets to negotiate, the President pushes his star wars or antimissile program here at home. This program will conspicuously violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty signed by President Nixon and ratified by the Senate by an 88-to-2 vote in 1972. It will cost hundreds of billions of dollars, perhaps more than $1 trillion. It cannot succeed unless—and get this for the laugh of the year—the Russians agree to limit their offensive missiles to permit it to work. And for the laugh of the century, the President actually proposes that after we develop this trillion dollar turnout we give it—that is right, give it to the Russians.

Now, how can I say it will not work? Well, consider it cannot defend against submarine fired missiles or bomber fired missiles or cruise missiles. The President and his advisers must know all this. And because they know it, they must also know that the Congress will never approve it. Why then do they continue to press it? The answer was given by Soviet leader Gorbachev when he was in England last December. Gorbachev said that the Soviets would not negotiate as long as the President insisted on proceeding with the SDI or star wars defense. The statement by Gorbachev seemed to be precisely what the President wanted to hear. If the Russians were so concerned about star wars that they would not proceed unless we stopped it, it must be good and anyone opposed to star wars is supporting the Soviet Union position. And if the Soviets will not negotiate? Is that not precisely what the President, who did not want to negotiate in the first place, wants to hear? That means he can blame the failure to negotiate on the Soviet Union. Actually, the Soviet Union could care less about whether we proceed with SDI. It would certainly serve their interests if we did. The United States would be throwing $1 trillion away on a military program that would be useless and which the Russians could frustrate at will. It would be a military program that would divide our country and alienate our friends and allies in Europe who would see any U.S. anti-ICBM defense as save America first and let Europe go if necessary. Why would the Russians not want to see us go all out with star wars? And how could they more effectively promote it than to loudly and publicly oppose it. Any American Member of Congress or the press who oppose star wars will appear to be climbing into bed with the Communists.

So the Reagan policies serve the interest of a President who wants to appear to press for arms control but be sure to be able to avoid any pressure to go ahead with it. It keeps the President popular as a sincere advocate of arms control. It helps him secure most of his military programs from the Congress and to continue an arms race that the President is convinced we will win and that many of the rest of us are convinced could end in nuclear war.

OUT OF THE ASHES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this last fall in Washington, Public Television presented a series entitled Heritage: Civilization and the Jews. The series outlined the history, culture, and the contributions of the Jewish people. One episode of the series, entitled "Out of the Ashes," focused on the plight of the Jews under the Nazis—a plight which culminated in the Holocaust.

This episode described how the Jews were step by step denied rights. They were denied economic opportunities and declared second-class citizens. The Jews became the ultimate outcasts of Nazi society. Many were confined to ghettos and concentration camps. In the end, they had their most fundamental right taken from them—the right to live. The Nazis set out to systematically destroy the Jews. As the show flesh was your mother."

Subsequent episodes of the series went on to show how the Jewish people, despite this almost incomprehensible loss and pain, rose "out of the ashes" of this tragedy to continue on and contribute to the many societies in which they live.

Also "out of the ashes" of the Holocaust came a treaty which sought formally to outlaw genocide and establish measures to try those guilty of it. This treaty is the Genocide Convention.

Our role in the creation of this treaty was vital. We were primary actors in its drafting. Over 90 nations have ratified it. We have not. Every other developed nation has.

I urge my colleagues not to forget from what this treaty arose. We cannot afford to. Unless we feel the horror of the evils done by the Nazis and others who have committed genocide, we will not feel the moral disgrace of our failure to ratify the Genocide Convention. If we forget the cries and mourning from which this treaty arose, the power behind it and all of our human rights statements will be diminished. The force of our voice to help our neighbors would be lessened. Our words would be hollow.

We must make good on our commitment to consider this treaty. We must also make good on our commitment to lead the struggle for basic rights by first remembering why we desire such a position and then by ratifying the Genocide Convention.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BOREN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] is recognized.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Chair.

THE FAMILY FARM IN AMERICA

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, there are a number of people who have indicated to me that they wonder whether or not people in the country understand the importance of preserving the family farm unit, which is certainly now faced with the potential for dissolution and extinction unless there are changes in policy in the very near future.

I urge the people of this country to think long and hard about this particular problem and about the proposition that the maintenance of the family farm unit is extremely important. In the very beginning, those who laid the intellectual foundation for the political philosophy of our country had a strong understanding of the importance of maintaining independent economic units headed by those who made ultimate decisions. The maintenance of a broadly held system in which there were many owners and operators was considered of vital importance to those who laid the conrerstones of our American democracy.

James Madison, for instance, understood that our entire system was dependent more than anything else upon an extended republic which had a number of independent spirited people who possessed a variety of interests. So it is a serious question that I hope we will ponder in the days ahead as we debate about the upcoming farm bill.

I think we also ought to think again about who is to blame for the dire situation in which American agriculture now finds itself. Some have said, I think in a most insensitive manner, that it is a result of greed by farmers and that farmers, in an effort to make millions in the 1970's, greatly expanded their operations—this seems to be the view of Mr. Stockman—and therefore they deserve any result which may follow. They are saying that farmers should be forced to tough it out in what they call the free market. Of course, they do not tell us that the free market does not exist; that our farmers are forced to compete internationally where production and sales are subsidized; that they are thrust into a market which in many cases, such as the market in Japan, is foreclosed to all but a small percentage of producers of certain agricultural commodities.

They do not tell us that this free market is dominated by an imbalance in the relationship of the value of the dollar with other currencies, making it impossible for our farmers to compete; that, for example, when one American grain exporting company talked about bringing in Argentine wheat recently and selling it in the United States below the cost of grain produced in this country, even considering the payment of freight and the consideration of a payment of duty at the border, the reason it was possible was that the Argentine currency had depreciated 86 percent in value against the American dollar in just 1 year.

They do not tell us, when they talk about bringing the American farmer back to the free market, that the farmer also is facing a situation in which our own Government, in order to preserve the soundness of the monetary system in the face of unwise loans made by some of our own financial institutions to those in other countries, our own farmer is confronted with producers in other nations who are being indirectly subsidized through loans from the IMF by their own tax dollars.

They also do not tell us that in the 1970's the Government itself called upon the American farmer to rise to the great challenge of feeding the world, to expand their production, to plant fencerow to fencerow to meet the increased export demand of a world crying for food. Government policy urged farmers to go to the Farmers Home Administration and borrow money to meet this great challenge. It was said that the solution to the agricultural problems had finally been discovered—the export market, and the free market. Those who are writing some of the editorials that we read recently do not tell us about the Government-imposed embargo which began in 1973 and culminated in the embargo of 1980 which devastated the hopes of American farmers.

They do not tell us that in 1980 everyone who had suffered in the drought was allowed to plant wheat on their land normally cultivated in other crops such as corn and rice. They do not tell you when this administration established the acreage base for future wheat programs that they counted every acre that was planted in 1980, thereby adding with the stroke of a pen an increased wheat acreage base in the Nation of 8 million acres. They do not tell us that this 8 million acres adds 280 million bushels a year on an average to our wheat surplus. They do not tell us that this administration refused to offer effective commodity programs which could have eliminated the necessity for a multibillion dollar payment in kind program which we just experienced last year.

Congress is scheduled to write a new farm bill this year and the debate over the farm program is important to every Oklahoman.

Agriculture is in the worst crisis since the thirties. In some ways, current conditions are worse. A couple of years ago, Oklahoma's 88,000 farm units averaged less than $20 per farm in net farm income for the entire year. At the same time our farmers, just in Oklahoma, owe an estimated $15 billion on their land, machinery, and operating debts.

I ask unanimous consent that a table be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks telling the story in dramatic terms. Just 35 years ago net farm income for 1 year would have more than paid off total farm debt. This past year the debt was over 16 times as much as annual income. For the past 5 years the farmer has had very little cash income while trying to service a huge debt. At the same time his ability to borrow is declining because so many farms are being forced onto the market that values for purely agricultural land have fallen 22 percent in the last 3 years.

This has led to more than a 200-percent increase in farm bankruptcies and forced liquidations during the same period.

With economic problems on the farm come conservation problems. As farmers scramble for cash, highly erodible land is cultivated. In addition, farmers cannot afford conservation steps which they would like to take. Last year we lost the equivalent of 1 million acres of topsoil because of erosion. It is estimated that 25 percent of all cropland in America is eroding at an unacceptable rate.

This crisis has developed, at least in part, because many Americans do not understand the economics of agriculture or the importance of the farm sector to them personally. They don't know that to start an average family farm today would take over $425,000 in capital. The majority of the American people believe that they are subsidizing the farmer. In one sense, the taxpayers have subsidized farmers through programs which have cost far more than they should because of short-sighted policies.

However, in a larger sense, it is the farm sector which is subsidizing the rest of the country. The facts are clear. Agriculture is the most productive and most efficient sector of our Nation's economy. It is consistently one of the few sectors of our economy where we have a favorable trade balance. Last year we sold to other countries $19 billion more in agricultural products than we bought. The farmers have been giving Americans the greatest food bargain in the world. Americans spend only 16 percent of their income for food. The average Russian spends 45 percent for food. Even in Great Britain the average is about 28 percent. American food consumers get more for their money today than in 1950. In 1950 an hour's wage for the average worker bought 10 pounds of bread or 8 quarts of milk. Today, it will buy 16 pounds of bread or 15 quarts of milk.

The farmers, however, have been absorbing the cost of providing these benefits to the rest of the Nation, often selling below their actual cost of production, and by going broke in record numbers.

In the decade of the 1970's in my home State where agriculture suffers, we lost 21 percent of our farmers. The Nation also suffers. Agriculture, with over $1 trillion in assets, is our largest single industry. Approximately one in five jobs nationally in private enterprise is generated directly or indirectly by agriculture. Also, as we learned in the thirties, a collapse in land values can devastate the entire economy.

We must be concerned about the survival of the family-sized farm unit. Studies show that it is the most productive because no one else will work as hard or care for the farm as well as the resident owner.

What can be done? No one can pretend to have all the answers, but some steps clearly need to be taken.

First and foremost, we must bring down Federal budget deficits which lead to high interest rates for farmers and an overvalued dollar which prevents them from selling in world markets. A balanced Federal budget would be the best farm program of all.

Second, we should develop a long-range, multiyear policy aimed at bringing production in line with demand and announce it early enough so that farmers can make plans. Often programs are changed even after farmers have prepared their land for planting. Stop and start policies cause surpluses to increase. All of this wastes taxpayers' money and our precious national resources.

Third, in our foreign aid programs, we should send fewer dollars overseas, and make greater use of our surplus farm products.

Fourth, a long-range conservation component is an essential ingredient in any good farm program. We need a program to allow farmers to take erosion-prone land out of cultivation and place it in conservation treatment for several years, also providing financial incentives to make up for lost income from this land. Such a program would save our precious soil resources and would help the taxpayers by reducing surpluses and by cutting the cost of current commodity programs by hundreds of millions of dollars.

Obviously, every American should care about what is happening on the farm. Let us band together to work for a commonsense farm bill this year. So I urge my colleagues to look at the whole record when affixing blame for the current straits in which American farmers find themselves. And when the record is fairly examined, I think that impartial observers will find that it has not been the farmer that has been the cause of the present situation, but the farmer has been the victim of past policy mistakes by our own Government—I must say in all honesty and candor by administrations in both political parties—which is to blame as much as anything else.

Congress is scheduled to write a new farm bill this year and the debate over the farm program is important not only to every Oklahoman but to every American. Agriculture is in the worst crisis since the thirties. In some ways conditions are worse.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Net Farm Income versus Total Farm Debt

[In billions of dollars]

	Net farm income	Total farm debt
1950	19.0	12.5
1983	5.4	216.3

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time at this point to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

(The remarks of Mr. HOLLINGS are printed under Statements on Introduced Bills later in today's RECORD.)

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m. with statements limited to 5 minutes each.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AMENDMENT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I wish to speak to the English language amendment [ELA] by first telling about an unusual football game I saw on television last fall.

On two consecutive downs, the quarterback called one play but the members of the backfield ran another. On the second attempt, the mixup resulted in a fumble which culminated in a touchdown for the opposing team.

When asked about the blunder, the members of the backfield admitted to a "communications misunderstanding."

Football is a game I have often compared to life. It is true that in a football season, you have wins and losses, but those become memories when the next season rolls around, and we start over. But there is a great deal of similarity and parallel in the real world with respect to misunderstandings in communication, and this can lead to serious consequences—a business failure, the dissolution of a family, or even a war between nations.

The Bible speaks of mankind being created with one universal language which gave them great power: "And nothing which they proposed to do will be impossible for them."

Later, we read where the language was confounded during the construction of the Tower of Babel. No longer able to communicate, the society disintegrated and the people went their separate ways. The world has been in an upheaval ever since.

I have on my staff a linguist who lived in Canada for 11 years during the bilingual-bicultural turmoil. He confirms the problems we read about there. Although the country is officially bilingual, English is the language of business in all but one province. There the minority became so defensive about French that they literally forced large corporations to relocate in other parts of Canada. Separatists in the East helped spawn similar sentiments in the West and there arose a movement to create an independent western Canada.

Now, the large Ukrainian-Canadian population in the prairie provinces of Canada has decided to set up Ukrainian schools to promote their language and culture. After all, "If bilingual is good, then trilingual must be better," according to their spokesman.

Sri Lanka and Belgium are two other nations whose linguistically different populations fight and bicker among themselves constantly. Just two decades ago in India, nearly 1 million people lost their lives in riots that were directly linked to language and culture differences.

So far, the United States has avoided the severe problems these countries have experienced. True, we have absorbed many people speaking hundreds of languages, but we did so because of the cement we call English.

A common language binds people together into societies. In this body, we argue, we debated, we disagree, and we compromise; but at least we understand each other. And because of a common language, somehow we make it happen; we have helped develop a mighty nation with the world's greatest system of government.

But times are changing. Immigrants from many countries are now streaming into America at a rapid rate. There are those who feed on this vast pool of non-English-speaking people for their own purposes. Greedy politicians and others find them easy targets because of the language barrier. And as long as the barrier remains, they are more easily manipulated.

At present, our Federal policies are fuzzy: Do we want our new citizens to speak English, or do we not? Bilingual ballots, current bilingual education policies, and the lack of an official language for our governmental processes make people wonder.

There is some concern over what the ELA will and will not do. Briefly, let me state our intentions.

It will not prohibit or discourage the use of foreign languages at home, in church services, in communities, private schools, commerce, or private organizations. Indeed, we want to protect our rich ethnic heritage which people of many different nationalities who came to our country enjoy.

Second, it will not prohibit the teaching of foreign languages in our public schools, nor will it limit their foreign language requirements. I feel strongly that we should encourage, not discourage, foreign language learning.

My objection to what goes on in many of the bilingual educational programs is this: It is one thing to teach the discipline of a foreign language such as Spanish in the classroom, which I think we should do but I do think it is a mistake to teach chemistry, mathematics, social sciences, and many other courses in Spanish. When we do that those students are never put in the situation where they have to learn English and become competent in it. What will happen to those students who do not learn English fluently in their school years? They will be at a severe disadvantage until they become competent in English. As a father, I encourage my children and make it a requirement that they take Spanish in the school system, because it is practical in the western part of the United States to be at least somewhat comfortable in Spanish.

Third, it will not prohibit the use of another language in matters of public convenience and safety in limited circumstances.

The English language amendment will reinforce the idea that our Nation's fundamental internal security and well-being requires a common language. Also, it will abolish bilingual ballots and establish English as the official language of Federal, State, and local elections and government processes. The ELA will reestablish the original intent of bilingual education; to teach students English as rapidly as possible so they may enter America's economic mainstream. And most important, it will reaffirm that we are truly "one nation * * * indivisable."

I am proud of my heritage as you are of yours. As a nation of immigrants, we have blended our diversity together into what Senator Hayakawa once called a "cultural symphony" known as the United States of America.

I want that symphony to continue as harmoniously as possible. For that reason, Mr. President, I have introduced the English language amendment.

Mr. President, I would urge those Senators who may be listening, to instruct their staffs to look into this question, to look at the growth trends in the United States of America, at what is happening with respect to population growth. Now is the time for us to make a move to head off what could become a problem by the turn of the century or later. Currently we allow large sections of this country to go ahead with business as usual as we teach students in other languages in the schools. Soon we will have large sections of our population that are not fluent or competent in English. Those people will always be at a disadvantage—politically, economically, and culturally—to enjoy the vast benefits that are accorded to them as citizens of the United States of America.

Mr. President, I cannot think of a better example of what I am talking about than the example President Reagan used last night. Cadet Jean Nguyen will be graduating from West Point this coming May 22. Had this young lady come to the United States and not had the motivation to really learn English; or had the opportunity to go into a Vietnamese-speaking school that taught her history, physics, chemistry, and the other courses in Vietnamese, there is no way that she could have been admitted and been successful at West Point.

She came to this country and immediately learned English, and is now well on the way to becoming a commissioned officer in the Army of the United States. I think that is a good example of what we are talking about.

Mr. President, I would urge all Senators to join in this crusade, to get on board the English language amendment, and let us start making the English language what Senator Hayakawa, our former colleague, called a "cultural symphony" we know as the United States of America.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I am about to make a unanimous-consent request, but before I make the request I will say to my colleagues that I have cleared the making of this request with both the majority and the minority leaders.

Having said that, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now go into executive session to consider the nomination of Lee M. Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nomination will be stated.

NOMINATION OF LEE M. THOMAS TO BE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

The bill clerk read the nomination of Lee M. Thomas, of Virginia, to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is acting so promptly to consider the nomination of Mr. Lee Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

The Committee on Environment and Public Works has recommended that he be confirmed by a vote of 16–0, which is the best vote of confidence any nominee could expect. The reason Mr. Thomas' nomination was endorsed so overwhelmingly is the respect which he has earned for his stewardship during the past 18 months of two of the most difficult and controversial programs administered by the Agency, Superfund and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act.

Mr. President, I hope and believe that Mr. Thomas will run the Environmental Protection Agency in a competent and independent manner, thus taking us one step closer toward restoration of the Nation's confidence in the Agency, its employees, and the integrity of the laws they administer. For this reason, I hope the Senate will confirm the nomination without further delay.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me to rise in support of the nomination of my good friend and fellow South Carolinian, Mr. Lee Thomas, to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. He is eminently qualified for the position, and I urge that the Senate expeditiously confirm this nomination.

Lee received his bachelor of arts degree from the University of the South in Sewanee, TN, and his master's degree from the University of South Carolina. He subsequently served as councilman of the Ridgeway, SC, Town Council and two consecutive terms as chairman of the National Criminal Justice Association. He continued his public service career in an exemplary manner, by holding important and responsible positions in South Carolina State government. Additionally, he served as chairman of the Governor's task force on emergency response capabilities in support of fixed nuclear facilities; director, public safety programs; and he directed the establishment of the Governor's comprehensive emergency management advisory committee.

On the Federal level, Lee has served as the Executive Deputy Director and the Associate Director for State and Local Programs and Support of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Most recently, while under extraordinary circumstances, he did an outstanding job as the Assistant Administrator for Solid Waste and Emergency Response at the Environmental Protection Agency.

I have called upon Lee from time to time in his capacity as Assistant Administrator for Solid Waste and Emergency Response on a number of issues of concern to the public, including a number of hazardous waste sites in my State, as well as the removal of asbestos in South Carolina schools. He has always been extremely responsive and helpful. I look forward to a continuing, positive relationship with him as the next Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Lee is a fine gentleman with a long and impressive career as a public servant. He has served in government at the local, State, and Federal levels, and in my judgment, he will make an excellent Administrator of the Environmental Portection Agency. He has demonstrated that he is a person of high ethics, competence, independence, integrity, and intellect. He has the qualifications necessary to maintain the effectiveness of the Environmental Protection Agency, and to maintain public confidence in the Agency as the protector of our environment.

I am both extremely proud of, and have high regard for this fine South Carolinian. The Senate should promptly confirm the nomination of Lee Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency in order that he can get on with the challenging task of protecting our precious environmental resources for the benefit of all Americans.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the significance of the vote we are about to cast should not be underestimated. I expect that the Senate will unanimously approve the nomination of Lee Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. When we do, we will be sending a message to Lee, to the many dedicated employees at EPA, to the American public, and to those who are tempted to try and control or unduly influence the environmental policies of this country. The message is this: Lee Thomas is being entrusted with one of the most difficult and important jobs in this country, that of protecting human health and the environment, because he has earned the trust, respect, and support of the U.S. Senate. He has earned it and let there be no mistake that he has it. Those who question the breadth of Lee's political support should take note of the 16-to-0 vote of approval in the Committee on Environment and Public Works and of today's vote in the Senate as a whole. Take note and keep in mind that the days when EPA nominees were approved simply because they were the President's choice are behind us. These votes are significant, unequivocal statements of approval.

As Bill Ruckelshaus' successor, the shoes Lee is being asked to fill are quite a bit larger than when Lee took over the job of Assistant Administrator for Hazardous Waste and Emergency Response. As tough as that AA job is, being Administrator of the entire Agency is markedly more difficult and will require a number of adjustments.

Many of our environmental laws are structured in such a way as to make the Administrator the environmental shepherd of the executive branch. He must ride herd on the other agencies and departments to assure compliance with the law. This responsibility won't make him popular. The vast majority of our environmental laws make the Administrator the ultimate decisionmaker. He alone is responsible and accountable. Each decision is virtually guaranteed to disappoint or even infuriate one or the other interest group.

Being Administrator of EPA often appears to be a thankless job. However, it is a job that must be done and, notwithstanding the paucity of periodic thanks and praise, it is a job that must be done well. The health and quality of life of our neighbors, children, and children's children depend on it. It is my hope that as Lee enters his office each day he will look at the name of the Agency written on the wall and think about his mission. The name Environmental Protection Agency says it all.

I believe that Lee Thomas is up to the challenge and is an excellent choice for this job. He deserves our support not only today but each day he is in office. As one Member of Congress, I pledge that support and hope that he will feel free to call upon me for advice and counsel as often as he sees fit.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my strong support for the nomination of Lee Thomas to be the next Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

The job of Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency entails enormous responsibility. For 15-years, the American people have looked to the EPA as our Nation's most important institution to preserve and enhance this Nation's precious environmental resources. It is a responsibility that I know Mr. Thomas will not take lightly.

As a member of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, I have been extremely impressed with Mr. Thomas' work over the past 2 years as the Agency's Assistant Administrator for Solid Waste and Emergency Response. In assuming that position, Mr. Thomas was charged with the enormous task of turning around the Superfund Program which only, 2 years ago, had been written off as hopelessly and forever off course. Mr. Thomas immediately and forcefully plunged into the task of turning this vital program around. In doing so, he displayed considerable management skills, as well as his fundamental commitment to the protection of the environment and public health.

There is no question that Mr. Thomas will fill some large shoes. His predecessor, William Ruckelshaus, reinvigorated the Agency with a sense of purpose, substantially redirected the course of environmental policy in the Reagan administration, and perhaps most importantly, restored the confidence among the American people that the laws designed to protect human health and the environment were being vigorously enforced.

Because Bill Ruckelshaus discharged his duties with such effectiveness, the agenda facing Lee Thomas will be substantially different from that which faced Mr. Ruckelshaus nearly 2 years ago.

The Agency is now facing new and different kinds of challenges—many of which Mr. Thomas is uniquely qualified to take on. Last year, the Congress passed, the President approved a reauthorization and expansion of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. And, this year, we will complete action on a new and greatly expanded Superfund Program.

Lee Thomas will also face many of the same challenges which have faced his predecessors in that important office. I speak with great confidence in suggesting to my colleagues that Mr. Thomas will take on these duties with the same skill and ability that he has displayed throughout his distinguished career.

Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to confirm Lee Thomas as the next Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, Lee Thomas has a long record of public service at the local, State, and Federal levels. Recently, he has proven to be an able and effective manager of complex programs during a difficult period. I am pleased that the Senate has moved quickly to confirm Mr. Thomas so that we can now begin the critical work ahead in the environment.

Virtually all the major environmental statutes including the Clean Water Act, the Clean Air Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act, and the Superfund are awaiting action because their funding authorizations have expired or will do so in 1985. Continued inaction on these vital laws not only threatens the progress we have made in the last decade, but weakens our ability to meet the challenges of the future.

I believe that Mr. Thomas can continue the job of restoring public confidence in the EPA. During his testimony to the Environment Committee, Mr. Thomas stated that one of his objectives was to ensure a strong scientific and technical base to support program decisions. Since 1981, the administration has slashed EPA's research office by 50 percent. This has forestalled valuable research, delayed implementation of some technologies, and substantially reduced the level of national scientific expertise available to address critical issues. Without sound scientific data, we not only risk failure to identify environmental threats, but we also risk having industry impose costly controls that better research would have shown to be unwarranted.

So far only six hazardous waste sites have been cleaned up under the Superfund Program enacted in 1980. Our people are understandably alarmed about the health hazards posed by toxic chemicals. Ohio has 28 sites now listed on the National Priority List, and the citizens of my State are demanding a full scale effort to protect their health and the environment from the perils of toxic pollutants. I trust that Mr. Thomas will continue to aggressively administer this program as he has since 1983.

I join with my colleagues in endorsing Lee Thomas as EPA Administrator and look forward to working with him on these vital issues.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am so very sincerely gratified that the Environment and Public Works Committee has unanimously approved the nomination of Lee Thomas to be EPA Administrator. In my duties on the Environment Committee, I have grown to personally admire Lee and to be most impressed by his intellect, skills, and his work product. He does the job.

Lee Thomas has gained a wealth of administrative experience beginning in the Office of the Governor of South Carolina and progressing through the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Environmental Protection Agency. All of his experience and expertise is geared toward protection of public health and the environment.

President Reagan plans to make the reauthorization of Superfund one of his top priorities this year, and I just can't think of a better person than Lee Thomas to be the "point man" in that effort. Congress must act responsibly during the reauthorization process and Lee will be right there to cut through the fear and the guilt and the emotion that seems to accompany the consideration of environmental issues involving hazardous waste.

Last year, the Environment and Public Works Committee benefited in significantly great measure by having Lee at the Superfund markups, where he could respond with on-the-spot "no nonsense" advice to me and fellow lawmakers. His good counsel and uncommon degree of common sense was appreciated by all of us on the committee.

I am pleased that Lee Thomas will be confirmed today, as he represents the quintessential public servant. He is a man of integrity, wisdom, and forethought. He will lead that agency through his personal strength and—his ability to consider all facets of a situation—and he will continue to maintain the high morale now so evident at EPA.

Lee always deals with the facts and he has become a trusted counselor and adviser on some very contentious environmental issues. And speaking of trust—he has mine in full measure. I commend him. I would urge your support of Lee as he approaches his challenging new job.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased to speak in favor of the nomination of Mr. Lee Thomas as the new Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. In his previous position as head of the Superfund Program to clean up abandoned toxic waste dumps, Mr. Thomas established a reputation as an excellent Administrator. Indeed, Mr. Thomas inherited an unfortunate situation when he first took over responsibility for the Superfund Program. EPA had been through a scandal involving the administration of the Superfund Program. It was largely as a result of Mr. Thomas' efforts that public confidence in the integrity of the Superfund Program has been restored. Based upon his record of achievement, I think Mr. Thomas will make an excellent EPA Administrator.

I have had an opportunity to meet with Mr. Thomas, and I have found him to be reasonable and willing to work with the Congress in addressing the many difficult environmental issues which will face the 99th Congress.

I congratulate Mr. Thomas on his appointment, and I look forward to working with him.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would just like to take a moment to urge my colleagues to support, with enthusiasm, the nomination of Lee M. Thomas to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. Mr. Thomas deserves the considerable confidence that President Reagan has demonstrated in him.

Bill Ruckelshaus did an outstanding job at EPA, both in improving administration, dealing with Congress and with interest groups, and in shoring up morale at the Agency. Lee Thomas has been an integral part of the Ruckelshaus team, and already has shown his ability and his commitment to the environment in his management of the RCRA and Superfund Programs. Superfund is due for reauthorization this year, and I look forward to working with Mr. Thomas in putting together a fiscally sound Hazardous Waste Cleanup Program to carry through most of this decade.

Mr. President, prior to his experience at EPA as Acting Deputy Administrator, Lee Thomas was Executive Deputy Director of FEMA, and he has had considerable experience in State government in South Carolina, dealing with both public safety and criminal justice in the office of the Governor.

I know that our Senators from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND and Senator HOLLINGS, are proud that a South Carolinian like Lee Thomas has compiled such an outstanding record of public service. I am sure they join me in welcoming the opportunity to work with Lee in the years ahead. Finally, let me congratulate Senator STAFFORD and the Committee on Environment and Public Works for expediting action on this important nomination. There is much to be done at EPA in 1985, and we can help by getting Lee Thomas and his team in place right away.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the nomination of Lee M. Thomas as Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

As a member of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, I have been most impressed with Mr. Thomas' performance as Assistant Administrator of Solid Waste and Emergency Response. Mr. Thomas has earned the respect of the committee and I am confident that we may count on him to work closely with this body as we consider the reauthorization of several significant environmental statutes.

Mr. President, Mr. Thomas knows of my strong interest in the Asbestos School Hazard Abatement Act of 1984. As the author of this program to assist financially needy school districts in financing necessary asbestos abatement projects, I will continue to follow closely EPA implementation of the act. Thus far, I have been very pleased with the way in which the Agency is moving ahead with this new program. I have found the region VIII staff, in addition to the program staff here in Washington, most helpful in responding to my questions and concerns.

Mr. President, the conscientious stewardship of our Nation's natural resources is of vital importance to each and every one of us. I believe that President Reagan has made a wise choice in the nomination of Lee M. Thomas. I wholeheartedly endorse Mr. Thomas as the new Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and I urge my colleagues to give him their unanimous support.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I will now suggest the absence of a quorum until the minority leader can come to the floor and make any statement he wishes.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased that we have been able to move as expeditiously as we have in considering the nomination of Lee Thomas as Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

It is no secret that the Federal Government has fallen woefully behind in our efforts relating to the environment, and there is no time to waste in getting down to the serious tasks ahead.

I have known Lee Thomas as a capable manager of the Superfund, and I know he did a very good job in handling this important project under less than perfect circumstances, I have no doubt that he has the ability to serve as Administrator.

However, as we pointed out to Mr. Thomas in hearings before the Environment and Public Works Committee, he has a massive rebuilding effort before him. Despite efforts to correct the questions and complaints over EPA's management and intent, the Agency has not yet regained the public trust that is necessary for progress.

As Members of the Senate are aware, most of the major environmental funding authorizations have expired over the past few years. While this has not prevented us from enforcing the law or developing and modifying regulations, it is a clear signal that Congress is facing real difficulties in attempting to improve environmental policy.

Much of this is due to the fact that questions regarding the effectiveness of EPA to carry out its mandates have limited the ability of Congress to enact revisions.

Mr. President, the people of this Nation have the right to demand a stable and professional EPA to provide an unbiased analysis to assess the issues. Our citizens deserve a safe and sane environmental policy, our industries deserve a consistent guideline for long term planning, and all interest groups deserve to be heard.

I believe the EPA is moving in the right direction, and judging from his past performance and his response to our questions in committee, I believe Lee Thomas is the right man to continue this improvement.

I will vote to conform this nomination and I urge my colleagues to join me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I know of no further speakers who wish to be heard on the matter of the nomination of Lee Thomas. That being the case, Mr. President, I move that the Senate vote to confirm the nomination of Lee Thomas, to be Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Lee M. Thomas, to be Administrator of the Environmetnal Protection Agency?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BENTSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to the nomination of Lee Thomas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 433—EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1985.

This bill, Madam President, addresses an issue that is facing hundreds of thousands of American farmers this very month. It deals with an emergency situation with emergency legislation that will, without costing the Federal Government a single cent in additional spending, enable these farmers to begin their spring planting next month.

We are all aware of the crisis facing American agriculture. Just yesterday, the Secretary of Agriculture announced a broadening of the farm relief program that the administration devised last fall.

We do not yet know if this administration program will stave off the wave of foreclosures threatening to engulf farmers, rural banks, and rural communities across the Nation. What we do know is that the administration's program will do nothing for those farmers who—because the rural banks are overextended, because their Production Credit Associations are liquidated, because they have exhausted all of their credit resources—will not be able to plant this spring.

As any farmer can tell you, if you cannot plant, if you cannot get a crop in the ground, you cannot harvest. Today in farming communities across the country, thousands upon thousands of farmers will go out of business unless they can obtain operating credit.

What this bill does is very simple. The nonrecourse loans, which are made available to farmers of certain crops at harvest time, provide a means of relieving the farmer of the necessity of selling his harvest immediately, thus stabilizing the market. The Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1985 would permit an advance of one-third of this loan, based on his historic yield, to the farmer before the plants, rather than when he harvests.

If the farmer doesn't plant, the farmer doesn't harvest.

These loans would be on the same basis as the nonrecourse loans already are. If this were a normal year, the ASCS would start making them in September and October, as the crops were coming in. What this bill does is to mandate the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture to advance one-third of this loan now, so that the farmer can begin planting.

There are three things I must emphasize about this bill.

The first is that it does not cost the Federal Government an additional cent. If anything, it will save the Government millions of dollars in welfare and other safety-net payments, should these farmers be thrown on the welfare rolls because they could not get their crops in the ground.

The second is that this is a short-term solution to a short-term problem. When the Senate returns from recess later this month, I will introduce legislation to address the larger aspects of the farm credit crisis.

The third is that this is emergency legislation. For the larger aspects of the farm credit crisis we can buy some breathing space, if we can help the farmers get their crops in the ground right now. But spring planting begins next month. Most farmers would start getting their operating loans on March 1, if the credit were available.

We must act now. If the farmer doesn't plant, the farmer doesn't harvest.

Now, Madam President, I know, that under our normal procedure, this bill would be referred to the Agriculture Committee, of which I am a member, for consideration. But these are not normal times. We need quick action. I would therefore like to request that this bill be held at the desk.

I would hope that perhaps the majority leader or one of his representatives would be here in short order but let me make it perfectly clear that I am not trying to do something without discussing it with him.

The other day, during his usual press of very heavy business, I explained to Senator DOLE, that I had a piece of emergency legislation that I wanted to introduce before the break that was directed to the farm credit problem in America on a short-term basis only. And since the Presiding Officer comes from a farm State, the same as that of the majority leader, may I say to her that she may remember that a short time ago, I think a week ago, a group of State legislators from all over the Midwest met in Chicago, at which time they talked about the farm problem in the country and specifically at quite a great deal of length about the farm credit problem.

One of the people at that meeting was a distinguished State senator from my State, Jerome Joyce, who represents roughly the Kankakee-Iroquois County area of my State and parts of other counties, which is a very, very important farm section of our State. Senator Joyce himself farms, as I recall, over 500 acres of ground, the usual Illinois crops—corn, beans—and hogs.

The idea he came up with, which was well-received by everybody at that meeting, is the basis for the bill I am introducing today.

Now obviously this is not a very good solution, Madam President. And the Senator from Illinois does not come here to tell you he has finally found the answer to the farm credit problem. But a lot of people believe that for tens of thousands of farmers in Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, and many other places, at least this will let them put their crops in the ground, because you cannot get the money after harvest if you could not plant in the spring.

As I stated earlier, that is essentially all that this very simple bill does. The reason I say this by way of explanation is I told it to the majority leader yesterday. He was very, very busy and under a lot of pressure, which I can deeply appreciate. I know the pressure on all of us and we know how many hundredfold that is upon the majority leader, of whom I am greatly fond.

So I am going to introduce this bill now. May I say again to the Presiding Officer and others who are listening for the majority leader what I would like to do is keep this bill at the desk until a time certain after we return—I understand that will be on February 18—so that the majority leader and others can contemplate this and see whether this could receive some fast-track emergency special treatment. The problem is now. If the bill is referred to committee and all of the attendant things that would flow from that, this bill could be enacted in time.

A figure I read today, Madam President, in one of the major newspapers—I cannot recall which one had suggested that at least 5 percent of small farmers in America on the American farms in all our States faced a real problem that they would not get the money to put in their crops this spring.

That is all this is designed to do, is for a working farmer last year that he can get money for seed. I do not know how we solve the problem later on, Madam President. I have some ideas, you have some ideas, others in the Congress, and others in agriculture generally do.

At this time, I would like to do two things: introduce this bill, make the appropriate motion to keep it at the desk until I can discuss it further with the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRIBLE. I reserve the right to object. Reserving the right to object, I ask my esteemed colleague to withhold that request until we have had a chance to clear it on this side of the aisle.

Mr. DIXON. Madam President, I am delighted in every way to accommodate my warm friend from Virginia and he was not here for my entire remarks, but he should understand this is only done because it is an emergency. I heard we were going out in a matter of minutes. This directs a problem that begins the 1st of March. We are going to be out for a week. For all those reasons, I dashed over here. I do not want to do anything by subterfuge. I have talked on a prior occasion with the majority leader and am delighted to wait until someone can come to the floor. I want everything to be aboveboard. But I honestly and sincerely believe that the problem at hand is massive and serious enough that we ought to try to devise something right now to address it in a very small way—this is only a band-aid—but in a small way. I am delighted to accede to any request, and ask we do that, and wait. I suggest the absence of a quorum, if that would be the appropriate parliamentary remedy for the moment, until such time as others get here.

Has my bill been introduced, Madam President? I have asked to do that, if I may. I ask that we do nothing further until the majority leader gets here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Senator from Illinois certainly has the right to introduce his bill. If he wishes to suggest the absence of a quorum——

Mr. DIXON. I do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIXON. Madam President, I understand that I now have agreement between the majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee to make a request for unanimous consent to hold this bill at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, February 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Hearing no objection, the bill will be held at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, February 19.

Mr. DIXON. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 433

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Effective only for the 1985 crops of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, rice, and soybeans, the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended by inserting after section 107C (7 U.S.C. 1445b-2) the following new section:

"SEC. 107D. (a) In order to provide vitally needed assistance to producers of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, rice, and soybeans, the Secretary shall make available to producers loans authorized to be made under section 107B(a), 105B(a), 103(g)(1), 101(i)(1), and 201(g), respectively, in advance of harvest as provided in this section. Loans made in advance of harvest (advance loans) under this section may be made only with respect to the 1985 crop of such commodities.

"(b) In order to be eligible to receive an advance loan for a commodity under this section, a producer must—

"(1) submit an application for such loan to the Secretary; and

"(2) have produced during the 1984 crop year the commodity for which the advance loan is required.

"(c)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the amount of an advance loan made to a producer of a commodity under this section shall equal one-third of the amount of the loan the Secretary determines the producer would otherwise be entitled to receive for such commodity under a section referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The total amount of advanced loans a producer may receive under this section may not exceed $50,000.

"(d) The Secretary shall—

"(1) establish and carry out a program to make advance loans to producers in accordance with this section no later than thirty days after the date of the enactment of the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1985; and

"(2) make or deny an advance loan to a producer no later than thirty days after receipt of an application for such loan.".

Mr. DIXON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MARJORIE PALMER

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, Vermonters know about Marjorie Palmer, who was recently named Vermont Farm Wife of the Year by the State Farm Bureau. I think the rest of the country should know about Marjorie too.

Marjorie has been operating a maple sugar operation for more than 40 years. She is a grandmother, and has been married for 50 years.

And I ask unanimous consent to enter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this story about Mrs. Palmer and her family that appeared in the November 17, 1984 issue of the Burlington Free Press. It will not take long to discover that Marjorie Palmer is one sweet Vermonter.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARJORIE PALMER—FARM WIFE OF THE YEAR SAYS SHE DIDN'T DESERVE IT, BUT THE RECORD SAYS OTHERWISE

(By Maggie Maurice)

HINESBURG—During World War II sugar was in short supply and each American was allotted so many coupons. For Marjorie Palmer then a resident of Burlington, they never seemed to stretch far enough for her family of four. Why not, she pondered, use that sugarhouse at the Palmer farm?

"How about sugaring?" she said to the neighboring farm wife.

"Do you know how?"

"No, but I can read."

That spring in the early 1940s, the two women tapped 1,400 trees.

Marjorie Palmer, wife of Loren, mother of three and grandmother of six, has operated the maple orchard every spring since.

On Nov. 1, she was named 1984 Vermont Farm Wife of the Year by the state Farm Bureau.

"Whether at home, at work, at church or in the community, she is an inspiration to everyone she meets," wrote Clark and Nancy Hinsdale of Charlotte, who nominated her.

"We are proud of our winner from Chittenden County," said Helen Lawrence, Farm Bureau member of Jericho. "She's a hard-working lady."

The winner was stunned.

"This whole thing I didn't deserve," she said after the announcement was made at the Vermont Farm Bureau convention at Lake Morey. "I'm not bashful, but I feel some of the young ones deserved it more."

Striving to explain her feelings, she continued, "I've gotten just as much out of every volunteer job I've ever had. It's rewarding to know I can do something and that some good is coming out of it."

The Palmers live on the road that connects Dorest Street and Vermont 116. The gray house up on a knoll has a maple syrup sign down by the drive, "the only maple syrup sign on the road," she says when giving directions. Although they've always owned the farm, they didn't move there until 20 years ago. Her husband is a retired funeral director.

"Thirty years we owned this place, hired a farmer and a second man," she said. "I always wanted to live in the country. Finally, I said, 'no one else is moving in here. I'm moving in.' "

The farmhouse has a long living room with windows looking out on Camel's Hump. The hall closet is stacked with Palmer's Maple Syrup. The 12 cats run and cavort outside (only Bigfoot is allowed in the house). Evidence of projects is everywhere. A gallon jar beside her chair holds nuts she is wiring for the church bazaar. The dining room is strung with dried herbs and flowers.

"I have some favorite napkins that say, 'The house is a mess but it's better than it usually is' " she has a big garden and has, at one time or another, raised pigs, sheep and calves, the maple syrup business is never completely forgotten. In the kitchen, there's Indian Sugar ("awfully good on hot cereal"), maple cream ("I use that to frost doughnuts,") and a tin of maple candies ("I need to make some more").

We urged her to tell us about the early years.

"We had a white horse, bought a sled just big enough for four milk cans. That's how we did it the first year. One would collect, the other boil," she said. "We went to Jim Marvin and Fred Taylor at UVM for advice.

"Then, I used mostly buckets. When I first sugared, I didn't tap that many trees. The people at the farm let me know when it was running. I had a snowmobile a number of years, went up to the sugarhouse in that. It's always been a fun thing for me. I enjoy it.

"How many days does the season run? Sometimes it's short and concentrated, others a little bit here, there. Mother Nature decides," she said.

Until 1972, she used wood for the stove and boiled all night by lantern.

"It's slower, wood is. We never boiled till more than midnight last year," she said. But then she built the sugarhouse down on the road, and added electricity and oil. The sign on the front says "Palmer's." Another sign on the door adds, "I live the fourth house toward Hinesburg."

No more buckets now. Before the sap starts running, she checks out the lines.

Last summer the Palmers had their 50th wedding anniversary. Their children, Lorelei Kjelleren of Wilmington, Del., Loren (Tinker) Palmer, who lives behind the sugarhouse up the hill, and David, who runs the main farm, wanted to give them a party.

"I said, 'we got more doodads and junk than we can ever get rid of, we don't need a party,' but they did anyway," she said. "They had a party at camp and ask people to bring pictures that would remind us of the way we were involved with the family. They were on display on the porch. Since then, we've looked at them over and over again."

Much has changed since the early days of the white horse and the sled. Syrup was $3 a gallon that first year; it's now $18. The old sugarhouse up the hill is in disrepair, even the smokestack is down. Somebody tore the door down, someone else shot out the windows. As far as Palmer is concerned, it's picturesque but that's all.

"Everybody has good times and sad ones," she said. "I walk up in the woods and think how lucky I am. When you're busy, you forget your aches and pains.

"The Lord has been good to us. My grandmother used to say, 'I can't leave you a lot of money but I can leave you good blood. Now keep it that way.' "

The last we saw, she was sweeping snow off the porch. Keeping it that way, just like her grandmother said.

LEE KAYHART

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I would like to share with my fellow Senators one of the greatest illustrations of individual courage and perseverance that I have ever witnessed in my native State of Vermont.

Let me tell you about Lee Kayhart, a 36-year-old farmer from West Addison and father of three children.

Lee lost both his arms in a farm accident about a year ago, and spent 3 months in a Boston hospital while doctors tried unsuccessfully to graft the limbs back on his body. Today, Lee and his wife Pat and the children are operating the 140-acre farm along the Lake Champlain shore.

Lee does some things with his teeth and feet that he used to accomplish with strong arms and hands. But he goes about his chores with an air of a man who feels happy just being alive.

On January 6, 1985, my home town newspaper, the Burlington Free Press, printed a story in its magazine section about this plucky Vermonter and his family.

If you would like to read more about a Vermonter that I am proud to know, I will send you the article.

It should serve as an inspiration to all of us. Residents of your States will be inspired by the accomplishments of this Vermonter, and his loving family.

GEORGE TAMES

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, for years there has been a debate whether photography is an art form. Because of people like Ansel Adams and Henri Cartier-Bresson, people tend to realize photography can be an art form.

My good friend George Tames has proven photography is an art—in the hands of an artist. He is truly an artist recognized as such by people throughout the world.

So all can share the pride photographers feel about this unique person I ask unanimous consent that an article written about George Tames from the New York Times Sunday Magazine be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times Magazine, Oct. 14, 1984]

Long before George Tames aimed a camera, he first saw light idealized on the face of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. As a growing boy, he was ordered by his mother, Athena, a member of the Greek Orthodox faith, to light the night candle by the icon stand, where images of the Virgin Mother, St. George and St. Luke kept watch over the family. "One night, St. Luke was gone and Roosevelt was in his place," Tames recalls. "It was the Depression, and Roosevelt had become a saint."

Seven years later, at the age of 21, Tames, equipped with a 10th-grade education and a clear eye, finally saw Roosevelt's face in the flesh. For Time magazine, Tames took his first photographs of the President, trying to spare the tired leader some of the harshness of raw light and give him back that icon glow. "I had his declining years," Tames says, "from 1940 until his death, and in my mind he's still one of the saints. I always made sure he was in the right light."

Since that first exposure to the Oval Office more than four decades ago, George Tames has been adjusting the lighting on Presidents; his work spans 11 Presidential terms. "He's the champion," says Cornell Capa, a former Life photographer and director of the International Center of Photography. "He has had the crown for 40 years, and that's a long time to remain a champion." Tames joined The New York Times in 1945, and, over the years, the hallmark of his photography has been his ability to capture the intimate, unguarded moments that reveal the character of life in the capital. In this campaign season, so heavily influenced by media managers and contrived spontaneity, Tames's pictures of the powerful are refreshingly accessible. "He earned everybody's trust," says Capa, who covered Washington for a time himself. "He could just walk into somebody's office, say 'Hi,' and get the best picture. He beats everybody."

Tames admits he has been kindly toward all the Presidents he has photographed. "I owe that to the office, but I also owe that to the man," he says. The notion that the artist has an obligation to both the office and the subject summarizes Tames's method. He needs to see the humanity within the people of power before they can be convincingly photographed.

Undoubtedly, this perspective is related to his origin in Washington as the son of Greek-Albanian parents, one of seven children supported by a religious mother and an industrious father who hawked wares from a pushcart.

In a city of blimp-size egos, George Tames has remained unaffected, a natural. This is reflected in his most dramatic pictures of politicians. The power of his photographs, such as the one of John F. Kennedy leaning into the White House office shadows while working at "The Loneliest Job in the World," comes from patient watching, not melodramatic conjuring. In the case of the Kennedy picture, Tames, on duty in the White House, had observed that the President always left the doors to his office open and that, because of his injured back, Kennedy frequently worked standing up.

"I looked in and saw him standing and leaning forward over the table, with his weight on his arms while he read something," Tames recalls. "I went in and took two pictures that I deliberately underexposed. I wanted the blackness, the mood that I saw with my eye." As it turned out, what Kennedy was reading was the editorial page of Tames's own newspaper, and the President was frowning deeply. The impact of Tames's unposed picture is stunning and complex.

"I was trained in the Speed Graphic days, when you only had one frame," he says, appreciating the old knack of going after a single picture rather than rapidly spray-shooting exposures as is done today. "It was like the muzzleloading gun; if you missed it, your one shot was gone."

Working with little margin for error, Tames developed small tricks that have survived well into the modern era. He noticed, for example, that President Dwight D. Eisenhower had a slight hearing problem. If Tames mumbled to him, Eisenhower would react with a scowl of curiosity that skewed his cherubic smile into something especially revealing. "Ike would give that great surprised look and ask, 'What?' and, bang, I'd have the picture," Tames says, laughing.

During Watergate, when it was hard for many people in Washington to smile, Tames stumbled on a foolproof line. He would sidle up and whisper conspiratorially to a subject, "Would you mind if I took your picture with the very same camera I used to photograph Nixon?"

"They always smiled or laughed," the photographer recalls. "It was a ridiculous question, but it was just what they needed to hear."

Tames has made an art of disrupting the city's craving to stage-manage events. A 1961 "photo opportunity" with Vice President Nixon and a birthday cake was routine and lifeless to Tames's eye until he saw the smoke rise from the extinguished candles. "I popped it fast. That smoke had made something intimate of something ordinary."

One day every year photographers used to be invited to record the members of the Supreme Court robed and seated like mannequins. Tames decided to take a picture before they put on their masks, while the justices were chatting and smoking, waiting for the official picture. The result is disarmingly human.

"You've got to have your confidence," he explains of such singular moments. "You have to be on it. Otherwise you linger behind the action."

Over the years, Tames has discovered the difference between photographing politicians and taking pictures of his grandchildren. "Egos," he says. "You've got to bring out the egos of the powerful to make it believable, let them be what they are." Tames uses his liens chivalrously, taking particular care with lighting when he photographs women, for example, seeking a high light that will shadow the neck. He worries less about giving men a weathered look. But of all his subjects, he says: "They're human first, before anything else."

Tames's empathy might be traced in part to President Harry S. Truman, who, almost 40 years ago, freed the half-dozen news photographers who covered the White House then from the cramped room, dubbed "the doghouse," that served as their office. "There was no TV, no newsreel cameras around there then, and when Truman toured the White House one day and saw us there he became very upset," Tames recalls. "You know, he had a thing about the underdog, and he said, 'They're coming out of there and coming in my office like everyone else from now on.' Truman made firstclass citizens of us."

Perhaps it was gratitude on the part of the photographers that caused Truman's smiling face to appear so often before America. In turn, Truman expected object loyalty; he would call in "his" photographers to snap practically anything he demanded. According to Tames, he even chewed them out once when they balked at photographing an old World War I cronie who had no news value but whom Truman hoped to sneak into the daily prints.

Tames has the ability to reproduce the mannerisms of his favorite subjects, and one of his most poignant depictions is of the moment he asked Truman what he did alone in the Oval Office when things got quiet or boring. "'I do this,'" he says Truman replied, taking a stack of photographs from a drawer and putting his signature on, one by one.

The pleasure of talking to Truman reinforced Tames's ideas about power being revealed through the commonplace. "Once I told him I had just come from the United Nations," Tames remembers, smiling at the image of the President suddenly treating him like the Secretary of State. "Old Truman leans back and says, 'Tell me, what the hell is going on up there?'" At the United Nations, Tames had first seen television used to cover a news event live, and he told Truman changes were in store for politicians. "Truman said, 'I can remember when a good politician had to be 75 percent ability and 25 percent actor, but I can well see the day when thece of stronger authority. "I learned that trick from Nixon," Kennedy told Tames, smiling.

Lyndon B. Johnson had a pharaoh's appetite for chiseling away at the edifice of the Presidency. "My God, his eye was on the sparrow. He knew everything that was going on, and detail did him in." Johnson would use the occasion of a handshake to get himself in position to be photographed from his best side, and he personally gleaned from each day's batch of photographs favorable ones to put in the Presidential archives. "He was working on his place in history every day, and a picture that didn't quite show him in the right way was as important to him as whether we bombed Vietnam."

As a photographer, Tames talks with ambivalence about controlling his emotions when covering some news events. His own tears don't help. "I had to stop what I was doing at Kennedy's funeral. I could not see." When an entire convention, after nominating Jimmy Carter for President, joined hands to sing "We Shall Overcome," Tames figured there was no harm in putting his camera aside to join briefly in the chain of humanity. Another hymn, "Jacob's Ladder," can make him dizzy with the memory of a night covering Martin Luther King Jr. down South.

"You see pictures every day, all the time," Tames says, as if his eye roves humanity constantly. "You watch light as it plays on people's faces. You know when the picture's there."

Some politicians seem to know a photographer's business as if it were their own. Nixon, he remembers, would take a quiet cue from the photo gallery and call over a nervous witness during anti-Communist hearings for a conference. Thus, he would compose that closeup picture that would make the front page. "He wanted to be one of the boys very badly," Tames says, "but I always had the feeling he tried too hard."

George Tames has a way of focusing events down to the level he needs to see, the human scale. "My father always told me that if you have just a single piece of silver, you can never feel poor in this world," he says, recalling the final photo he took of Vice President Spiro T. Agnew on Oct. 10, 1973, the day he resigned in disgrace. "I stopped on the way there and got a silver dollar, and when we shook hands I smiled and palmed it to him and he understood. I was not forgiving him, no no. But this was another human being," George Tames says.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DIRECTION OF SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL IN CERTAIN MATTERS

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I send to the desk a resolution on behalf of myself and the distinguished minority leader [Mr. BYRD] and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 69) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to represent Senator Riegle and Senator Levin in Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al., Civil Action No. 83-2896DT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, this resolution would direct the Senate legal counsel to provide representation for Senator RIEGLE and Senator LEVIN in response to subpoenas from the plaintiff in the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. versus Federal National Mortgage Association. This case is pending in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan and concerns the plaintiff's claim of housing discrimination against the Federal National Mortgage Association and a private mortgage company. Senators RIEGLE and LEVIN had received requests from the plaintiff for casework assistance prior to the commencement of this matter in the courts. The subpoenas seek both documents and testimony. If it is necessary to provide testimony, it is likely that this might be given by members of the Senators' staffs. Therefore, this resolution would authorize Senators RIEGLE and LEVIN and members of their staffs to produce documents and testify, if necessary, and would direct the Senate legal counsel to represent them and to assert any Senate privileges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 69) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 69

Whereas, the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al., Civil Action No. 83-2896DT, is pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan;

Whereas, plaintiff has served trial subpoenas for testimony and documents on Senators Donald W. Riegle, Jr., and Carl Levin;

Whereas, these subpoenas may be answerable by members of Senator Riegle's and Senator Levin's staffs;

Whereas, pursuant to section 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent members and employees of the Senate in civil actions relating to their official responsibilities;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of a member or an employee of the Senate is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Senator Riegle, Senator Levin and members of their respective staffs in the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al.

SEC. 2. That Senator Riegle and Senator Levin and members of their respective staffs whom they may designate are authorized to testify and to produce documents in the case of Lawrence Jasper & Family U.S.A. v. Federal National Mortgage Association, et al., except when the Senators' attendance at the Senate is necessary for the performance of their legislative duties, and except concerning matters that they and the Senate Legal Counsel or his representative determine are privileged from disclosure.

ORDER FOR PRINTING OF STAFFORD AMENDMENT

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 7, offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD], be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, does the distinguished Senator from Hawaii wish the floor?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Yes, Madam President.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I yield the floor to the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

OUR NEXT FRONTIER IS IN SPACE

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Madam President, last night, in his State of the Union Address, President Reagan recalled that "Proverbs tell us that without a vision the people perish." In this inspiring context, the President went on to declare his intention to "push on to new possibilities not only on Earth but on the next frontier in space." I wholeheartedly applaud those words and the expansive sentiments they express.

It is in the same spirit that for the past 2½ years I have been advancing legislation meant to develop policies that recognize the new realities, the extraordinary new possibilities, opened to us by the space age. In my continuing effort, Madam President, yesterday, I reintroduced a joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 46, cosponsored by a bipartisan group of three Democrats and three Republicans, as an incremental step forward. The resolution introduced yesterday pertains to a distant planet that has fascinated the human species since our earliest ancestors first contemplated the heavens—Mars.

Some of my colleagues may wonder: Has the Senator from Hawaii lost his senses? Here the U.S. Senate convenes to address a veritable avalanche of pressing issues, and the Senator from Hawaii talks about Mars?

But Madam President, I believe we also have a duty to try to see beyond the cascading issues that engulf us daily, even while we are considering them. No one likes to be called a reactionary, but if we simply react to problems as they occur, what else are we? Too often, it seems harried policymakers only have time to consider the future when it has nothing to offer because the encroaching present has already violated its potential.

I do not accept that, Madam President. I do not believe the American people sent us legislators here only to respond to their immediate needs. I believe our constituents also hope that some day, perhaps, we will respond to their aspirations as well, and not merely by concluding our speeches with misty visions borrowed from greeting cards or uplifting quotes from folklore. The future is neither nostalgia nor a dream but an unfolding concrete reality, filled with promise, meant to be acted upon pragmatically now, with intelligence and imagination, by those of us who are entrusted with the responsibilities of government.

As the preambular clauses in Senate Joint Resolution 46 indicate, the prospect of another costly and wasteful space race with the Russians is anything but science fiction. At a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing last September 13, a panel of U.S. space scientists testified unanimously that the Russians were going to Mars, perhaps as early as the 1990's. The evidence is convincing. The Soviets' record-setting achievements in long duration flight—nearly 8 months, most recently—can only be justified as preparation for an interplanetary mission, since space stations, including the one we are planning, are most efficiently serviced by rotating crews; whereas missions to the Moon can be completed in a few days. Similarly, the heavy-lift launch vehicle the Soviets are developing, which vastly exceeds our capabilities, is a requisite building block for manned interplanetary exploration. Other indications, including an already-scheduled unmanned mission to the Mars moon Phobos, plans for high-powered nuclear rocket engines, and numerous other activities and pronouncements by officials of the Soviet Government, point in the same direction. Are we setting ourselves up for another sputnik? Many experts believe so.

We can, of course, wait characteristically until the last minute, then launch a crash program to beat the Soviets to Mars, at stupendous cost. And after that, Neptune? Pluto? The next galaxy? Even in the context of our self-perpetuating "real world" we cannot anticipate racing the Soviets into a cosmic infinity.

As the space age unfolds, it is generating new realities and new opportunities, unlike any heretofore imaginable. Cosmic is no metaphor out there. Only fantasists talk about riding through space, planting flags and defending trade routes with rocket ships. Realists recognize that the sheer immensity of space generates requirements for survival that, ultimately, will force the superpowers to cooperate. At a certain point, anything other than international exploration of the cosmos from our tiny planet will cease to make any sense at all. In our intense absorption with events of the moment, we have failed to recognize how close to that point we really are.

But before we can reach it, we must develop policies that respond to the unfolding realities of the space age, that move out to meet it on its own uniquely promising terms. Without such policies, earthbound civilization can only wind up recoiling upon itself. It is not often remarked, Mr. President, that the space weapons systems currently under development will reach scarcely above the atmosphere. Regardless of their merits, those systems are irrelevant to the challenge of space exploration. For that compelling reason alone, it is in our interest to develop a separate track for international space exploration, even as we negotiate with the Soviets at Geneva and strengthen our defenses at home. It would permit us to test a new context for political action without letting down our guard in the context which currently prevails. As it happens, the planet Mars offers an initial guiding step in that direction.

Toward the end of this decade, an unusual convergence in space exploration will occur. In 1988, the U.S.S.R. will launch an unmanned scientific mission to the Mars moon Phobos. In 1990, the United States will launch its Mars geochemical/climatology orbiter. It makes no sense not to coordinate the two scheduled missions, so as to insure maximum scientific return. But, due to long leadtimes for such activities, meaningful cooperation cannot be achieved unless action is taken within the next few months. Senate Joint Resolution 46 proposes that the President direct the Administrator of NASA to explore the opportunities for coordinating the two Mars missions while there is still time, in the context of the administration's committed effort to renew the U.S.-U.S.S.R. space cooperation agreement in accordance with legislation the President signed last October 30. Due to the time sensitiveness and the technical complexities involved, it is entirely fitting that NASA take on this responsibility, in consultation with the Department of State. Coordinating the 1988 and 1990 Mars missions—which would require no technology transfer on either side—represents an opportunity that deserves the highest priority. Among other things, it could open the way to a wider range of cooperative activities in other areas of space science, such as solar-terrestrial physics, astrophysics and plasma physics. And, of course, it would set the stage for further collaboration in the exploration of Mars.

With the preceding in mind, Senate Joint Resolution 46 also proposes that NASA prepare a report examining the opportunities for joint East-West Mars-related activities, including an unmanned sample return and all other activities that might contribute to an international manned mission to Mars, perhaps at the turn of the century. I should point out that Mars contingency planning is nothing new at NASA. Senate Joint Resolution 46 notes that the orginal target of American space planners was the planet Mars—not the Moon, which the White House decided upon for political reasons—and that Mars was subsequently advanced as a logical followup to the Apollo Moon Program, but this time it was rejected for budgetary reasons. Designs for Mars missions have been percolating on NASA's backburners for 25 years. I understand that even now NASA may be gearing up for yet another manned Mars mission study, in keeping with the President's admirable intention to establish goals beyond the space station that "will carry us well into the next century." In effect, Senate Joint Resolution 46 suggests that such a study also encompass the possibilities for international cooperation, so we can at least consider that option alongside the alternative of an absurdly wasteful U.S.-U.S.S.R. race to Mars, while we still have a choice.

In sum, Madam President, my resolution does two things. On the one hand, it urges policymakers to exploit an immediate opportunity for space cooperation. On the other hand, it casts that opportunity in the context of requirements generated by an almost unimaginably expansive new age which promises to render many aspects of current thought and action obsolete, if we manage to keep human civilization intact long enough to enter it. I hope we will devote greater consideration to devising ways to take advantage of those uniquely promising opportunities on the horizon, even as we now stand on the brink. If successful, we will earn the gratitude of future generations—indeed, of whole new worlds.

Madam President, we can only conclude that the U.S. Congress has a duty to include in its deliberations the joint cooperative exploration of space, beginning with the planet Mars.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGREEMENT ON CLASS A COMMITTEES

Mr. DOLE. Madam President, I just wanted to announce—and I have the concurrence of the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD—that we think we have reached an agreement on class A committees. There would be a 214 base, 115 Republican slots and 99 Democrat slots. I am not now prepared to announce the ratios, but I thank my distinguished colleague, Senator BYRD, and others on the Democratic Steering Committee as well as Senator MATTINGLY, the chairman of the Committee on Committees, Senator QUAYLE, Senator CHAFEE, and others on our side. It is our hope that we can approve the resolution on committees on February 19. It is fair to say that this solution is not entirely satisfactory to either side, but it is one that has been arrived at after a number of meetings by Republicans and Democrats. Again I thank my distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY], who has spent I do not know how many hours trying to work this out, and the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IRAN: A TERRORIST STATE

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, a few days ago President Reagan warned of a new danger facing the free world in Central America. According to President Reagan—and I fully agree with him—that danger is being fueled by the support for the Sandinista dictatorship in Nicaragua by the Khomeini dictatorship in Iran.

The American people should be greatful to President Reagan for his forthright warning about the dangers to all of us in the free world posed by the Khomeini regime. In 1983, the Department of State described Khomeini's so-called Islamic Republic as a terrorist state. Iran's subsequent actions have only served to confirm the accuracy of that description.

Recently, the Times of London broke a story detailing the establishment of a special military unit in Iran to recruit and to train suicide squads for terrorist missions outside of Iran. The French weekly magazine VSD published in Paris last fall published a major exposé of the inner workings of this type of terrorist structure that Khomeini is creating.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Times of London of January 16, 1984 entitled "Khomeini Approves Suicide Hit Squad" be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as exhibit 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a translation of the top secret Iranian document quoted by the Times of London be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as exhibit 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. HELMS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the French weekly VSD by Philippe Bernet entitled "Two Billion Francs in Arms For Khomeini" be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as exhibit 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 3.)

KHOMEINI APPROVES SUICIDE HIT-SQUAD

(By Our Foreign Staff)

Iran has set up a special military unit to recruit and train suicide squads to carry out terrorist operations in countries opposed to Ayatollah Khomeini's Islamic republic, according to documents obtained by an Iranian opposition movement and supplied to The Times.

Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Jordan and France are named as prime targets of the unit, which is called the "independent brigade of irregular warfare in enemy territories".

A leading figure behind the creation of the new unit is said to be Mr. Husain Musawi, leader of the Islamic Jihad organization, which has claimed responsibility for suicide attacks in the past three years on American and French establishments in Beirut and Kuwait.

According to the documents, the secondment is being requested of specialized military instructors who should be under 30 years old, preferably bachelors and who "must be completely committed to martyrdom".

One of the documents is an invitation, dated May 19, 1984, from the Minister of Islamic Guidance, Ayatollah Muhammad Khatami, to 12 ministers, military commanders, heads of department and Ayatollah Baqer Hakim, a pro-Iranian Iraqi Shiite clergyman who leads the self-styled Supreme Assembly of the Islamic Revolution of Iraq in Iran, to attend a meeting at Ayatollah Khatami's office a week later.

The second document purports to be minutes of the meeting, though it only records the introductory speeches of the ayatollah and a mysterious figure referred to by the code name of Mirhashem.

"All your eminences here are fully acquainted with his face," Ayatollah Khatami said in the minutes, "but for the sake of prudence, let us refer to him as brother Mirhashem."

A spokesman for the London office of Dr. Shahpur Bakhtiar, the former Iranian prime minister, whose National Movement of the Iranian Resistance has acquired the documents, said the mystery man was Mr. Musawi.

He is Iranian by upbringing and nationality, though he has for some time been based in northern Lebanon.

Ayatollah Khatami said he and Mirhashem first took their plans for the suicide squads to Ayatollah Khomeini on May 14 and gained his approval immediately. "Whatever is necessary to destroy them must be done," Ayotallah Khomeini is reported to have said.

Ayatollah Khatami added that the plans, to be examined later by the meeting, were more than 200 pages long. Perhaps this, together with Ayatollah Khomeini's alleged approval of it, explains why the minutes do not contain any suggested amendments from the others present, though they included the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or one of his senior aides, and all the top commanders of the armed forces.

According to the Ayatollah, the unit was to be built around the nucleus of "a few groups of 10 to 20 people each who are currently serving in Labanon". Though officially a secret branch of the Revolutionary Guards or one of the other armed forces, "to avoid any legal difficulties" it would act independently and report directly to the Supreme Commander, Ayatollah Khomeini.

The meeting was then briefed by Mirhashem, who referred to the Lebanese groups under his command as being "known to the outside world as suicide groups". He said his organization had been "assisted by five Muslim brothers of occupied Palestine who have for many years served in the army of the occupiers of Jerusalem and who will be making all their knowledge available to us".

Mirhashem complained, however, that the increased vigilance of the Arab countries in the region, and the inadequacy of the military training of his men had rendered Iran unable to topple the government's opposed to it "except by blows brought to bear from within".

He requested that specialized instructors from the armed forces be seconded to his organizations by July 1, and some 1,500 to

2,000 men under 30 and preferably bachelors, be introduced by July 23. "They must be completely committed to martyrdom."

He also requested cooperation from the Foreign Ministry to send abroad, in the guise of military attachés, his intelligence agents. Other requests included a secure, isolated base for training the men, and facilities for teaching them to pilot light aircraft and naval vessels.

Mirhashem enumerated his targets as a first tier of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain, a second tier of Jordan, and the third tier of France and "any other countries that might oppose the Islamic Republic."

He said it would take at least until the next summer before his men would be able to go into action, and he feared the possibility of a lull in their activities in the meantime.

TOP SECRET

Subject: Creation of an independent brigade for carrying out unconventional warfare in enemy territory.

In the process of obeying the orders of His Eminence . . . Ayatollah Imam Khomeini . . . , the great leader of our revolution, and the founder of the Islamic Republic, which were given in handwriting, I would be pleased if you attended a meeting at the building of the Ministry of Islamic Guidance on 5/3/1363 (26 May 1984) at 1600 hours. Should Your Excellencies presence for some reason not be possible, then one of your deputies or, otherwise, one of your senior responsible staff with full powers of authority on your behalf should attend the meeting, and his name, qualifications and title should be relayed 48 hours before the meeting.

Signed on behalf of the Minister of National Guidance.

Seyed Mohammed Khatami.

List of recipients of the memorandum

Chief of the Joint Staff of the Islamic Republic Armed Forces.

Representative of the Iman in the Supreme Defence Council.

Commander of the Revolutionary Guards of the Islamic Republic.

Commander of the Ground Forces of the Islamic Republic.

Commander of the Air Force of the Islamic Republic.

Commander of the Navy of the Islamic Republic.

Chief of the G2 Section of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Chiefs of the Political-Ideological Offices of the various forces.

Chiefs of the Islamic Committees (Head of the combattant clergy organisation).

The Representative of the Iman in Haj.

Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic.

Hojat-Ol-Islam, Mohammed Baquir Hakim (Islamic Revolution of our brother country, Iraq).

Official proceedings concerning the creation of an independent brigade for carrying out unconventional warfare in enemy territory

The meeting commenced with the speech of His Eminence, Ayatollah Khatami, the Minister of Islamic Guidance, who said the following:

"In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, dear Brothers, I wish to welcome you on behalf of the International Islamic Movements Organisation, and to explain in brief why this meeting has been called. On 24th of "Ordibehesht", I, accompanied by the Head of this movement (Islamic World Organisation) were received by our beloved leader to whom we presented our progress report. His Eminence, the Iman, expressed dissatisfaction with the behaviour of the leaders of the sheikdoms of the Persian Gulf and of the Saudi regime. Of course, he was not pleased either with others who pretend to be leaders of Islamic nations. After moments of silence which were evidence of his deepfelt anxiety and dissatisfaction, His Eminence in his usual style of firmness concerning all living matters made certain comments which are as follows:

"From the beginning of the revolution, we have had many enemies, but our expectations from Muslims was something else. Unfortunately, all the rulers of Islamic countries are servants of foreigners and instead of learnings from our advice and being in step with us in the direction of Islam and the Islamic "Ummah", they have chosen the path of hostility and have acted in the same fashion they acted with the prophet (Mohammed) at the dawn of the Islamic period, and have consequently stepped on all the laws and traditions of the Koran and have left the entire Islamic heritage in the hands of the foreigners—first of all Sadam (Hussein, President of the Iraqi Republic) began to fight against Islam. Although his situation is near termination, these poor people are also sinking in the well with him; by this I mean the reactionary rulers of Arabia who also consider themselves the guardians of the Holy Shrines, and others, Kuwait, etc. These people think that because their bosses are Russians or Americans that they can by strong guns and tanks face the Iranian Ummah which has given so many martyrs. The destiny of the Shah, Sadam and their bosses, America, has not been a lesson to them. Now, it is up to them. we have a heavy responsibility in the face of the Koran, His Holiness, the Great Mohammed (the Prophet) and Islam. We have to spread Islam everywhere, and in this path we have given a great deal of blood, and we will give more until, with the help of god, Islam becomes victorious. You should act according to your religious duties. Whatever is necessary to destroy them must be carried out. There is no longer any time for talk and advice. That's it." (end of Khomeini's comments).

"Our brothers are aware that for four full years we have been at war with Sadam (Hussein, President of the Iraqi Republic), and we have borne a lot of suffering, and until such time as we have destroyed him and liberated our brother Iraqi nation, we cannot stop. On the other hand, all the forces of world oppression have united against this righteousness and have begun to pull the strings of their puppets everywhere to damage our glorious revolution. Inside, groups which have sold themselves, and outside, countries like Iraq. Therefore, based on what has been said, we are encircled by such an enormous satanic force and we must accept this truth, that apart from fighting this imposed war we face thousands of other internal and external problems. Apart from this, as indicated by our beloved leader, we have a heavy duty toward Islam and as such we must prepare ourselves to face the challenges of any enemy until such time as we have carried out the wishes of our leader and our "martyr-raising" Ummah, and we have liberated all Islamic countries from the yoke of corrupt and reactionary rulers. Therefore, because of the present difficulties which have been mentioned, it is not possible for us to directly confront this enormous force that is supported by the super powers, based on a plan that has been prepared in almost 200 pages and on which you will be subsequently informed, it has been decided that the strike-force which at present is composed of a few groups of 10-20 people each, who are currently serving in the Lebanon, should be increased to the size of a brigade.

This force, for security reasons, and for the purposes of making sure that legal impediments do not delay its formation, will be formed under the aegis of either the Revolutionary Guards or the Armed Forces. Of course, the decision in this respect will rest with His Eminence, the Leader. At this time, we are concerned with its creation. This force will act independently and will present all its reports directly to the Commander in Chief. Because the carrying out of this plan required the assistance of all revolutionary organs, the matter was presented to His Eminence in that initial meeting, and he accepted the proposal. What has been said has been a brief introduction, and now we will enter the main substance and I shall pass the platform to Brother "Mirhashem", who is responsible for this organisation. Of course, all present here are fully familiar with his (Mirhashem's) features; however, please allow for prudence-sake that we refer to him as "Mirhashem". [Pseudonym for Hossein Mossavi]."

Brother Mirhashem thanked His Eminence, Ayatollah Khatami and all respected people present.

"From what was said at the beginning, there was some reference made to the creation of brigade. For the information of all present, I must say that we have at present a number of dedicated groups who are ready for action and who have, to the outside world become known as suicide groups. These groups have already performed certain actions. But since regional reactionary forces out of fear from the Islamic Revolution and the hard blows of the fighters of Islam, with each passing day under different pretexts are perparing themselves more and more, and this in itself is a big threat for the continuation of the revolution, these groups that we have are by themselves inadequate. Also, the personnel in these groups are commited only because of their beliefs for which they are ready to do anything, but they lack warfare experience. Therefore, the personnel of this brigade must from the point of view of military combat experience be of a very high echelon. If we wish to commence this task from the beginning, that is from the training stages, by the time that we can prepare such people for utilisation at least one year will have elapsed, and this is something that will create an interlude in our activities and will award our enemies more time. Therefore, it has been decided to select dedicated religious and fully commited candidates from all combat (Nahad) organisations so as to prevent any interlude in the continuation of our operational activities.

For the purposes of dealing with the main substance, I will list our requirements for you so that all brothers present will be informed of the boundaries of their duties and contributions towards the creation of this brigade. It is pertinent here that I should remind all that as indicated in the invitation memo the name of this brigade is for carrying out unconventional warfare in-enemy territory. To commence operations and confrontations we must have excuses. Therefore, we must begin by propaganda—and here this is the responsibility of the combattant clergy organisation and the Friday Mosque prayer leaders (throughout the country) who must in the course of their political-religious sermons propose the plan that the administration of the Holy Shrines belongs to all Muslims in the world and must be controlled through a trusteeship consisting of all Islamic countries, and also the question of renovating other religious shrines and building for which I have no specific knowledge. I refer only to the heading which is in line with the wishes of His Eminence the Imam, and the Friday prayer leaders are more than capable of dealing with the substance of these headings.
